worker as well as the farmer. Taking it item by item, we find this astounding result: That for every dollar of reduction of duties in the iron schedule, $26 are added to the burdens of the public, already too onerous to be borne. Instead of reducing taxation, as advised by the Administration, instead of checking the flow of the people's money into a Treasury already dangerously full; instead of relieving a tax-ridden people clamorous for relief; instead of following in line with the declarations of every public officer this Government has ever had, that when we were collecting more money than was needed, taxes ought to be reduced; this bill actually proposes to increase them. Taking the home consumption statement from the Bureau of Statistics, which gives the importations and rates of duty for 1887, it will be found that about sixty-seven items are left by this bill in the iron schedule with rates unchanged; that upon about fifty-six items rates are reduced, and upon about forty items rates are increased. But an examination of the changes discloses the startling fact that the aggregate reductions amount to but $353,000, while the increase of duties on iron, etc., proposed by the bill, aggregates over $9,000,000. It is not drawn in the interest of the Southern farmer, for among other things raised are cotton ties, on which the planter is taxed $158,910 more than before, besides the consequent tribute on those of domestic manufacture. It is not intended to benefit the Western and the Northern farmer, for fence-wire, rods, etc., by this bill are made to pay over a million and a half more than under the present law.

It is not devised to help the suffering consumers of tin-plate, whether it be canners of fruit, meat, fish, or vegetables, or the consumers of canned goods, for they are taxed for the useless can and the implements of cookery, and for the very roof over the kitchen, over $6,000,000 more than at present. The manufacturer of steel rails is no better off under the bill, for the duties on imported ingots, from which he makes his product, are raised nearly half a million, while his rails are reduced to $14 per ton—a cut both ways. In short, this bill benefits nobody and injures everybody. It finds the duties on iron and steel on an average of about 40 per cent. and it raises them by 50 per cent. or to nearly 60 per cent. ad valorem. From whatever point you look at it, it is a misbegotten, ill-shapen, portentous, unjustifiable monster, with no excuse for existence and no purpose in its life but to obstruct the Democratic party and to delay the justice which the country demands. [Applause.]

COLONIAL DUTIES.

Mr. Chairman, during this debate I have listened with a great deal of interest to gentlemen on the other side of the House, who have so glowingly referred us to the fact that Washington, Hamilton, Jefferson, Madison, and their compeers were the fathers of protection in this country. Sir, the first duties upon imports established by the Colonial Government after our independence, were substantially as follows: There were but few articles selected, namely, liquors, sugar, tea, coffee, cocoa, molasses, and pepper. Under the head of liquors, Madeira wine, at that period of our history the beverage of the rich, and Jamaica rum consumed by the great masses of the people of that day, covered the liquor schedule. Upon Madeira wine was imposed an import duty of twelve-ninetieths of a dollar per gallon; Jamaica rum, four-ninetieths of a dollar; Bohea tea, used by the wealthier classes, six-ninetieths of a dollar per pound; other teas, twenty-four ninetieths of a dollar, the latter being the heaviest tax imposed. Upon all other articles imported 5 per cent. of their value.

After the Constitution of 1789 had been adopted, it was James Madison, of Virginia, who brought into the House of Representatives the first tariff bill, and who urged its passage. He then read the import duties of 1783, added a clause or two on tonnage, and urged the committee to adopt it or at least to make it the basis of a temporary impost. The first proposition was that the mass of goods, wares, and merchandise coming in from foreign ports should be taxed 5 per cent. on their value; but in the list of articles on which special duties were to be laid, the bone of contention, sir, appeared to be on Jamaica rum. Two duties were suggested, one of 15 cents and one of 12 cents a gallon, which soon divided the Committee of the Whole. And before this question was settled the debate turned on the good and ill effects of low and high duties; but finally Jamaica rum was taxed at 10 cents a gallon.

When a duty of 8 cents per gallon was proposed on molasses, immediately every member from Massachusetts arose and protested. It was too much; the people would never bear it. They shouted, sir, that the capital engaged in the business of distilling rum in Massachusetts out of this molasses summed up half a million of dollars. Yet it was now proposed to destroy this great industry which contributed so much to the prosperity and welfare of the nation, and with such persuasive earnestness, sir, did they plead, that the Committee of the Whole consented to lower the duty to 2½ cents per gallon. Some articles were thrown out and some were taxed without discussion, but a few gave rise to sharp debates. The greater part of two days was spent wrangling over salt. The bill then under consideration was reported to the House, but, sir, wool, and tin in pigs and bars, were on the free-list, and in three weeks thereafter became a law by the approval of President Washington. Under the tariff of 1783, eight articles were specified subject to impost duty. The number of articles named and taxed under the tariff of 1789 did not exceed thirty-two, all others being covered by the 5 per cent. clause. It is this tariff of 1789, introduced by Madison, approved by Hamilton and Jefferson, the average import duties of which did not exceed 7½ per cent., that the gentlemen on the other side of the House tell us to-day the fathers of the Republic inaugurated, as protectionists, namely, a tariff in which the duties averaged 7½ per cent. ad valorem in 1789, with a bankrupt Government, which could not borrow a dollar, and to-day, one hundred years after, with $150,000,000 in the Treasury over our wants, the average duty is 47.7 per cent. ad valorem.

But, Mr. Chairman, what was our policy in 1852, with other nations, when we believed in trading with the outside world? In March, 1852, the United States sent a fleet to compel the Japanese, a great nation numbering 35,000,000 people, to open their ports to the commerce of the world, and the thing was done; and in 1858 a treaty of amity and commerce was signed between the two nations. Regulation 7 of that treaty provides for the following duties on imports into Japan:

Class 1. All articles in this class shall be free.
Class 2. A duty of 5 per cent. shall be paid on the following articles imported into Japan, namely, all building material, rigging, or repairing, or fitting out of ships, whaling gear of all kinds, provisions salted, bread and breadstuffs, living animals, coals, rice, steam machinery, zinc, lead, tin, and raw silk.
Class 3. All intoxicating liquors, a duty of 35 per cent.
Class 4. All other goods, 20 per cent.

And now, should the Japanese station a fleet off San Francisco or New York to demand open, fair, and unrestricted trade with us, in the name of civilization, what answer could we make to them that they might not have made to us?

THE PURPOSE OF THE PRESENT BILL.

But, Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration has not been framed entirely upon the principles I have stated. The majority of the Committee on Ways and Means realize and appreciate the condition of affairs existing in the country to-day; and however desirous they might be to extend that full measure of relief to the wage-worker and the great agricultural classes of the country, to which they are so justly entitled, invested capital has its claims upon them. They appreciate the fact that during the past twenty-five years, under the present system of protected industries, immense sums of money have been invested in the various manufacturing industries of the country, and that any bill which the committee might introduce should have due regard for the capital invested in such manufactures; that it would be unwise for any great political party having the power to do so to at once attempt to readjust the conditions of to-day, which would undoubtedly cause serious loss to those who had invested their capital under a previous condition of affairs. Keeping these objects in view, we sought, first, to relieve these manufacturing industries by placing on the free-list, as far as we possibly could, such articles as are essentially necessary to them to enable them to compete, not only in their home markets, but in the markets of the world. Secondly, in the revision and readjustment of the various schedules, under the existing tariff, to leave ample duties on all merchandise that could possibly be imported from abroad in competition with our home products, and to protect our home manufacturers and the labor employed by them; and, as the best evidence of our efforts in this direction, I can only compare the average rates of duties under the existing tariff with what they would be under this bill if it should become a law, namely, the average ad valorem duties on dutiable goods under the existing tariff of 47.7 per cent. ad valorem, and the average under the proposed bill of 40 per cent. ad valorem. This shows a reduction under the present bill equal to 7.7 per cent. ad valorem.

A tabulated comparison of the difference between existing duties and those proposed under the bill now before the House would show as follows:

According to the foregoing schedule the proposed reduction of duties on imports is	$53,720,447.22
And according to the estimate of Joseph F. Miller, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the reductions of internal revenue under the proposed bill will be	24,455,607.00
Or a total reduction of	78,176,054.22

Of the $53,720,447.22 reduction of duties on imports under the proposed bill, should it become a law, $22,189,505.48 are derived from articles placed upon the free-list, leaving the sum of $31,530,941.74 as the gross reduction made or proposed by the committee, applicable to all our varied industries; and yet, sir, the majority of this House and of the committee are charged with being free-traders!

The estimated amount of money that will be in the Treasury of the United States at the end of the present fiscal year, ending June 30, 1888, over and above all liabilities of the Government due at that date, is $150,000,000. Since the Secretary of the Treasury has resumed the purchase of bonds this month (May) the amount offered and purchased daily will not equal even the surplus of the daily taxes collected from the people after paying therefrom the daily expenses of the Government.

The bill now under consideration has been formed for the double purpose of reducing the surplus and relieving the country of needless taxation. The changes made, the majority of the committee believes, will accomplish these objects; but let it be clearly understood that the interests of labor have been steadily held in view at every stage of our proceedings, and we believe that this bill furnishes that protection to labor which our opponents profess to give, but to which their policy is directly opposed. The effect of this bill will be, not to reduce his wages, but to lessen to him the cost of the necessaries of life, and to decrease his dependence upon the employer. Extreme poverty and liberty never exist together. Starving men and women can not be free. Dependent upon the employer for the opportunity of earning bread, and frequently for the roof over his head, the steadiness of his work dependent, not upon the law of supply and demand, but upon the will of the trust, the employé in protected industries becomes the personal and political slave of his employer. It is the condition of this class, who must necessarily be either a menace to liberty or its bulwark, that the committee has primarily sought to better. Protection, so called, will add no penny to the wage-worker's pay or give one day's additional labor in the year, but it will rob him out of an undue proportion of his earnings to purchase the necessaries of life and keep him a trembling dependent, since the recent history of this country shows that the tendency of the protected industries is toward combination in the form of trusts, under which production is arbitrarily suspended, raising prices to the consumer and throwing the workman out of his job. Monopoly more terrible, more dangerous to the liberties of a country, more oppressive to the laborer, can not be imagined.

This aristocracy, soulless and remorseless, is totally unlike that which exists abroad under the patents of the sovereign. The members of the latter draw their stated incomes from fixed sources and redistribute them among the people in the expenses of their living. But the members of our plutocracy, the plutocracy of subsidy, the monopolizers of American markets, are continually changing, by the operation of their own will, the objects and the volume of the taxation which they levy upon the public, and the proceeds go to swell the fortunes of adventurers, which, when combined together, threaten the political subjugation of the public. Their exactions are limited only by their desire to take or by the ability of the masses to pay.

THE FARMING CLASS.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion upon no class of our people do the present fiscal burdens of our country bear so heavily as upon the farming class. It is not in the power of the Government, by any policy that can be adopted, to protect the farmer in what he raises and has to sell; but the Government can impoverish and virtually pauperize him and his family by not only imposing a high duty upon everything he consumes, which is or may be imported, but also by prohibitory duties upon commodities made in this country and necessary to his comfort, which place it in the power of the home manufacturer, by combinations and trusts, to charge what he pleases for his wares. What a mockery of protection the Republican tariff of 1883 is for the farmer! In a speech made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], referring to the advantages that the protection theory gave the farmer, he used the following language:

Among the advantages conferred upon the farmer by our protective tariff, is that derived from a direct protection to the products of his farm and the industries incident thereto, as shown by the following table:

(Referring to the duties upon farm products under the existing tariff:) Beef and pork, 1 cent per pound; hams and bacon, 2 cents per pound; butter, 4 cents per pound; lard, 2 cents per pound; cheese, 4 cents per pound; wheat, 20 cents per bushel; oats, 10 cents per bushel; corn 10 cents per bushel; rye, 15 cents per bushel; live animals, 20 per cent. ad valorem; wheat flour, 20 per cent. ad valorem; corn-meal, 10 cents per bushel.

I claim, sir, that not an article named in the foregoing schedule would be imported into this country in competition with the American farmer, if they were all upon the free-list, with the exception of wheat, which could only come from Canada, and if every bushel of wheat raised in Canada should be sold in the United States it would not affect the price of the American wheat one-tenth of 1 cent per bushel [applause], but the country would be the gainer if it were sold here, so far, at least, as the cost of transportation and commissions for storage and selling accrued to our railroads and commission men. The home price of our wheat, corn, beef, pork, butter, lard, and cheese, and of all the products of the farm produced in excess of home consumption, and which have to be exported to Europe to find a market, is determined by the price of the commodity in the markets of the world, plus the cost of transportation. This is beyond controversy.

I will also avail myself of a portion of the tables submitted in the speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] in relation to the farm products of this country, and the quantities exported, for the fiscal year of 1886–1887, as follows:

Products.	Production.	Exportation.
	Farm value.	Export value.	Farm value.	Per cent.
Breadstuffs:
Corn	$610,311,000	$20,052,704	$11,790,046	1.9
Wheat	314,226,020	142,666,563	87,668,833	27.9
Meats	748,000,000	78,152,731	62,522,185	8.4
Dairy products:
Butter	192,000,000	1,983,698	1,437,773	.8
Cheese	32,000,000	7,594,633	6,455,438	20.2
Textile fabrics: cotton	257,295,327	206,222,057	177,895,501	69.1

Why the tariff of 1883 did not contain a duty upon the importation of cotton into this country I do not understand; for most assuredly, sir, if the duties provided for under the tariff of 1883 gave protection to the products of the Northern farmer, the same theory ought to have given it to the cotton planter of the South; at least it would be just as consistent, practically applied, when we consider the exportations of the farm products of the whole country.

If the products of our farms could have been sold at home for the one thirty-second part of 1 cent more than the export price, not one pound would have gone abroad; and every pound consumed at home would have been exported if it had commanded abroad one-half of 1 per cent. in value more than the home price; for the home price is governed by the price the surplus exported will command in the foreign markets. One of the strong arguments that the protectionist makes to the farmer is the home market that protection is alleged to insure for his produce. It is a fallacy and a fraud, and intelligent farmers will not be longer deceived by it.

Let us suppose a case in my own State: Let us take, say, the Edgar Thomson Steel Works, located at Braddock, on the Pennsylvania Railroad, 10 miles east from Pittsburgh and 478 miles from Chicago, employing a large number of men. Contiguous to these works lives an industrious farmer with a hundred acres of land. His products consist of wheat, corn, oats, hay, hogs, and cattle. His proximity to these extensive works, where his surplus produce can be delivered in an hour, and where thousands of hungry mouths are ready to consume it, surely gives him an advantageous market, according to the protectionist's theory. But let us see, let us take one of the products of the farm as an example of the others, for they all come under the same law of supply and demand and price. The man in the iron works can not eat wheat; it must first be reduced to flour; so the farmer takes a load of 33⅓ bushels of wheat, just 1 ton, to the miller, who is also on the railroad and near the steel works.

Now, let us see what controls the miller in making a price to the farmer: first, self-interest, to purchase it as cheap as he can; second, to buy the farmer's wheat at a price which after being ground into flour will enable him to sell it to the mill-men in competition with flour sold by the grocery-man at the corner, which has been manufactured at St. Paul or Minneapolis, Minnesota, leaving him (the miller) a margin of profit for grinding and his labor. Surely the miller can not pay the farmer any more for his wheat because it was raised on land adjoining the steel works; he can only pay what he would pay for the same quality of wheat in the Chicago market, plus the cost of transportation to his mill. The miller explains the situation to the farmer and gets his wheat for that price, or probably less, because the farmer's market is restricted practically to the local mill. But where does Chicago wheat come from? Where is it grown and what law of values determines its selling price? It comes from the great regions of the Northwest; is grown upon the rich and fertile prairies of that section, upon land that can be had almost for the asking, or at most at a cost of from $3 to $15 per acre, upon land requiring no barnyard to make a crop, and where the straw is burned in the fields as the easiest and cheapest way of getting rid of it. The price in the Chicago market is determined day by day, if there is not a "corner" in wheat, by the price at Mark Lane, London.

The farmer at Braddock, after selling his wheat, returns to his home and family. He had bought his farm at a cost of $100 per acre, made a payment in cash upon it, from the savings of years of toil and labor, secured the deferred payments by a mortgage, hoping that by his industry and labor upon his farm and its favorable location he would make money enough to meet the interest and pay off his mortgage at maturity. He has sold his wheat at 90 cents per bushel, grown upon land which cost him $100 per acre, sown and harvested this wheat by labor for which he had to pay from $15 to $18 per month and board, and after the taxes upon the land and his help are paid, and other debts connected with the raising of his crop are settled, he finds that both ends will not meet; that the price he has received for his wheat will not cover cost of production.

Discouraged, but not disheartened, the farmer arises the next morning before the sun is up; hitches up his team and drives to town. He needs an iron or steel beam for some purpose on his farm, and goes to the steel mill to buy it; and upon asking the price is told that he can have it for 3.3 cents per pound, or at the rate of $66 per ton; and he is further informed that 3.3 cents per pound for steel beams is the uniform price at all the steel mills in the United States. Now, the farmer protests that 3.3 cents per pound for steel beams appears to him to be an exorbitant price; that his boy works in the steel mill, in the beam department, and that in figuring over the cost of making steel beams last night with his boy they could not make them out to cost more than $29 or $30 per ton at the mill; that $66 per ton gave the steel works a profit of $36 per ton; and that he thought something must be wrong; what it was he did not just understand, but yesterday he brought into town 33⅓ bushels of wheat, just one ton, and he could only get 90 cents per bushel for it, or 1½ cents per pound, the equivalent of $30 per ton, and that this price did not pay him the cost of raising it; in fact, he lost money on it instead of making $36 per ton profit, as the steel works did on the beams, to meet the interest and pay the mortgage on his farm; that he could not understand why he should be obliged to raise and sell 73 bushels of wheat, or over two tons, to enable him to purchase one ton of steel beams, costing less than $30 per ton to produce and make. The answer of the steel-man was, that this condition of affairs all grew out of the pauper labor of Europe, and the necessity of protecting home labor, and to make a home market for the farmer's wheat, oats, corn, cattle, and hogs. The farmer being unable to refute this unanswerable argument, paid 3.3 cents per pound for his beam and departed a wiser man. In the evening the son returned, and with the father began to discuss the transactions of the last two days, endeavoring to ascertain why the farmer's wheat would only command 1½ cents per pound at the steel-works, while the farmer had to pay 3.3 cents per pound for his steel beams. The farmer feared he had made a fatal mistake when he bought the farm; but he had been influenced in the purchase by a speech he had heard in the fall of 1884, delivered by a very distinguished statesman, one Mr. KELLEY, at the opera house in Braddock, in which that gentleman ably set forth the advantages of protection to home labor, and eloquently dwelt on the home market it would create for the products of the farm, while enhancing the wages of the mill-hands. But the son could not see the advantage of Mr. KELLEY'S kind of protection, either to himself, the mill-hand, or his father, the farmer. The price of the latter's product in the home market being regulated by the price in Mark Lane, London, he was of course trading in an open market, and took nothing whatever by the so-called protection. As to his own wages in the mill, if he got any share of the tariff subsidy in the form of wages, it was so small as to be inappreciable and to count for practically nothing as against the prices he was made to pay for the "tariffed" necessaries of life; but considering the employer's share, and the necessities of a "protected" employer's life, he was not so surprised that the "boss," as alleged in the newspapers, could rent Cluny Castle, in Inverness-shire, Scotland, to spend his summers in; and as he believed that the net profits of Carnegie Brothers on the two items of steel rails and steel beams alone, throwing out of account all other items of their production, were, on 30,000 tons of steel beams, $1,000,000, and on 192,998 tons of steel rails, at $10 per ton, $1,929,980, or a total profit on these two items alone of nearly $3,000,000, the son, with an eye to facts and figures, declared his extreme amazement at the proposition of Carnegie Brothers to reduce wages 10 per cent., for the wage-workers of that establishment thought they might decently leave this pitiful percentage in the hands of that labor in whose name and for whose alleged benefit they receive the enormous bounty extorted from the consumers of the United States upon those two capital articles; and that while the employés not only thought they were justly entitled to this 10 per cent. they were yet fighting for a principle dearer to them than mere dollars and cents. It was a principle involving not only the great economic problem of this age, but of past ages, and must be the great problem of the future—a fair division between labor and capital; and if the wage-worker at Carnegie Brothers' works could be forced into subjugation by Pinkerton special detectives, their just rights denied them, and the imported pauper labor of Europe could be utilized as a means for the subversion of their rights, he could see very little hope in the future for the wage-worker in this country.

IRON AND STEEL, AND THE EDGAR THOMSON STEEL WORKS.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I propose, if I can, to prove that the boy's conclusions in regard to his own wages are correct. In 1886 Hon. Daniel Manning, then Secretary of the Treasury, issued circulars to the various manufacturing industries of the country, asking them for certain information in regard to the cost of manufacturing, including labor and material, the object of the circular being to gather together certain data to lay before Congress in connection with a revision of the tariff. Among others to whom this circular was sent was the "American Iron and Steel Association," with offices at Philadelphia—an association representing, I may say, the entire iron and steel industry of this country. This association sent out to the various manufacturing industries that formed the association a circular letter, asking that the information desired by the Secretary of the Treasury should be reported to them, and that they would forward it to the Department. Among the replies received by the association was the following communication from Thomas M. Carnegie, chairman of Carnegie Brothers & Co. Limited, Pittsburgh, Pa.:

Notwithstanding your able argument in favor of reporting details of cost of production of iron and steel, as requested by the Secretary of the Treasury, and in a less objectionable form by yourself, I am of the opinion that our interest would not be served by making such returns as you indicate. (See page 373, Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on revision of the tariff, with accompanying documents, 1886.)

I am prepared to supply a portion of the information desired by the Department, and which Carnegie Brothers & Co. Limited declined to give, taken from their own books.

I hold in my hand, sir, a copy of a contract, executed under seal, which I saw copied from the original myself, of the schedule of wages as awarded by the board of arbitration, selected by the Knights of Labor and the Edgar Thomson Steel Works, fixing the wages of the employés of that company in the steel-mill department for the year 1887; and from this contract I submit a statement based upon the absolute amount of money paid to these employés in connection with the steel-rail department of that company. They are not theoretical figures; they are the absolute results in dollars and cents, and fully and clearly set forth the earnings of the wage-workers working in that company.

STEEL RAILS.

Under the terms and conditions of this contract the following is the cost of manufacturing a ton of steel rails, of 2,240 pounds, at the Edgar

Thomson Steel Works, located near Pittsburgh, Pa., during the year 1887, one of the largest establishments of the kind in the United States:

Market price of 1 ton of No. 1 Bessemer pig-iron at the mill	$18.00
Converting same, per ton	1.50
Blooming, per ton	.72
Finishing, per ton	1.87
1¼ tons Connellsville coke, average $1.35 per ton	1.62
	23.71
Add for net loss on material, first to last, 13 per cent.	3.08
Total	26.79
Divided as follows:
Labor	$4.09
Material and waste	22.70
	26.79

The percentage of labor cost to the cost of production is 15.26 per cent. The percentage of labor cost to the average selling price of steel rails, namely, selling price of rails, $37.50; labor, per ton, $4.09, is 10.9 per cent. The present rate of $17 per ton duty on steel rails is equal, under the present tariff, to an ad valorem duty of 85 per cent.

STEEL BEAMS OR STRUCTURAL IRON.

The principal difference in cost of making a ton of beams or structural steel and a ton of steel rails is about 30 per cent. additional in the cost of labor:

Cost of steel rails	$26.79
30 per cent. on $4.09 labor	1.23
Total	28.02

The value of steel beams imported into the United States in 1887 at foreign ports of shipment was 1.2 cents per pound, or $26.88 per ton, and the duty upon the same under the present tariff is 1½ cents per pound, or the equivalent of $28.88 per ton, or 102.75 per cent. ad valorem.

These estimates of cost in the United States represent net cost, without profit or allowance for interest on or depreciation of plant, or for fuel for steam power, or Spiegeleisen, or manganese, the cost of steam-power and Spiegeleisen adding very little to the cost per ton.

The cost of labor paid for the manufacture of a ton of steel beams, based upon the cost of production per ton, namely, labor $5.33, cost $28.02 is 19 per cent. The percentage labor received based on the selling price of a ton of steel beams, namely, $5.33 for labor and $66 per ton selling price, is 8.7 per cent.

The total output of steel rails, blooms, ingots, and beams at these works during the year 1887, was as follows:

	Tons of 2,240 pounds.
Steel rails	192,998
Blooms	220,235
Ingots	241,874
Steel beams (estimated)	30,000

The number of men employed in producing the above, classed as skilled labor, and the actual wages paid them per day, as awarded by the board of arbitration of the Knights of Labor and accepted by the managers for the year 1887, were as follows:

CONVERTING DEPARTMENT.

Seventy-six men working on turns of eight hours, requiring for twenty-four hours 228 men: Gross amount paid 76 men per turn, under contract, $230.02; average daily wages of each man in the converting department, $3.02.

BLOOMING DEPARTMENT.

Twenty-seven men working on turns of eight hours, requiring for twenty-four hours 81 men: Gross amount paid 27 men per turn, under contract, $76.02; average daily wages of each man, $2.81½.

RAIL DEPARTMENT.

Forty-two men working on turns of eight hours, requiring for the twenty-four hours 126 men: Gross amount paid 42 men per turn, under contract, $126.89; average daily wages of each man, $3.02.

FINISHING DEPARTMENT.

One hundred and nineteen men working on turns of twelve hours, requiring for the twenty-four hours 238 men: Gross amount paid 119 men for twelve hours, under contract, $230.01; average daily wages of each man, twelve hours, $1.93.

Total amount of skilled labor employed, 673 men. Average daily wages paid 673 men, $2.58.

The number of tons of steel rails produced per man at the Edgar Thomson Steel Works during the year 1887, the number of days employed not being taken into consideration, was 286.77 tons per man per annum.

As the total output of the entire force of men engaged in the Edgar Thomson Steel Works in 1887, in the converting, blooming, rail, and finishing departments, was: ingots, 241,874 tons; blooms, 220,235 tons, assumed to be represented by the steel-rail product of the mill, namely, 192,998 tons, and as the total output of the steel rails in the United States, according to the official statements, was 2,049,638 tons for the year 1887, this would, by inference, make the total number of skilled employés engaged in this industry in the United States, during the year 1887, 7,147 men.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us ascertain from these figures, if we can, what it costs the people of this country under the protectionists' theory and the existing tariff of to-day for steel rails alone, to equalize what they claim to be the difference between labor and material in England and labor and material in the United States, and then to ascertain, if we can, what proportion of this protection, claimed for the equalization of labor, labor receives. In producing a ton of steel rails, we started with the Bessemer pig-iron. The average price per ton of No. 1 Bessemer pig-iron during 1887 did not vary materially from $18 per ton in Pittsburgh, and the average price for the same quality of iron in England during the same period was $12.50 per ton, or a difference of $5.50 per ton.

As I have shown, the cost paid for the labor to produce a ton of steel rails at the Edgar Thomson Steel Works was $4.09, and allowing a difference of even 50 per cent. in labor between England and the United States, which is excessive, to protect the wage-worker in this country engaged in the steel-rail factory against the so-called pauper labor of England, it would require $2. These two items of the difference in cost of pig-iron and the difference in labor would equal $7.50; and a duty on steel rails, therefore, of $7.50 per ton would cover every claim upon which the theory of protection is based. But it costs something to get a ton of steel rails from Liverpool to our seacoast, and the average freight and insurance during the year 1887 from Liverpool to New York was about $2 per ton, which is the equivalent of so much more protection to the producer in this country, and this, if deducted from the $7.50, would still further reduce the necessary duty, even under their own theory, to $5.50 per ton. But let us be liberal with them; let us call the freight and insurance 50 cents per ton, and then a duty of $7 per ton, under their own claims and theories, would be ample. The present duty is $17 per ton, and, if I am correct in my figures, $10 per ton in excess of what is absolutely necessary, as they claim, not only to protect home labor, but to cover the difference in the cost of pig-iron.

I have shown that the cost to produce a ton of steel rails at the Edgar Thomson Steel Works in 1887 was $26.79; and surely a profit of $5 per ton on the number of tons of steel rails produced in the United States ought to satisfy the most avaricious manufacturer, and this would bring their selling price up to $31.79 per ton, just about the average price in the United States to-day, namely, $31.50 to $32 per ton at the mill, and $5 per ton profit on the output of steel rails for 1887 would be the equivalent of $10,248,190 of profits divided between ten or twelve establishments engaged in this industry in this country. But, sir, the average price at which steel rails sold for in the United States during the year 1887 was $37.12½ per ton, or $5.33 in excess of the price to-day, or $10,924,570.54 additional profit on the output of 1887, or an aggregate profit of $21,171,760 to be divided between ten or twelve steel-rail mills in the United States; and, sir, I am satisfied that this is not very much out of the way.

When we come to structural iron and steel beams, although the output is much less than steel rails, yet the figures are more astounding. A fire-proof building can not be erected in the country that structural iron and steel are not a material part of its cost. It is a large part of the cost in the railway and highway bridges of the country. Its use not only adds to the durability of all structures, but in our large cities lessens the chances of conflagrations and reduces the rates of insurance. I have shown that the cost of a ton of structural steel produced at the Edgar Thomson Steel Works during the year 1887 was about $28.02. But let us call it $33. You can not to-day buy a ton of steel beams for less than 3.3 cents per pound, or $66 per ton.

It is well known, sir, that the steel-beam industry of this country to-day is in a trust; and I have further shown that the average price of these steel beams imported into this country during the year 1887, upon which duties were levied, was 1.2 cents per pound, or $26.88 per ton, and that the duty upon them under the existing tariff is 1½ cents per pound, or $28.88 per ton, the duty exceeding the value of the imported article $2 per ton. The output of these steel beams at the Edgar Thomson Steel Works during the year 1887 averaged about 100 tons per day, or 30,000 tons per annum, and the difference between the cost of its production, $33 per ton, and $66 per ton, the selling price, leaves a margin of $33 per ton, or $1,000,000 profit on this one product alone; and I ask this House and the country whether or not the Committee on Ways and Means is justified in reducing the duty on steel rails from $17 per ton to $11 per ton, and on steel beams from 1½ cents per pound to six-tenths of 1 cent per pound, which leaves the duty on steel rails under the proposed bill equal to 55 per cent. ad valorem, in place of 85 per cent. ad valorem under the existing tariff, and on steel beams at 44½ per cent. ad valorem, in place of 102 per cent. under the present law?

Mulhall, in his History of Prices, in referring to wages, page 127, says that the percentage of wages paid of the value of manufactures produced in the United States since 1850 was: In 1850, 23.3 per cent.; in 1860, 21.2 per cent.; in 1870, 19 per cent., and in 1880, 17.8 per cent.; and that the British operatives earn, as a rule, in wages from 30 per cent. to 33 per cent. of the value of the manufactures they produce, while in the United States the workman gets only 17.8 per cent. On page 125 he states the advance in artisans' wages in England and France between the years 1840 and 1880 was as follows:

Occupation.	France.	England.
	Per cent.	Per cent.
Blacksmiths	45	64
Masons	55	70
Carpenters	55	60
Plumbers	57	70
Cotton spinners	42	48

COST OF BEAMS IN OTHER MILLS.

Mr. Chairman, I also have before me a pamphlet entitled "The Edgar Thomson Steel Works," dated 1887. It is an authentic pamphlet, furnishing certain data, which could have only come from the proprietors of the company. I will only quote an extract from the last page:

To keep the works running, on an average daily output of 1,400 tons of iron and manganese and 800 tons of rails, requires the handling, by loading and unloading, of 7,920 gross tons of material daily, namely, 2,300 tons of iron ore, 1,450 tons of coke, 670 tons of limestone, 1,400 tons of pig-metal, 1,000 tons of cinder, 800 tons of rails, 300 tons coal, sand, brick, molds, refractories, etc., a greater tonnage for these works alone than the entire cotton crop of the United States.

If, sir, the proprietors of the Edgar Thomson Steel Works were indicted before a United States grand jury for obtaining money under false pretenses, namely, as parties to the tariff act of 1883, if this admission would not convict them, then I am at loss to know what would. With an average outpnt daily of 1,400 tons of pig-iron and 800 tons of steel rails, their total consumption of coal is so insignificant as to be included in the items of "sand, brick, molds, refractories, etc.," at 300 tons total of these articles; and the number of tons of coke consumed, 1,450 tons, which, at the market price of to-day, figures $1.10, would make a total cost per day of $1,595, equal to a cost for fuel of only 72½ cents per ton on an output of 1,400 tons of pig-iron and 800 tons of steel rails, and in which estimate no allowance is made for natural gas.

Comparisons are always odious, but the latter part of this extract says:

A greater tonnage for these works alone than the entire cotton crop of the United States.

I will endeavor to make some approximate estimates and comparisons, which this pamphlet has failed to provide. One of the members of the Edgar Thomson Steel Works, Limited, admitted to me within the past month, within 200 feet of where I now stand, that a statement, made by myself in the fall of 1886, was correct, namely, that he drew out of the company as dividends in one year the sum of $1,500,000, the equivalent of $5,000 per day for three hundred days in the year, and this was but one member of the firm, with no statement of profits undivided. No intelligent business man will put the profits of this company at less than $5,000,000 in prosperous years, and we will allow them to employ 7,500 wage-workers.

Mr. Chairman, I wish distinctly to state here that I believe it to be the duty of every man to accumulate every dollar possible in fair and open competition with his fellow-men; and that the dollar so accumulated by his industry, energy, and economy is entitled to its due share of protection by the Government without discrimination as between the rich and poor. I care not how many millions of dollars any man may thus accumulate; but, sir, what I protest against is that while the great masses of the people are weighed down in their struggle for existence the favored few are permitted to rob them, under the pretense of protection to home industry and home labor. [Applause.]

COTTON.

Let us find out if we can what the cotton-planter of the South is doing:

The average price per pound for cotton in 1886, on the plantation, was 8½ cents on a bale of 500 pounds		$42.50
The most reliable estimates of cost of production gives labor 50 per cent. of the selling price of cotton on the plantation, namely, per bale	$21.25
(As against only 8.7 per cent. of the selling price of a ton of steel beams which labor receives at the Edgar Thomson Steel Works.)
Incidental cost to planter over labor cost	6.25
		27.50
Profit to planter per bale for interest on plantation and for supervision		15.00

This sum, $15 per bale, on 6,500,000 bales, yield of 1886, would be $97,500,000. The total plantation value of the cotton crop of 1886 was $269,989,812, equal to a gross return for each acre cultivated of $14.75.

The Commissioner of Agriculture, in his report of 1886, page 417, says:

The planters of the Southern States are selling the cheapest cotton in the world and buying all supplies at enormous prices, a practice with which only fertile lands, abundant crops, and persistent industry can save from bankruptcy.

PROTECTED AND UNPROTECTED INDUSTRIES.

According to the pamphlet referred to in connection with the Edgar Thomson Steel Works, they represent that their whole area of ground is 154 acres, and we will concede that they employ 7,500 wage-workers—which they do not—in their various industries. According to official returns of the Agricultural Department, there are now under cultivation in the production of cotton 18,000,000 acres, and a fair estimate of the number of adults employed in cultivating these fields, allowing four bales to an adult, is 1,625,000 wage-workers, and allowing each one to represent a family of five, it would give a total of 8,125,000 of our people dependent upon this industry for a support and a living. I have estimated the net profits of the entire cotton crop of 1886 at $97,500,000, which represents the interest on the cost of the 18,000,000 acres of land and the supervision and other contingent expenses and liabilities to the planter.

Assuming that my statement that the said company's net profits in the most prosperous years are $5,000,000, I would be pleased to have some mathematician work out for me the relative comparative profits realized by the protected industries of the Edgar Thomson Steel Works, employing 7,500 men, with an estimated capital of $20,000,000, occupying 154 acres of land and improvements on same, and the profits realized by the unprotected planters of the South, cultivating 18,000,000 acres of land, and employing 1,625,000 adults in this industry, supporting 8,125,000 of our population. Yet, sir, when the committee introduced this bill into the House and proposed to put the cotton-ties in which this cotton had to be baled for exportation on the free-list, the gentlemen on the other side of the House denounced it as a discrimination against home industries and the theory of protection.

GRAIN REGIONS OF THE NORTH.

And now, Mr. Chairman, when we turn from the cotton-fields of the South to the grain regions of the North, we find that the condition of the latter is no better than that of the former. I shall not attempt to go into any detailed discussion as to why this is so, but will simply call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], and submit to him an interrogatory, which he need not reply to until he has had an opportunity of seeing and conversing with the farmers of his own State, when, undoubtedly, he can do so more intelligently than now. According to the agricultural returns from the State of Michigan for the year 1885, we find the following cereals were produced:

Indian corn	bushels	30,706,000	Barley	bushels	1,200,000
Wheat	do	31,261,000	Buckwheat	do	423,000
Rye	do	250,000	Potatoes	do	12,880,000
Oats	do	21,780,000	Hay	tons	1,507,232

We also find that it required 4,690,304 acres to grow them; that the total value of the crops was $64,445,697; and that the gross yield per acre averaged $13.74; that under the census of 1880, the number of persons in that State engaged in farming was 240,319; and I would ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], after he has ascertained from the farmers of his State what they realized in the way of profits from these cereals, to compare their percentage with the profits of the protected industries of the Edgar Thomson Steel Works, as illustrated in connection with the cotton crop, and to give me his conclusions regarding the discrepancy.

NATURAL GAS.

And here, in immediate connection with this illustration, drawn from the Edgar Thomson Works, of the operations of a monopoly duty, swelling the profits of the manufacturer into most unreasonable, and even appalling figures, whilst adding nothing to the wages of labor, either common or skilled, and at the same time restricting the market of the farmer for his produce, though simply pillaging him upon his purchases of implements and apparel, I beg to call the attention of this House, and of the country, to the new and natural force, which is, in my opinion, destined to revolutionize, indeed, has already in large degree revolutionized some departments of American manufactures. I allude to natural gas. It is used at the Edgar Thomson Works; but it appears that the economy of its use has not as yet enabled the proprietors to reduce the price of their product, or to add anything to the wages paid.

It is, sir, the cheapest and most effective fuel ever discovered or invented by man. The world can not show its equal. The Almighty has placed it in apparently inexhaustible quantities in the very heart-center of our so-called protected industries; and the applications of which it is capable are innumerable and unlimited. It needs not to be mined; it transports itself; it may be piped anywhere; it requires almost no labor to handle it, and it leaves no residuum or débris to be removed. It is the ideal fuel, and so hastens, cheapens, and improves the quality of production as to place ultimately every manufacturer within reach of its incalculable advantages beyond any possible competition of foreign rivalry. What then do the manufacturers, so fortunately situated, require to enable them to "take the start of this majestic world and bear the palm alone?" Nothing, sir, but free raw material, open markets around the globe, no unnecessary restrictions here or there, cheap food, cheap raiment, and cheap blankets. Western Pennsylvania, Eastern Ohio, and large areas besides, which are soon to be supplied with this marvelous agent, would, if they understood their true interests, and in a brief time will, exchange the pitiful cry of more subsidies for the most thriving industries on earth, for a thundering demand for freedom of exchanges and cheap supplies.

ACCUMULATED WEALTH OF THE UNITED STATES.

The truth, sir, can not be too often stated, nor falsehood too often exposed. Gentlemen on the other side of the House have frequently referred to our immense strides in the accumulation of wealth between 1850 and 1880, and this I admit; but, sir, they claim that protection has done this in the building up of our manufacturing industries. I will take their own figures, upon which they base this claim. I submit the following official table, which tells its own story:

The wealth of the United States and its development from 1850 to 1880.

NOTES.—Gold being at a premium of 25 in 1870, the data for that year reported by the United States Census have been reduced to gold value.

"Agriculture" represents the value of the farms, farm implements and machinery, and of live-stock.

"Manufactures" represents the capital invested in manufactories.

"Railroads" represents the cost of constructing the railroads.

WM. F. SWITZLER,
Chief of Bureau.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, May 4, 1888.

The principal facts to be remembered in connection with the foregoing table, are:

First. That of the gross accumulations of wealth between 1850 and 1880, as shown by the census, namely, $36,506,219,722,

	Per cent.
Farm lands and personal property on same, gave	19.55
Capital invested in manufactures	6.18
Railroads	10.45
All other industries and suburban property	63.82
	100.00

Second. That the percentage of gain in manufactures in the decades named was as follows:

	Per cent.
Between 1850 and 1860, low tariff	89.39
Between 1860 and 1870, high tariff	67.80
Between 1870 and 1880, high tariff	64.66

Third. That the percentage of gain in farming lands and personal property on same was as follows:

	Per cent.
Between 1850 and 1860, low tariff	60.66
Between 1860 and 1870, high tariff	11.52
Between 1870 and 1880, high tariff	36.00

Fourth. That had the agricultural resources of the country between 1870 and 1880 maintained the same relative gain shown between 1850 and 1860, the latter period being under a tariff for revenue and the former under a protective tariff, the increase would have been $2,125,000,000 more, or within $665,272,606 of the total value of capital invested in manufactures in the United States in 1880.

Fifth. That the percentage of manufactures to the wealth of the country accumulated in thirty years is only 6.18 per cent.

I would also refer, here, to the fact that between 1860 and 1880, the number of immigrants that arrived in this country, was 5,093,333; the larger proportion of which, it is reasonable to suppose, engaged in agricultural pursuits.

It is also claimed that the balance of trade in our favor since 1873 is the result of the protective theory. From 1873 to June 30, 1887, our exports exceeded our imports by $1,611,973,748.

Our total exports for the year 1886 were $665,964,529, of which $484,954,595 were derived from agriculture; and the exports of cotton and cotton-seed oil, represented in the latter item, were $207,201,616, or nearly 50 per cent. of the agricultural products exported, and the ratio of agricultural products exported to the total exports was 72.8 per cent. If, sir, the same ratio is applicable to the balance in our favor between the years 1873 and 1887, it will show that of this balance the non-protected industries of this country—

The farmer and cotton-planter gave you 72.8, or	$1,173,516,888
Other industries, 27.2, or	438,456,860
Total	1,611,973,748

COAL MINING.

And now, Mr. Chairman, permit me to refer to another great industry in my State, coal-mining; an industry, sir, which protection does not protect, and then compare the wages paid in the Edgar Thomson Steel Works with the wages of the skilled miner.

Under the tariff of 1883 the following products manufactured in this country, if imported, are subject to the following equivalent ad valorem duties:

	Per cent.
Pig-iron	50.59
Iron railroad bars	65.26
Bar-iron	46.42
Steel rails	54.57
Railway fish-plates	92.75
Anchors	68.26
Steel beams, girders, etc	102.75

Twelve or fifteen miles from the Edgar Thomson Steel Works, on the Youghiogheny River, at Scott Haven, is located the mines of the Youghiogheny River Coal Company, a large coal-mining property, employing a large number of men. Coal from these mines has for years past been shipped to a greater or less extent to Havana, Cardenas, Matanzas, Sagua, and other West India ports, in competition with the coal produced by the so-called pauper labor of England. It is exported largely to Canada; it finds a market as far South via the ocean as Galveston, Tex., and as far North as Boston, Mass. I submit, sir, the names of and the actual wages earned by and paid to forty skilled miners working at these mines between April 1 and December 1, 1887, in comparison with the wages paid the skilled workmen in the Edgar Thomson Steel Works, the latter industry protected by duties averaging from 50 per cent. to 102 per cent. ad valorem, as follows:

Average earnings of each miner for period, $551.12.

The wages paid the foregoing skilled miners, selected as a fair representation of that class, were highest daily wages for eight hours' work, $5.17, and the lowest, $2.41. Average wages earned per day by them, $3.34 per man, and the average total amount earned by each man for the same period, was $551.12. Of the total number of all grades of labor, skilled and unskilled, including boys employed in and about the mines, namely, 757, the average wages earned per day per man was $1.96.

According to the official report of the Secretary of Internal Affairs of the State of Pennsylvania for the year 1884, the number of miners employed, wages paid, and tons of coal produced, was as follows:

	Miners.	Wages paid.	Coal.
			Tons.
Anthracite coal	83,316	$29,906,262	25,651,664
Bituminous coal	38,906	14,752,786	18,084,941
Total	122,222	44,659,048	43,736,605

From a practical experience of over one-third of a century in the coal mines of my State, both anthracite and bituminous, I am justified in stating that the wage-worker receives for his labor, directly and indirectly, from 70 per cent. to 85 per cent. of the selling price of the coal at the mines, as against the 8 per cent. that labor receives at the Edgar Thomson Steel Works, on the selling price of a ton of steel beams! The tariff does not protect the coal-miner, but robs him in just so far as it increases the cost of what he consumes by the imposition of duties the Government does not need to meet its requirements. And, Mr. Chairman, if time would permit, I could submit facts in connection with the prices of labor in the various industries of this country, not confined to my own State, but in the States of Iowa and Illinois, proving beyond any question, from the pay-rolls I could submit, that the average wages received by the wage-worker of the country outside of the protected industries show that protection does not benefit the wage-worker in the protected industries of the country.

WOOL.

I turn now, sir, to another vexed question—wool. When I call it vexed, I do not mean that it is not clear or easily solved upon correct principles, but only that our friend, the Bourbon, takes his stand upon wool and howls the more lugubriously, albeit more unreasonably, than on anything else, because he hopes thereby to delude the farming interest to his support. This bill puts wool on the free-list. It does so, I make bold to maintain, not only in the interest of the woolen manufacturer, but in that of sheep husbandry itself.

In referring to the woolen schedule and its effects upon the people of my own State, it is fair to infer that relatively it will have the same effect upon the people of the other States of the Union. I am compelled to refer to the census of 1880, and to resort to statistics, which are not as interesting to the general reader as the latest novel, but may be more instructive. According to the Agricultural Report of 1886, the number of sheep in Pennsylvania was 1,189,481; number of farms in the State (census of 1880) 213,542; average number of sheep to the farm, 5.5; pounds of wool clipped, 5,645,984; average weight of fleece, 4¾ pounds, which, at the estimated market price of to-day, 32 cents per pound, would give a total value of $1,806,714.88. Should the bill as reported by the Committee on Ways and Means become a law, the result upon the people of my State would be as follows: First, upon the farmers: The 213,542 farms produced, as stated above, in 1886, 5,645,984 pounds of wool, equal to 26 pounds of wool to the farm, and the duties upon foreign wools of the same quality, unwashed, under the present tariff of 10 cents per pound would amount to $564,598.40. If making wool free would cause the value to decline equal to the duty now imposed, which it would not, in my judgment, it would show a gross loss to the 213,542 farms of $2.60 each, or a total of $564,598. Per contra, the per capita consumption of domestic and imported woolen and worsted goods, according to the census of 1880, was $6.50, which multiplied by five, the estimated average number in a family, would be $32.50.

The proposed reduction in the woolen schedule is 29 per cent. from the present tariff, or 29 per cent. of the cost of the woolen goods consumed, which would be an equivalent saving of	$9.42
The proposed reduction of the duties on sugar, namely, $11,000,000 on the imports, and $1,000,000 reduction on the cost of home production, would be $12,000,000, or the equivalent of 20 cents per capita on a population of 60,000,000, or on a family of five	1.00
From which deduct the estimated loss to each family of	2.60
It would on these two items alone show a saving to every family in the State of Pennsylvania of	7.82

The profit and loss account of the bill under consideration to the people of the State, based on the population of 1880, namely, 4,282,891, would show a saving of $1.56 each, or $6,681,309.96 on these two items alone, and not taking into consideration the large savings that will accrue to them from the other proposed reductions under the bill. But, sir, let us examine the woolen schedule as proposed in the bill, from the standpoint of the Pennsylvania manufacturer of woolen and worsted goods, and which I claim is applicable to the woolen manufacturers of the whole country. According to the census of 1880 there were in the State of Pennsylvania manufacturing establishments of woolen goods as follows:

Number of mills or factories producing—
Woolen goods	324
Woolen hats	23
Worsted goods	28
Total	375
Total amount of capital invested	$24,537,743
Cost of material used for one year	29,497,945
Gross wages paid	7,046,273
Pounds of wool consumed, grown in the United States	28,556,077
Imported wools, pounds	5,005,271
Total consumption of wool, pounds	33,561,348
Total value of the manufactured articles produced for the year ending June 30, 1880	$44,132,590
Average number of hands employed:
Males over sixteen	10,790
Females above fifteen	9,477
Children	3,571
Total number of persons	23,838
Average wages paid per hand per year, $287.20.

It will be seen, Mr. Chairman, that while Pennsylvania consumed 33,561,348 pounds of wool in her mills in the year 1880, she only produced within the State, in 1886, 5,645,984 pounds, or 16¾ per cent. of the quantity required in 1880, and that there were employed in this industry 23,838 of her population. It is hardly necessary to discuss the importance of cheap raw material to such an industry. Wool, sir, is the purest raw material, if any commodity known to trade can be designated as raw material. That it is to a very great extent the product of the soil and climate where it is grown is unquestionable. Now, the entire fleece of no animal can be used, as a rule, in the manufacture of the same kinds and qualities of cloth. In other words, the wool grown on different parts of a sheep not only has a different value but is adapted to different purposes, and while the unwashed wools of South America lose from 66 per cent. to 70 per cent. of their weight in washing, those of Australia show a shrinkage of but from 52 to 60 per cent., and the English and the Irish wools show a shrinkage of but from 33 to 35 per cent. Under existing conditions the home manufacturer is unable to supply his mills with foreign wools, and the large importations of woolen goods, to which I will refer, is the result. To enable the manufacturer of this country to compete in his home market and to export a surplus abroad, he must be able to purchase his wool as favorably not only as to price but as to selection of qualities and kinds as does his foreign competitor.

The estimated total production of wool in the United States in 1886, according to the best authorities, was 300,000,000 pounds, and the estimated amount required, or its equivalent in woolen or worsted goods, to meet our necessities was 600,000,000 pounds. It will be seen, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that we did not produce in 1886 within 300,000,000 pounds of wool necessary for our home consumption. The importations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, were 23,000,000 pounds, which would leave an estimated deficit of 277,000,000 pounds. We can best ascertain how this deficit in our requirements is made up by referring to the importations of manufactured woolen and worsted goods for the year ending June 30, 1887, which amounted to $42,448,127.04, upon which there was collected by the Government a tax of $29,256,442.90. Not one pound of American wool was used in the manufacture of the woolen and worsted goods covered by these large importations, nor did an American wage-worker receive one dollar in connection with their manufacture; and it is a conceded fact to-day that of all our industries not one is so depressed as the woolen industry. If there can be an exception, it is that of the carpet manufacturers, which can be accounted for from the fact that the duties on the wools used by them are merely nominal, while on the higher grades they are practically prohibitory. The present duty of 10 cents per pound on unwashed wools is equivalent to 30 cents per pound on scoured wools.

No better illustration of the results of moderate duties or free raw material can be pointed to than the carpet industries of this country. Russian carpet wools, grown in Southern Russia, bordering on the Black Sea, practically scoured, are largely imported into the United States for the manufacture of carpets. A fair average price for these long combing wools at Black Sea ports is from 17 cents to 20 cents per pound, our currency. The duty upon same, under our existing tariff, is 5 cents per pound. Wool, scoured, suitable for the manufacture of men's wear, under the present tariff, pays 30 cents per pound. To-day, owing to this low duty on carpet wools and the superior genius of our American workmen, and notwithstanding the higher wages paid in the United States, I am credibly informed that if this 5 cents per pound is removed from Donskoi and other carpet wools we can compete with the world on carpets, and keep our home market.

But another important factor meets the manufacturer in the purchase of his wools: it is those artificial restrictions and resulting complications which deprive him of the mastery of his own business, and often makes the difference between complete success and total failure; and in this connection it may be well to inquire how the tariff of 1883 has affected the woolen and worsted industries of the country, particularly in connection with our home market, which the protectionists are so desirous of keeping for our home manufacturers. A statement of the cost of producing a pound of worsted yarns in this country and in England, under the existing tariff, taking the yarns as the basis of the cost of the manufactured article, may perhaps account for the present condition of our woolen and worsted industries and the large importations I have referred to; and I submit, sir, the following tables:

TABLE No. 1.—Cost of making 1 pound of 30s yarn out of English wool under the present tariff in the United States.

Wool, cost in London 11*d.* or in United States currency		$0.22
Commissions, freight, and charges, say		.02
Duty		.10

Add duty, 12 cents and 35 per cent. ad valorem		.26
Commission, freight, and charges		.04
Total		.70

This table shows that under the tariff of 1883 you can import 1 pound of 30s yarn, manufactured in England, for 2 cents per pound less than it can be made in the United States for, out of English wool imported into this country.

TABLE No. 2.—Cost of making 1 pound of 30s worsted yarn out of English wool, under the bill under consideration—wool free.

100 pounds of wool at 22 cents		$22.00
Commissions, freight, and charges		2.00
Total		24.00
80 pounds costing $24 = 30 cents pound, clean, or—
100 pounds costs		30.00
Deduct value of noil made, 10 pounds at 25 cents		2.50
Divide by top produced, 90 pounds		27.50

Spinning to 30s, including waste		.28
Cost of 1 pound yarn under present bill		.58
Market price of this yarn in England, 1*s.* 8*d.* or		.40
Add duties, 40 per cent. ad valorem		.16
Commissions, freight, and charges		.04
Total		.60

This table shows that under the proposed bill 1 pound of the same yarn made from English wool can be made in the United States for over 2 cents per pound less than it can be imported from England for, and the cost of production reduced 14 cents per pound less than it costs under the tariff of 1883.

TABLE No. 3.—Cost of making 1 pound of 36s fine worsted yarn out of Australian wool, under tariff of 1883.

Wool cost in London 11*d.*, or in United States currency		$0.22

Add duties, 18 cents and 35 per cent. ad valorem		0.39
Commissions, freight, and charges		0.04
Total		1.02

This table shows that it costs 15 cents per pound more under the tariff of 1883 to make 1 pound of fine worsted yarn in the United States, out of Australian wool, than what the same yarn can be made for in England and imported into the United States:

TABLE No. 4.—Cost of making 1 pound of 36s fine worsted yarn out of Australian wool, under the bill now before the House—wool free.

100 pounds of wool, at 22 cents		$22.00
Commissions, freight, and charges		2.00
Total		24.00
45 pounds, costing $24=53 cents per pound clean, or 100 pounds, costs		53.00
Deduct value of noils made, 18 pounds, at 45 cents		8.10

Market price of this yarn in England 2*s.* 5½*d.*, or		.59
Add duties, 40 per cent. ad valorem		.24
Total		.87

This table shows that under the proposed bill it will cost 3 cents per pound more to make 1 pound of yarn of the same quality and wool in the United States, than it can be imported from England for, but that the proposed bill reduces the cost of manufacture in the United States and the import price 15 cents per pound less than it now costs.

TABLE No. 5.—Cost of making 1 pound of 36s yarn out of Australian cross-breds under the present tariff.

Add duty 18 cents and 35 per cent. ad valorem		.37
Commissions, freight, and charges		.04

This table shows that it costs 3 cents per pound more under the tariff of 1883 to make 1 pound of this yarn in the United States out of Australian cross-bred wool than what the same yarn can be had for in England and imported to the United States.

TABLE No. 6.—Cost of making 1 pound of 36s yarn out of Australian cross-breds under the bill now before the House.

100 pounds of wool, at 28 cents	$28.00
Commissions, freight, and charges	2.00
Total	30.00
70 pounds, costing $30=43 cents per pound clean, or 100 pounds cost	43.00
Deduct value of noils made, 15 pounds, at 35 cents	5.25
Divide by top produced, 85 pounds	37.75
Equals 45 cents cost of top.
Take 1 pound of top costing	.45
Spinning to 36s, including waste	.35
Cost of 1 pound of yarn under proposed bill	.80
Market price of this yarn in England, 2s. 2d., or	.52
Add duties, 40 per cent. ad valorem	.21

This table shows that under the proposed bill it will cost 3 cents per pound more to make 1 pound of yarn of the same quality and wool in the United States than it can be imported from England for, but that the proposed bill reduces the cost of manufacture in the United States and the import price 16 cents per pound less than it now costs.

The aim of the majority of the committee has been, first, to readjust the duties upon woolen and worsted goods so as to enable the manufacturers not only to pay the same wages they are now paying but to cheapen goods, thus enabling them to command the home market, which they are largely deprived of, and to compete in the foreign one. Free raw wool and the duties proposed on the manufactures of wool will accomplish that object unless we are grievously mistaken. "But what," cries the politician, "of the flock and the flock-owner; will not the removal of the duty reduce the value of the fleece by just that amount?" No, sir; in my judgment, it will not. Even if it did, the average flock-owner, in common with all other husbandmen, would gain more than his loss in the reduced cost of the necessaries of life provided in this bill. But let us see the probable effect upon the value of wool, should wool pass to the free-list. Wool, like every other commodity, is governed by the law of supply and demand. We now produce in this country about three hundred millions of pounds less than we require, as is clearly shown by our consumption of imported woolens. Immediately wool is free, our manufacturers begin to draw upon the markets of the world for raw material to meet the American demand. The result is an advance in wool in foreign markets, and an advance abroad would advance the price here, tariff or no tariff. And this, sir, is no mere speculation; it is the known history of wool under the circumstances supposed. Albert Gallatin, as far back as 1832, stated the facts as follows, and precisely as any reasonably informed economist would state them to-day:

> The object of the wool-growers is that that market should be enlarged, but this can not be done effectually unless the domestic manufacture is firmly established; and for that purpose it is necessary that the raw material should be obtained on reasonable terms. To enhance its price by persevering in the existing exorbitant duties is not less inconsistent with sound policy than with justice. * * * The value of the hides and raw skins imported free of duty and consumed in the United States has for the last nine years exceeded $1,800,000 a year. It is evident that if in order to protect the raising of American cattle by giving an additional value to the hide a high duty had been laid on those imported, the domestic manufacture of leather in all its branches, instead of being in its present flourishing state, would have been most materially injured, and we should have been obliged either to import from Europe or to purchase at exorbitant prices all those articles which it now supplies at a moderate rate.
> The reduction in England of the duty on foreign wool to 4 cents a pound has caused a fall in price of the woolen goods without injuring the wool-grower at home. The free introduction of the species not raised here would, by encouraging the manufacture generally, ultimately enlarge the market for the domestic wool. It is the only way to introduce the manufacture of blankets and to reduce the price of home-made flannels and of the coarser species of cloth.

We produce in this country some wools equal to any in the world, but most of them are the coarser and cheaper grades, which are best adapted for the filling of the manufactured goods; while the long-fibered wools of England, America, and Australia are specially adapted for the warps. The wools of Texas, the Territories, and the Pacific Slope, where the sheep are largely pastured on the Government domain, or vast stretches of land comparatively valueless, are the lower grades. They can not be used without admixture of the higher grades, and were the manufacturer able to import these higher grades free, the circumstances would immediately enlarge the market, and raise the prices of domestic wools, a proposition not in the least doubtful, but borne out by our experience in the past.

OUR MERCHANT MARINE.

No people, Mr. Chairman, can be a great people who do not "go down to the sea in ships." With longer coast lines than any other nation in the world, producing a greater quantity of sea-borne tonnage, if we eliminate coal, we are yet dependent upon other nations for ships to do our carrying. But for the energy and enterprise of the English people during the past thirty years it would be impossible for us to find transportation for the commodities we produce in excess of our own requirements for exportation, and we are dependent upon the foreigner to-day for the marketing of our surplus, produced, by the way, almost exclusively by our unprotected industries. Transportation enters so largely into the cost of sea-borne merchandise as to average 10 per cent. of the value of the commodity transported; and while England and her colonies owned 58 per cent. of the sea-going tonnage of the world, according to the returns of 1883, the proportion of the United States was 4.5 per cent.; and it can hardly be denied that the profits of England from this source will far exceed the apparent difference between her exports and imports, as shown by her trade reports.

What has brought about this state of affairs? If we go back to 1860, we find that of our own exports and imports, American vessels carried 67 per cent. as against 33 per cent. in foreign bottoms, and that in 1882 we carried 16 per cent. as against 84 per cent. in foreign bottoms; and the Annual Report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, for 1887, page 59, says: "There was a decline in the proportion of value of commodities carried in our own vessels, from 75 per cent. in 1856, to 14 per cent. in 1887. Prior to the year 1860, the ships of the world were constructed of wood, and the great sea-carrying trade of the world was done by sailing vessels. The great pineries of the State of Maine and the white oak of the swamps of Florida could not be combined into a trust. American ingenuity and enterprise were free to exert themselves in any direction that led to prosperity. In 1860 the sea-borne tonnage of the world flying the American flag was about equal to that of England. We were the second if not the first maritime people in the world. At that date the relative population between England and the United States was, England 28,730,000, and the United States 31,440,000. According to the census of 1880, our population exceeded that of England by 15,760,000 and the relative sea-borne tonnage of the world was, England 58 per cent. and the United States 4.5 per cent."

But, Mr. Chairman, I think I hear some of my Republican friends ask, "What of the Alabama and the Shenandoah?" And they will tell you, sir, that the war of the rebellion exterminated the flag of our trade from the ocean. I will admit, sir, that the war of the rebellion was the cause of American ship-owners transferring their wooden ships to foreign flags; and, sir, if in these transfers they received a fair equivalent of their value at that time, from a pecuniary and commercial point of view, the country ought to have been a large gainer by the transaction. The wooden sailing ship was doomed in the year 1860, and the iron and steel ship, propelled by steam, was destined to supplant it upon economic grounds. The life of an iron ship and the cost of maintaining it, as compared with a wooden ship, its ability to carry 20 per cent. more cargo than a wooden ship of the same custom-house tonnage, the utilization of the compound engine, followed by the triplicate, and to-day the quadruple engine, bringing the consumption of fuel down to a minimum, and making steam absolutely cheaper as a propelling power than the winds, all combined to doom the wooden ship. The construction of the Suez Canal left it no longer optional as to what the ship of the future was to be. Can it be claimed, sir, that the people of this nation could not and would not have adjusted themselves to this changed condition of affairs, had not unwise legislation prevented them from doing so? What is a steel or iron ship, sir? What proportion of its cost consists of structural iron or steel beams? And how was it possible for the individual enterprise of this country to engage in the construction of iron ships when steel beams could be bought in England for $26.88 per ton, while the same beams cost in the United States 3.3 cents per pound, or $66 per ton? What has brought us to this low state? The policy of restriction. Protecting a few sickly ship-yards, we turn out an occasional vessel for the coastwise trade.

Under this policy, sir, cruel, barbarous, Bourbon, our magnificent foreign merchant marine has sunk into insignificance, and that seminary of dauntless sailors, that sure reserve of national defense, which once excited the admiration of Burke and of Chatham, has disappeared under the blight of your illiberal laws! We rank, in consequence, far down, not merely in our capacity to carry on the seas, but in our ability to fight on them. And because we have ceased to be a respectable naval power, we hear to-day the proposition to empty the Treasury upon land defenses, to take the place of the sea defenses you have blindly destroyed.

THE THEORY OF PROTECTION.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I will briefly state what I understand to be the theory of protection as advocated by the Republican party, and what that party claims to be the practical results of such a policy upon the country, as shown by the last thirty years, in its favor.

First. That a tariff for protection has given and will give the wage-workers working in the protected industries of the country higher wages, steadier work, and cheaper living.

Second. That the duties imposed on the agricultural products of the country protect the farmer, give him a home market at an enhanced price for his produce, and lessen the burdens he would otherwise be subject to.

Third. That the policy of protection has made the country rich and prosperous whenever high protective tariffs have prevailed, and that the reverse has been the case under moderate tariffs for revenue with incidental protection; and the protectionists point to the immense accumulations of wealth in the United States in the three decades between 1850 and 1880, namely, $7,135,780,228 in 1850, and $43,642,000,000 in 1880, or an increase of $36,506,219,722 in thirty years.

This is all that is claimed for protection.

If, sir, these propositions can be demonstrated to be true by practical results, I pledge myself to vote with the gentlemen on the other side of the House.

I claim that I have shown by the facts submitted that even the skilled wage-worker employed in the protected industries of the country receives no higher and often not as high wages as the wage-worker in the unprotected industries of the country. That while undue protection does not increase the wages of the wage-worker employed in the manufacturing industries of the country, it adds enormously to the cost of his living, as well as to that of the minister of the gospel, the doctor, the lawyer, the carpenter, the mason, the blacksmith, the widow and the orphan, and that large class of our people living upon limited incomes, those too old to work; and upon no class is its effects more disastrous than upon the agricultural classes; that the home-market theory to the farmer is a fallacy; that if the census of 1880 is reliable, and that 17,392,099 of our population were engaged in the five great classes of occupations, that of the agricultural products produced and consumed in the United States the relative consumption would be as follows:

		Per cent.
Agriculture	7,670,493, or	44.1
Professional and personal services	4,074,238, or	23.4
Trade and transportation	1,810,256, or	10.4
Mining and engineering	1,104,517, or	6.4
Manufacturing	2,732,595, or	15.7
Total	17,392,099	100.0

Which would show, sir, that the farmers and those dependent upon them were consumers to the extent of 44.1 per cent. of what they produced themselves, while three classes named consumed 40.2 per cent., leaving only 15.7 per cent. for those engaged in manufacturing.

That the protection theory has exterminated our shipping from the seas of the world; that the tables submitted, showing how the accumulated wealth of the United States has been made between the years 1850 and 1880, demonstrates that protection to home industries had little or nothing to do with it.

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

We are here, sir—we, the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, and of this House—in defense of American industry. We alone offer it protection; we seek alone the independence and aggrandizement of domestic labor by liberating it from unnatural restraints and allowing it the undisturbed possession and the complete enjoyment of its own earnings. The other side offer it—what? A monopolized market in which to buy the necessaries of life on the one hand, and on the other a labor market subject to the caprice of trusts! In short, they promise it the inestimable boon of working in the protected industries, where no share of the bounty alleged protection affords is allotted to labor, and of bearing in common with the rest of the people of the United States the terrible exactions of the protective system to enrich the privileged classes.

Will laboring men accept that generous tender and vote with the monopoly party under coercion of the employer? If they do, the hideous disaster, foreseen by Jefferson, as the natural result of the restrictive and subsidy policy, will rush down upon us, and the Government of the Union will pass into the hands of those who openly propose to pervert its powers and employ them to plunder the people for their own enrichment. I do not believe, sir, that American liberty is destined to be extinguished in this ignominious fashion. Surviving, as it has, armed assault, and every form of intrigue, it will not perish of the base corruption of subsidy, it will not be throttled by mere greeds or smothered by vile monopoly.

As to the spirit of this side of the House, the spirit in which we enter this struggle for the very life of the Constitution and the emancipation of American labor, I can not better express it than in the language of Andrew Jackson, the illustrious Democrat and beloved patriot, who, like our Presidential leader of to-day [applause], summoned the people to the reclamation of precious rights, slowly and almost imperceptibly filched away by the money power in a long course of years. "No," said the immortal hero:

> No; the ambition which leads me on, is an anxious desire and a fixed determination, to return to the people, unimpaired, the sacred trust they have confided to my charge—to heal the wounds of the Constitution and preserve it from further violation; to persuade my countrymen, so far as I may, that it is not in a splendid government, supported by powerful monopolies and aristocratical establishments, that they will find happiness, or their liberties protected, but in a plain system, void of pomp—protecting all, and granting favors to none—dispensing its blessings like the dews of heaven, unseen and unfelt, save in the freshness and beauty they contribute to produce. It is such a government that the genius of our people requires—such a one only under which our States may remain for ages to come, united, prosperous, and free.

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the following colloquy occurred:

Mr. BAYNE. Will my colleague [Mr. SCOTT] permit a question?

Mr. SCOTT. I will yield for a question, provided the gentleman does not attempt to answer it himself.

Mr. BAYNE. My colleague stated a few moments ago that wheat is produced on land in Dakota, where land is worth almost nothing per acre; and that it is also produced by the farmer on lands near Carnegie Brothers' mills, where land is worth $100 an acre. Now, if a plant such as that of Carnegie Brothers were placed out in the Territory of Dakota, will my colleague explain whether the rise in the value of the lands surrounding that plant, to $100 an acre, would not be an advantage to the people of Dakota and to the farmer who would produce wheat on the adjacent land?

Mr. SCOTT. I will answer my colleague very briefly. The value of any property is not in what it costs, but in what it will produce. I may put up a magnificent building upon which I may spend a million dollars, and yet I may have to go to the poor-house to live, so far as the income from that building is concerned. The question is, what is the value of that farm to enable the farmer to live and raise his crops?

Mr. BAYNE. Or to sell his land for other purposes and realize a profit.

Mr. SCOTT. Suppose his land was sold under an execution by the sheriff at a loss. But my colleague must excuse me. I would give way to him, but I can not. The House having kindly extended my time, I must not trespass upon its kindness.

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks, when one hour had expired,

Mr. MILLS said: I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] be permitted to conclude his remarks.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. SCOTT resumed and concluded his remarks as already given.

Mr. GEAR obtained the floor.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. The gentleman from Michigan will not object, I am sure, to yielding me the floor for one minute to announce that I will define my position on the subject of the tariff about half past 2 o'clock to-morrow afternoon. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. After the gentleman from Mississippi has had some of the experience I have had to-day he will discover that he may lose his place and not be able to define his position at all. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. GEAR. Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States, in his annual communication to Congress at the present session, disregarded all those questions which every other Chief Magistrate of the country has discussed, with the exception of a single one, and that was the question of the reduction of the tariff. In his aggressive attack upon all the manufacturing producing industries, and upon all the labor engaged in them, he has made the tariff by his message the underlying question of the day. It is now soon to go to the American people to determine by their votes whether they will stand by the Republican party, which for the past twenty-seven years has, by its wise legislation, inaugurated and carried forward to a high degree of prosperity the material interests of the country, and whether they will continue to support a policy by and under which we, as a nation, have become powerful and wealthy; a policy under which we, as a nation, are accumulating wealth and the means of supplying comforts as well as necessities more rapidly than any other people in the world, or whether they will reverse that policy by following the dogma of free trade.

Mr. Chairman, nearly three-fourths of all the voters of this country to-day came into the possession of the right of suffrage under the Morrill tariff law. This question has not been discussed at all, and I for one am glad to have it discussed now, so that it may be perfectly understood by the present generation of voters. It may be that the detail of statistics may be dry and uninteresting, yet they are of great importance and value to the people who are called to act upon the important issue of protection or free trade, which has been presented to them for their determination. It is, Mr. Chairman, to that class of men who are deeply interested in the pending tariff discussion that I propose chiefly to confine my remarks. I want to show to them that where a fairly protective policy has been the rule our country has been prosperous in a high degree, and that when the contrary policy of "free trade" or a "tariff for revenue" has been adopted that financial embarrassment and a marked depression in the price of labor and produce has immediately followed.

The student of history can not but have observed that the revolution, which resulted in the birth of the American Nation, had its origin not only in the intense desire which the people of the thirteen colonies had for political freedom, but also in the oppressive course of the British Government regarding the industries and traffic of our people.

Much of the sentiment in favor of the revolution was the result of an intense desire on the part of the people to free themselves from the commercial thraldom to which they had for many years been subjected. This struggle for political and commercial liberty on the part of the colonists was intense and prolonged for seven years, at the end of which a full acknowledgment of our rights was conceded by Great Britain. The termination of that struggle was an epoch in the world's history, marking as it did the birth of the American Nation—a nation founded on the will of the majority of the people and with the right to administer its own affairs as might best "promote the general welfare" of all.

The question of the constitutionality of levying imposts for the protection of American industries was settled by the First Congress, which had among its members many of those who had sat in the constitutional convention. Each and all of those great patriots are on record as to the constitutional right of the Government to enact what may be called a tariff for the protection of American manufactures and American labor.

The second act of the First Congress was enacted not only to raise revenue, but it was also declared in set terms that it was enacted for the purpose not only of raising revenue, but for the "encouragement and protection of manufactures." The duties levied under this act were all small, but it stimulated the industries of the new nation, and we at once began to manufacture to a great extent. While, as I have said, the duties levied under this act were not large, yet the protection theory as stated in the act itself gave confidence to our people and at once stimulated our infant industries, and American manufacturers attained a position on the commercial map of the world.

The question arises, what has our tariff policy been, and what has been its result? As I have shown that protection entered largely into the first tariff act; a degree of protection believed to be ample, as shown by the debates. This principle underlay all the legislation up to the adoption of the compromise act of 1833. Many of the duties, it is true, proved inadequate; others became so in the course of time. The wars which followed the French revolution gave much of the carrying trade to this country. This trade was rendered precarious by reason of the British orders in council and the decrees of Napoleon, each declaring paper blockades of the ports of our country. Protection was to some extent necessarily afforded while the embargo, which followed, compelled our people for awhile to rely upon the products of our own country. Nevertheless, with all these incidental aids to industry, the war of 1812 found us deplorably unprepared. The country, having no woolen manufactures, could not clothe its soldiers; not even a blanket could be made. An eminent writer, Dr. Bushnell, says:

> We had been free-traders, buying all such things because we could buy them cheaper, but we now discovered that we might better have been making the blankets at double the cost for fifty years.

The same was true of saltpeter, guns, cannons, swords, and iron and steel out of which to make them.

We began also to discover that the very insignificant article of salt coming short in the supply was made a dead necessity, and manufacturing it for ourselves at double the cost would have been a true advantage. We very soon discovered in the facts referred to the lowness of our organization and the very incomplete scope of our industrial equipment. In fact, Americans began to see the justice of the world's criticism that we did not amount to much, that we could not do anything for ourselves. A manufacturer of Birmingham, England, in view of the war then anticipated, prophesied that on its breaking out "the crops of the United States would be devoured with vermin, because there was not skill enough in America to manufacture a mouse-trap."

A fine opinion our British cousins had of us! And practical free trade seemed to justify their estimate. At the close of the war the country was fairly flooded with British goods, and although a small measure of protection was accorded by the tariff of 1816, yet, owing to the cheapness of labor across the ocean, the decay of the manufactures which had been encouraged into being was steady. Some disappeared entirely; especially was this true in regard to the manufacture of earthenware, glass, and red and white lead, while that of iron was barely kept alive.

Let me place on the stand in regard to the condition of the country at the time a Democratic witness, a gentleman standing high in the councils of his State and still higher in the councils of his party, when he became the nation's Chief Magistrate—James Buchanan, the last Democratic President before the present one. When he was in Congress in 1824 he said in regard to this period of depression:

> A few years ago the traveler going into the mountain districts of Pennsylvania would have found a great number of furnaces and forges in active operation. Their owners were not only prospering themselves, but they spread prosperity around them. These manufactures presented the best and surest market to the neighboring country for the products of agriculture. Thus they diffuse wealth among the people, money circulated freely, and the manufacturer, the operator, and the farmer were equally benefited. The present aspect of those districts present a melancholy contrast to that which I have just described. It is a just comment upon the policy of that country which will not afford a reasonable protection to its own domestic industries, and therefore give to foreigners a decided preference in its markets. Although that portion of Pennsylvania abounds with ore, with wood, and with water power, yet its manufactures generally sink into ruin and exist only as a standing monument of the false policy of the Government.
> The manufacturers and their laborers have both been thrown out of employment, and the neighboring farmer is without a market. Again have we so soon forgotten the lesson which experience taught us during the war with Great Britain? Our foreign supply was then cut off and we could not manufacture in sufficient quantities for the increasing domestic demand. The price of the article became extravagant, and both the Government and agriculturist were compelled to pay double the sum for which they might have purchased it had its manufacturer before that period been encouraged by proper protection policy.

If it be true that history repeats itself, are we not now liable, in the event of the Democratic doctrine of the Mills bill prevailing, to have a recurrence of the picture so graphically presented by Mr. Buchanan?

The general decay of our manufacturing interests caused great distress and much complaint, the result of which was the election of a Congress in favor of a greater degree of protection, and this Congress enacted the tariff of 1824, under which there was a general building up of the manufacturing interests.

Webster said of Hamilton's policy of protection that by it "we smote the rock of the national resources and abundant streams of revenue gushed forth." This was amply proven by the tariff act of 1824; so beneficial was its result that it was followed up by the tariff of 1828, which was still more protective in some features, but less so in others. The years that followed the tariff of 1824, up to 1833, were among the most prosperous the country has ever known. The industries of the country were prosperous, the national debt was paid off, and a surplus accumulated in the nation's Treasury. A large share of this surplus was loaned to the States, which loans exist to this day. Then, as now, a large portion of the Democratic party were clamorous for "free trade." The debates in Congress were lengthy and bitter, and their reading will well repay the student desirous of information on this question.

The contest culminated in the compromise act which went into effect July 1, 1833. This compromise made a gradual annual reduction of the duties on manufactured goods. Its evil results soon became manifest, for almost at once began another period of decadence of American manufactures. The accumulations of the country, which had grown to a large amount by years of protection, sought other channels of investment; speculation spread everywhere; lands far beyond existing settlements were platted in town lots and sold and resold at wondrous figures; shinplaster banks, under the fostering policy of General Jackson depositing the Government funds in them, sprung up all over the country, and everybody was getting rich on paper. Meanwhile the solid wealth of the country was slipping away and being rapidly drained to pay for imports. The immediate catastrophe came, and the financial crash of 1837 will ever remain as a monument to the improvidence of "free trade" or tariff for revenue.

Then followed the tariff of 1842 with the same result of reinvigorated industries, revived commerce, and renewed activities. Then came the tariff of 1846. The period during which this tariff was in operation is sometimes claimed by free-traders (or those who know least about it) as an era of remarkable prosperity and as evidencing the beneficent effects of free trade. The real facts in regard to this tariff are, first, that while the tariff of 1846 was not satisfactory to the protectionists it was by no manner a free-trade tariff, and second, while the period was one of great prosperity (due to causes altogether foreign to the tariff, as I shall show), it also caused that era of remarkable adversity second only in its disastrous sweep to that of 1837.

The tariff enacted by the Democratic Congress of 1846 was, as I have said, partly protection; that is, the protection idea was not abandoned. The Calhoun wing of the Democratic party wanted a tariff that utterly eliminated all idea of protection to American manufactures, a tariff that levied its duties solely on articles not raised in this country. The administration, for instance, of which Mr. Polk was the chief, wanted an import duty levied on tea and coffee. (In this respect the Democratic party of to-day, are in accord with that party of 1846). But sufficient Democrats under the leadership of John Wentworth, of Illinois (who is living to-day in better political faith, however), united with the protectionists to defeat this measure. The result was that in the bill protective duties (to a certain extent) was levied on many articles of manufacture. I have said the Calhounists wanted duties levied on articles not produced in this country. I shall except one thing, the Southern product sugar. This was protected efficiently by this so-called free tariff.

The vice of that tariff was in its adoption of the system of levying duties by percentage of value instead of an absolute amount of duty per pound. Thus, by the percentage rule, when goods were cheapest abroad, they would pay the least duties, and thus came into competition with our manufacturers when they could do them most harm. When this tariff was adopted English iron, then being a glut in the market, was put down to $40 per ton in New York. The American iron had been selling at $60 per ton. The duty now being lowest, the American who could not compete was driven to the wall, and forge after forge was closed, until the amount of home production was largely reduced and the industry became unprofitable.

Some say, "Well, well, we got the iron cheaper." This was true until the American producers were driven out of the market, when the price was put up to $80 per ton. If the duty now collected had been made specific, so that no matter what the value of the goods it would have paid the same duty, the American industry could have survived and become profitable. But dependent on these prices, consequently the duties fluctuated, and on the fluctuation of the foreign market and such combination as the foreign producers could readily enter into, there was little or no encouragement to investors of capital in manufactures.

Again, when the tariff of 1846 was enacted, Ireland was suffering from famine and Europe generally from shortness of crops. There was consequently a great demand for American breadstuff. This great demand had hardly fallen to a normal condition when the discovery of gold in California (which had accrued to us under the war with Mexico) started a monetary revolution, some of the effects of which yet endure. The influx of $4,000,000 worth of bullion per month gave an impetus to business and enabled us to go on buying the products of foreign looms and forges, which the free-traders said our goods and products would pay for. We paid the manufacturers of Europe with our coin and bullion in place of produce.

Sir, in all those years the balance of trade was against the United States. From the enactment of the tariff of 1846 up the 1861 we exported to settle the balance of trade two hundred and seventy millions of coin and bullion. And our Democratic friends call that era a prosperous one.

Next, as if still further to help out the free-traders, came the Crimean war, which gave American grain the monopoly of the European markets and run up prices of wheat, corn, and farm products to an unparalleled figure. But all these adventitious aids only served to postpone the evil day.

In 1857 the tariff was again reduced. Six months later came the crash. Nearly all the banks then in existence suspended specie payment and most of them failed entirely and values were wiped out. And on whom did the loss fall mainly? Mr. Chairman, on the labor of the country. Produce went to low prices and general distress prevailed.

Many of you who hear me will remember the embarrassment and suffering that attended that great financial earthquake. But I have not time to dwell upon it. Suffice it to say that the depression it brought about continued until some time after the breaking out of the civil war. When that deplorable event occurred much had to be procured abroad which now, under a more provident system, is produced at home.

In 1861 a Republican Congress enacted what is known as the "Morrill" tariff, which in the main has been adhered to up to this time. Under this tariff our manufactures have grown and developed until now, and instead of being compelled to go abroad for some of the most necessary things, we are supplying the world with them to a large extent. Under this tariff we have, as a nation, developed in a wonderful degree, and are increasing in wealth at a rate per annum far surpassing that of any other nation in the world. Yet we find, after a quarter of a century's prosperity under the workings of the "Morrill" tariff, a large proportion of the Democratic party clamoring for "free trade" or a "tariff for revenue only." Disregarding entirely the lessons of our past history, they are trying to educate the people to the idea that under "free trade" or "revenue tariff" the people will prosper in a still higher degree. Let me call your attention to the folly of this argument. They claim that the benefits of protection are reaped mainly, if not wholly, by the employers. I have yet to see the free-trader who has attempted to refute the argument of Mr. Dickinson, the noted statistician, on this question. In a recent article he says:

Most telling illustration, that of a great cotton-mill with a capital of $1,000,000 producing 17,000,000 yards of sheeting each year at 6½ cents per yard, and employing 950 operatives. The same work would require 95,000 men with the old-fashioned spinning-wheels and hand-looms, and the product would be a coarse and inferior article, to be had only by the few who could afford to pay the high price necessary to be charged for it. But of the whole cost of production in this mill $940,000 is paid in wages, $15,000 represent taxes, and $145,000 include cost of supplies, transportation, salaries, and, finally, profits, which a liberal calculation fixes at $60,000 a year.

This argument, in my mind, settles the question in a nut-shell. As it is with the wages of making cotton cloth, so it is in the manufacture of all raw materials. The labor of the country is paid the largest amount of money in the shape of wages and (that the rule, almost without exception) to the manufacturer the small profit. But let us consult British authority on this subject. In 1880, the London Times, reviewing speeches made at a banquet of the free-trade Cobden Club, held July 10, said:

The United States have seen not the error of their ways. It is doubtful if they are in the road for seeing them. England has gone on for the last fourteen years or so repeating that America could not long put off adopting free trade. There is not, our Philadelphia correspondent declares, the slightest sign of the fulfilment of this long-standing prophecy. The United States do not approach the question from the same standpoint of view as ourselves. The object of their statesmen is not to secure the large amount of wealth for the country generally, but to keep up by whatever means the "standard of comfort among the laboring classes."

Long may it be, Mr. Chairman, the object of the American statesmen "to keep up by whatever means the standard of comfort among the laboring classes." When this is lost sight of it will be a bad day for the American people. It would appear from the English authority quoted, that the guiding object of our statesmen of the protection school was to make the condition of our country the very reverse, we might say, of that melancholy one bemoaned by Goldsmith, that poet of the people, when he wrote:

Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates and men decay.

And in view of the doctrine advanced by the London Times, free-traders may ponder the following from the same poet:

Ye friends to truth, ye statesmen who sway,
The rich man's joys increase, the poor's decay;
'Tis yours to judge how wide the limits stand
Between the splendid and the happy land.

Let us consult another English authority. The general manager of the Staffordshire Iron Works, belonging to the Earl of Dudley a Mr. Casson, when visiting this country a few years ago, said to a representative of the Pittsburgh Gazette:

I find that in many respects you have the advantage of us as regards mechanical appliances, while in others we are greatly ahead of your manufacturers. We can manufacture iron at just one-half the cost, so far as the price of labor is concerned. I find that your rate of wages is about exactly double what we have to pay.

The whole burden of the English song is the high wages paid to the American laborer, and, as I have shown, they are urgent that we reduce th price of our labor to a level with theirs. From their standpoint, this would bring prosperity.

Mr. Chairman, if by any act of ours we reduce the price of American labor to a level with English labor, I imagine that, loud as are the complaints of our labor to-day, we shall hear a still louder wail from every hamlet in the land in denunciation of this measure.

But the testimony of the Clark Thread Company, running houses at Paisley, Scotland, and Newark, N. J., may be called conclusive on this point. In a letter written in 1882 that company furnishes a statement of the wages it paid. I will condense it. What are called spoolers, reeders, and cop-winders got at Paisley $3.60 per week; at Newark, $8. Twisters were paid at Paisley $2.35; at Newark, $5.50. Slippers got at Paisley $1.65; at Newark, $3; and cleaners at Paisley, $1.50; at Newark, $2.50. So much for women's wages. What did the men get? At Paisley, carpenters and mechanics got $7.25; dyers, $7; bleachers, $6.50; firemen, $6 per week. At Newark the carpenters got $17; mechanics, $18; dyers, $15; bleachers, $13.50, and firemen, $12.50 per week.

It is proper to say at Paisley the hands worked only fifty-five hours in a week; at Newark, fifty-nine; a difference of four hours in favor of Paisley. Nevertheless, making full allowance for the shorter time, the wages at Newark were better than those paid at Paisley by from 16½ to 113 per cent. in the case of the women, and by from 101 to 138 per cent. in the case of the men, or an average throughout of just double.

To like effect is the testimony of the agents of the Grafton (Mass.) Linen Thread Mills, who have mills also at Johnston, Scotland. They say that the operators at the former place get twice the wages they get in Scotland, while the cost of living is not 50 per cent. higher. But there is yet better evidence on this head from official statistics. Carroll D. Wright, now head of the national Labor Bureau, was, prior to his appointment to his present position, for many years chief of the bureau of labor statistics for Massachusetts, and as such published many valuable reports concerning the industrial classes.

One of the most valuable of these appeared in 1883; it was a history of wages and prices, and covered the period from 1752 to 1883, inclusive, and embraced also a comparison with the wages paid in Great Britain. I find by this table that from 1880 to 1883 was the period of highest wages for the following occupations: Agricultural laborers, $1.37 per day, or 62 cents more than the average for the 130 years; blacksmiths, $2.28, or 85 cents more than the average; bookbinders, $1.91, or 48 cents more than the average; butchers, $2.03 over the average; carpenters, $2.42, $1.08 over the average; carriage-makers, $2.40, 51 cents over the average; clock-makers, $2.30, 76 cents over the average; cotton-mill operators, $1.47 over the average; laborers, $1.48, 71 cents over the average; machinists, $2.49, 52 cents over the average; masons, $2.79, $1.29 above; metal-workers, $2.16, 62 cents above; nail-makers, $1.84, 66 cents above; painters, $2.32, 74 cents above the average; paper-mill operators, $1.71, 58 cents above the average; printers, $2.18, $1.61 above; shoemakers, $1.87, 57 cents above; stone-quarrymen and cutters, $2.33, 63 cents above; tanners and curriers, $2.09, 61 cents above; woolen-goods makers, $2.28, 82 cents above; woolen-mill operators, $1.31, 24 cents above.

From this same work I learn that the average increase of wages from 1860 to 1863 was 28.36 per cent., while the increase in the cost of groceries was only 10 per cent., and in fuel less than 10 per cent., while the enhanced cost of provisions on the other hand was 35.30. The same work makes a comparison of the wages paid in Great Britain and Massachusetts between 1860 and 1883. From this I gather in ninety industries the average wages in Massachusetts was 75.40 per cent. higher than in Great Britain. Comparing manufacturing and mechanical industries the difference in favor of Massachusetts was 73.02 per cent.

Mr. Wright sums up his conclusion thus:

We find that on any basis of yearly expenditure the prices of articles entering into the cost of living were, to the average, 17.29 per cent. higher in Massachusetts in 1883 than in Great Britain; that in this figure 11.49 per cent. was due to higher rents in Massachusetts, leaving 5.80 per cent. as indicative of the higher cost of living in Massachusetts, as compared with Great Britain, as regards the remaining elements of expense; this with from 75 to 100 per cent. greater wages.

Can any fair-minded man want any stronger evidence that the benefits of protection accrue mainly not to the employer, but to the employé? Where else in the world is labor in the aggregate as well paid, or enjoys in the same degree what we deem the comforts of life, and, I might add, the luxuries, as in the United States under the protective policy of the Republican party as maintained for the last quarter of a century?

Again, it is a common argument with free-traders that the duty levied on any imported article raises by so much the price of that article; so if it were taken off the same could be afforded for much less. It is true that a duty levied on sugar, tea, coffee, spices, and many articles not the growth of this country increases the price of the article by the amount of the duty; and it is also true that a tariff, when first levied, before the manufacture of the article is in successful operation, does increase the cost to the consumer, but the experience of the past twenty-five years has demonstrated the fact that when our manufactures became well established the duty operated against the foreign manufacturer alone.

It has been well said that—

No economical law is more capable of demonstration than this, that manufactured articles are invariably cheapened in the cost of production and in the prices at which they are afforded to consumers as the home demand for them enlarges.

Take nails, worth in 1840, $6; in 1861, $3.50; and in 1883, $2.40; and in 1888 less than $2 per hundred pounds. Their average value for the past eight years, or since gold and silver became of equal value, that is, from 1878 to 1887, was $45.45 per ton, while the average price of nails for the eight years prior to 1861 was $62.08 per ton, the figures ranging from $80.50 per ton in 1854 to $48 in 1860. Taking pig-iron for the same length of time, we find the average from $36.87½ in 1854 to $22.25 in 1858, while under protection the average was ranging from $28.50 in 1880 to $17.875 in 1885. The price of bar-iron averaged for the same period $71.83, ranging from $91.33 to $58.75, while in the latter period it averaged $51.21, the highest being $61.41 and the lowest $39.37 per ton, during the protection period being lower than the lowest under free trade. In woolen goods the prices have fallen from 30 to 60 per cent. lower than they were 1860. From 1820 to 1850 common salt ranged in price from $8 down to 75 cents per bushel. I refer my distinguished friends on the other side to the speeches of Thomas H. Benton on this question. Nearly all the salt during those years was imported, only a few thousand barrels being made annually in West Virginia and a small amount in New York.

Again, according to the statements of our free-trade friends, salt should be sold at a higher rate by the amount of duty imposed on it. Under the protection given the salt manufacturers the production of the salt-works in New York and Michigan has developed to an enormous degree, nearly one hundred salt-works being in operation. The tariff has been reduced time and again, and the amount of duty on this is now only 22½ cents per barrel of 5 bushels, or 4½ cents per bushel, and the result is that the price of salt has steadily declined, being quoted at 61 cents at the works and 85 cents in Chicago, and it is retailed all over the West at $1.20 to $2 per barrel, according to the transportation charges. Are not our free-trade friends in error in claiming that the tariff increases the cost of salt to the consumers?

If it be true, as claimed by the free-traders, that the consumer pays the tariff duty, why is it that muslin, prints, and many classes of cotton textile goods, on which the tariff is from 2½ to 4½ cents per yard, are not worth any more in this country than in England? Yet, as a matter of fact, a dollar in any country store in Iowa, 1,000 miles from a cotton-mill, will buy as many yards of muslin or prints as in any store in England—a statement which can be verified by the reports of the English papers. Furthermore, by the superior quality of our cotton fabrics we are successfully competing with England for the Japan and Chinese markets for this class of goods.

If it be true that the tariff increases the cost of manufactures, why do we find the English papers full of advertisements of American stoves, organs, pianos, fixed ammunition, cutlery, axes, hoes, and other agricultural implements, on all of which there is a tariff, which are just as cheap and much better in style and quality than those made abroad? It is said that "an Englishman's house is his castle." Notwithstanding the so-called burden of protection Americans seem to be in a fair way to storm the castle.

Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested the other day when I heared the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. MILLS] speaking in regard to the great burden in the shape of a tax which was placed on "the poor man's blanket." He talked so pathetically in regard to this subject that I wondered whether what he said could be true. I recollected that we had out in my State a woolen mill or two, and I concluded to send out to that State for a pair of blankets. I have those blankets here, and I ask that two of these page-boys take those blankets out into the area in front of the Clerk's desk that members may see them. [The blankets were exhibited in accordance with Mr. GEAR'S request.] Sir, there is a pair of blankets as good as can be made in England or anywhere in America. They weigh 5 pounds and 2 ounces, and it required for their manufacture 11 pounds of wool. They are made of Iowa wool in an Iowa mill by Iowa employés. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from Texas spoke of $2.50 as the cost in one case and $2.70 as the cost in another case of a pair of 5-pound blankets; and remember, each of these blankets is just 5 pounds. The gentleman from Texas said that the duty on those blankets would be $1.90 per pair, and that this was the amount which the manufacturer put in his pocket. Now, sir, to manufacture this pair of blankets which the House has before it took 11 pounds of wool, at 27 cents a pound.

Mr. STRUBLE. Where were they made?

Mr. GEAR. At Bonaparte, Iowa, in my district. Now, 11 pounds of wool at 27 cents per pound would be $2.97; to that add 61 cents, which the gentleman from Texas says is the cost of making, and the amount will be $3.58; add to that the duty on blankets, $1.90, and the amount is $5.48. Now, if it be true that the amount of the tariff duty is added directly to the cost of the American blanket, the cost of these blankets should be $5.48; and, allowing the retailer a fair profit, they should sell at $6 per pair. But, sir, I have a certificate from the manufacturer certifying as to the quality and price. The wholesale price is $4.50; and the retail price at any store in Iowa, the cash discount paying the freight, is $5 per pair. [Applause.]

I want to call attention to the fact that my friend from Texas in his illustration does not give the price at which the American blankets he talked about are sold—not at all; and I want to call attention also to the fact that the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, when they revise the tariff, and, as they say, take the tax off "the poor man's blanket," do not take off one penny in favor of the poor man. They impose an ad valorem tax on all kinds of blankets, and "the poor man's blanket" pays the same ratio of taxation that the rich man's blanket does. Yet our Democratic friends are posing around this country as the sole and only friends of the poor man.

The manufacturer of those blankets, who lives in my district, is a gentleman who does not vote the Republican ticket; he is a good, old-fashioned Democrat.

Mr. WARNER. But he will vote the Republican ticket hereafter.

Mr. GEAR. I do not know, but one of the most prominent Democrats in my town told me this morning that if the Mills bill should pass no Representative in Congress from the State of Iowa who voted for it could come back to Congress. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] I ask the Clerk to read the letter and accompanying bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Office of Isaiah Meek, successor to Meek Bros., proprietor of Bonaparte Woolen and Flouring Mills, and dealer in wool and grain.]

BONAPARTE, IOWA, May 4, 1888.

This is to certify that I sold to JOHN H. GEAR blankets as per bill attached; that they are all wool; that at present the wholesale price is 90 cents per pound and retail price $1.

ISAIAH MEEK.

BONAPARTE, IOWA, May 4, 1888.

Mr. JOHN H. GEAR, Washington, D. C., bought of Isaiah Meek, successor to Meek Bros., proprietor Bonaparte Woolen and Flouring Mills:

One pair blankets, 5 pounds, $1 ..... $5.00

Received payment. $5.00

ISAIAH MEEK.

Mr. GEAR. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of this House to the fact that the passage of the pending tariff bill will not only seriously injure the wool-grower of my State, but it will also close up the mill where that blanket was made, and put out of employment the labor engaged in its manufacture.

In controverting the theory that manufactures are made higher to the consumer by protection, let me take the article of cutlery.

Professor Wayland's Political Economy, published in 1842, page 140, contains this proposition:

We pay a heavy duty on cutlery in this country, while not a thousandth part of the cutlery used is made here. It would be vastly cheaper to pay bounty sufficient to raise all the cutlery made in this country to its present price, and it would be for aught I suggest as good for the cutler.

But had this sage counsel, intended to discourage the infant manufacturers, been followed we would not have the cheap cutlery we have to-day, while we would have been dependent on foreigners for most we use instead of now obtaining our supply almost wholly from American workshops; and, furthermore, those American workshops would not now be flooding the markets of the world with their products and crowding those of Britain at the very threshold of her factories.

But, broadening our view, let me make some comparisons between protective and free-trade periods. In 1860 our manufactures aggregated only $855,000,000 on an invested capital of $1,001,000,000. Employment was given to 1,311,246 persons, to whom was paid in wages $378,878,996, or an average of $290 each per year. The product was $1,972,755,642, and in 1880, 2,752,595 operators were paid $947,953,795, or an average of $346 per year. In the mean time the cost of living had not materially changed. I take a table from the report of the Director of the Mint, 1881, giving prices in 1860 and 1880:

Flour, superfine, per barrel	$5.19	$4.13
Pork, mess, per barrel	18.09	13.23
Beef, per barrel	5.19	11.12
Ham, per pound	.096	.084
Lard, per pound	.117	.079
Sugar, per pound	.08½	.07
Sugar, loaf, per pound	.098	.08 5/8
Tallow	.10	.06½
Molasses, New Orleans, per gallon	.46½	.37
Standard sheeting, 36 inches, per yard	.071	.07 7/8
Standard sheeting, 23 inches, per yard	.07	.05½

All will remember that in 1880 there was a strong tendency to high prices, by reason of the general prosperity of the country; in 1860, on the other hand, as older people will recollect, there was a general depression in prices, following the disastrous panic of 1857. Consequently the cost of living ought to have been lower in 1860 than in 1880. It will be observed the difference, if any, was rather in favor of the latter year. In 1860 our steel production was 11,838 tons; in 1880 it was 1,397,015 tons. Copper in 1860 was produced to the amount of $2,288,182; in 1880 it was $8,849,961. A fall in price attended the increased production ranging from 6½ to 8 cents.

In Iowa the augmentation from 1860 to 1880 in manufacturers was as follows: Number of establishments, from 1,939 to 6,921, or over 250 per cent.; in capital invested, from $7,347,886, to $33,987,886, or more than 350 per cent.; in hands employed, from 6,307 to 25,382, or about 350 per cent.; in wages paid, from $1,922,000 to $9,725,962, or about 400 per cent. The average pay increased from $304.87 to $343.65 per annum. The increase in value of products, that is, after deducting value of materials employed, was from $5,359,066 to $22,741,615, or almost 300 per cent. The aggregate value of products was $71,045,926. In the former years 36 per cent. of the product went into wages; in the latter year, 43.

So well did the tariff of 1861 do its work that in a dozen years the steel manufacture of Pittsburgh alone amounted to more than the entire importation of steel, while the remainder of the country manufactured almost as much as was imported (and these figures do not include Bessemer and steel-headed nails). This product was furnished to consumers at from 2 to 3 cents a pound less than it was ever furnished for prior to the establishment of the American industry, even though the duty on the foreign article was now three times as great as under former tariffs, and to-day American manufacturers of steel have taken the contract in successful competition with those of Great Britain for the steel for our new armored cruisers and steel guns of caliber equal to those of any European power.

When the first Bessemer-steel works were undertaken in America the price of steel rails purchased for American railroads and delivered at English ports, when the present duty was imposed, was $155 a ton in gold. Now American mills furnish them at $31.50 to $33.50 per ton, giving the English manufacturer not over $15.50 per ton after paying the duty to pay freight, if any, and all the cost of raw material and labor. Does anybody believe that without American competition their rails would have been furnished them for twice the money?

I quote from a recent number of the Industrial World:

How important it was to the steel-rail industries of the country that neither the Randall nor the Morrison tariff-reduction bill was enacted into a law may be seen from the fact that even with the present impost duty of $17 per ton on steel rails large importations of English-made rails are coming to this country. The Alabama and Great Southern Railway, 295 miles long, is to be relaid with foreign-made rails imported via New Orleans. Home-made rails can be obtained at Eastern mills for, say, $31.50 per ton, and at Western mills at $33.50 per ton. So that to compete with products here the foreign rails can yield the manufacturer only $15.50 per ton, according to the point in this country at which they are delivered, and assuming they may come across the ocean as ballast.

But were manufactures alone thus benefited? By no means. During the period from 1860 to 1880 the production of Indian corn increased over 100 per cent., that of wheat more than 150 per cent., the total of cereals 120 per cent., and the wool product 260 per cent. During this time the population increased only about 50 per cent., and manufactures, as before indicated, showed an increase of about 125 per cent., so that agriculture got its full share of the enhanced prosperity by protection. The truth is that protection duties encouraged the production of these goods at home, so that we have the products of both home and foreign markets to select from, instead of being compelled, as otherwise, to depend on the foreign market in which to make our purchases.

However beneficial free trade may appear to be on paper, I have yet to find the first country that has prospered under it. I am aware that the example of Great Britain may be cited; that country has done better than any other under the system. But there the mutterings of discontent are gathering in volume until they can be heard across the ocean. What is known as the "fair-trade" party, an organization growing in the number of its adherents rapidly, is hostile to free trade; while Ireland has certainly not been benefited by it. But whether successful or not, what kind of preparation for free trade was there in England? Its manufactures were built up under a comprehensive system of protection, combined with vigorous repression, as in the case of Ireland and in the American colonies, where needed for the furtherance of the object.

An early act of the English Parliament specially offered all cloth-workers of other lands safety and protection carrying into England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales. In after years Ireland received less consideration, or rather more of it, but of a less favorable kind. An act of Edward III made it a felony to export wool until otherwise ordered by the king and council. Another act prohibited everybody not of the royal family wearing any cloth thereafter brought into what is now the United Kingdom, unless the same was made therein. And merchants, by another act, were prohibited from bringing cloths into England. Another act of the same reign prohibited all merchants from carrying any manner of wools, leather, wolfels (skins with wool on), or lead to the seacoast for shipment, on pain of penalty and loss of member and forfeiture of all property. Although this was repealed in the same reign, the exporting of wools and wolfels, etc., was prohibited by later enactments. Another act prohibited for a time bringing any card for wool into England or Wales. The preamble to this bill giving the reason for its passage, in the quaint style of the time, reads thus:

Whereas many thousands of woolen card-makers and card wire-drawers of London, Bristol, Gloucester, Norwich, Coventry, and of many other of His Highness' cities and towns, have heretofore lived and well maintained themselves, their wives, families, and children by the benefit and use of their and faculty of card-making and drawing of wire within this realm; and now, of late time, by reason of the common bringing in of foreign cards for wool out of France and other foreign ports, the said card-makers and card wire-drawers have been so much impoverished that scant the twentieth person that has heretofore lived by the said trades is now maintained and get work thereby.

Free trade worked then about as it does now, it appears.

Parliament went at one time so far in its determination to uphold the woolen manufacturers and discourage the importations of foregn linen, as to require the dead to be buried in nothing but woolen clothing, and in a coffin lined with no other material.

An act towards the close of the seventeenth century, having in view the enhancement of England's interests, prohibited the exportation of wool or wolfels, or woolen manufactures, from Ireland to any place but England; and the same act forbade the woolen manufacturers of the English plantations in America, as the colonies were called, from being exported out of the plantation where produced to any other plantation, or to any other place whatsoever; that is, they might be used where produced, but nowhere else, lest they should conflict with English manufacturers.

Various acts of Parliament were passed especially aimed to improve the business of England at the expense of the colonies. No sugars, cotton, wool, indigo, etc., grown in the English colonies, were allowed to be exported except to England. Ships in the colonies were required to bring them to England. Nothing grown or manufactured on the continent of Europe could be sent to the colonies but by way of and in English ships. This was afterward modified so as to allow "servants, horses, and victuals," as the act puts it, to be imported from Scotland or Ireland; salt for the fisheries, and wines from the Azores. No hats or felts were allowed to be transported from any of the colonies to any other. In 1750 Parliament forbade the erection in America of any mill for slitting iron, or plating forge to work with a tilt-hammer, or furnace for making steel, and British statesmen are at the same business to-day—in another way, however.

I am aware that it may be said that these were the enactments of hardier ages. This is true; but they built up British manufactures, and their enduring effects enable the Island nation to sustain as gallantly as she does the losing cause of free trade.

With our soil and our resources there is no excuse for our not producing everything which can in reason be produced in our immense territory, and our legislation should be shaped so as to assist in freeing our nation from commercial thraldom to other lands. What we can not produce, such as tea and coffee and sugar, let us get as cheaply as possible, and let no duty enhance their cost. [Applause on the Republican side.]

This is, in my opinion, the true policy for a nation; a policy which will best promote the general prosperity of the American people. The great advantage of the protection system to the agriculturist is that it gives him a uniform market. Chief-Justice Story, nomen clarum et venerabile, says on this question that—

A large and uniform market at home for a nation's products has a tendency to prevent those many rises and falls in prices which are so deeply injurious to the farmer and planter.

The "Cobden Club," of England, an association composed of rich men who are largely interested in manufactures, which is supplemented by its honorary members in high places here, is to-day sowing broadcast through this country "free-trade" pamphlets in order to persuade the American people that "free trade" is necessary to us. Why this is being done may well be asked. The answer is, if they can to a degree break down the American manufacturer, and thereby force our operatives into agriculture, they can then monopolize our markets for goods at their own prices and take their pay in American produce at prices fixed by themselves. The question is well stated by Chief-Justice Long:

Is America ready to give everything to Europe without any equivalent, and take in return whatever Europe may choose to give us on its own terms?

Could the results of "free trade" be more clearly stated?

We should ever bear in mind that in all ages there has been an irrepressible conflict between monarchical and republican forms of government. This has been well expressed by Missouri's great Senator, Thomas H. Benton, who said that—

Foreign interference and foreign influence in all ages and in all countries had been the bane and curse of free government. And that such interference and influence are far more dangerous in the insidious intervention of the moneyed power than possible invasion of fleets and armies.

Should not this interference on the part of the "Cobden Club" be considered by our people as an "insidious interference of the moneyed power?"

While it is true that we have much in common with the English people, yet the Government and the interests of the two countries are in direct opposition of each other. Lord Robert Cecil, in a debate in the English Parliament, explained exactly the relations between England and the United States when he said:

They were rivals politically, rivals commercially; again we are both manufacuring people, and in every port as well as in every court we are rivals to each other.

In this conflict between "free trade" and protection we have on our side the interest of the manufacturer, the artisan, the laborer, and the producer of America; on the other, a large portion of the Democratic party backed by the whole monetary interests of England. Of this foreign influence we as Americans should be especially jealous. The passage of the Mills bill in the interest of "free trade" is a victory for British commerce. For this kind of victory is a prostration to our American and producing industries, and I must confess that I see but little difference between being subjugated by British commerce or by British cannon. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Nature has been bountiful of her gifts to the American people. In addition to the mines of precious metals, she has given them vast deposits of iron, copper, lead, coal, and other base metals in a lavish degree in many portions of the country.

To utilize these requires labor, which alone can develop all this vast amount of raw materials into implements and the manufactured articles in order to enable us not only to live in comfort but to supply the wants of other nations. She has also given a kindly climate and a fertile soil, which is adapted to the growth of most of what we consume. In fact, no other nation is so well fitted by its natural conditions to maintain itself almost absolutely independent of foreign nations and influences as we, the American people.

Bearing these facts in mind, is it not for the best interests of our nation to adapt its policies in such manner as to give the "greatest good to the greatest number," and to do this is not protection to our home labor an absolute necessity?

Sir, we are told in the Good Book that "He that provideth not for his own household hath already denied the faith and is worse than an infidel." What are we, Mr. Chairman, as a nation but an aggregation of households? And is not the divine command as imperative on us as on an individual? Is it not our bounden duty to so legislate as to provide for our own people rather than for those of other countries?

Mr. Chairman, there are many glaring inconsistencies in this bill. It is cunningly drawn so as to command the support of that portion of the country which the Democratic party counts on for its main support, the "solid South;" and it is also a direct blow at the industrial and agricultural classes of the Northern States from which come the Republican majorities.

Let me illustrate. Take rice; the bill leaves rice, produced in South Carolina and Louisiana, with a duty of nearly 100 per cent., and also increases the duty on uncleaned rice, which is not only in the interest of the Southern rice producers, but will inevitably drive out of the business cleaning-mills of New York City and elsewhere. Why not make the duty on rice as it was before the war and thus give the consumers of this country, who use 250,000,000 pounds annually, the benefit of this cheap and desirable food?

Again, the bill reduces the tariff on sugar about 22 per cent. Why, may I ask, would it not be a sound policy to take off entirely the fifty-eight millions of tariff revenue on sugar? Sugar is an article of absolute necessity for all. Why levy what is a direct tax of over a dollar per capita on all our people for the benefit of its few raisers in the South? Sugar-cane, Mr. Chairman, is not indigenous to this country; it is an exotic with us, easily injured by frost or bad weather. Even the refuse stalks, or "bagasse," owing to climatic influences, can not be utilized for fuel as it is in Cuba without a large expenditure for a peculiar kind of furnace to burn it in.

Let me call the attention of the committee to the small area of land in the cultivation of sugar in the United States as compared with the acreage of corn in any Congressional district in my own State.

In 1879 there were but 181,592 acres in sugar-cane in Louisiana, and the United States but 227,776 acres. In the seven counties comprising the district I have the honor to represent on this floor, there were in cultivation the same year 481,126 acres in corn over twice as many acres as there were in sugar-cane in the whole United States. And, sir, the agricultural products of those seven counties are three times the value of the sugar crop of the United States, and yet we are taxed $58,000,000 annually for the direct benefit of the sugar-planter. Think of it!

And yet after nearly half a century's protection there is not as much sugar grown to-day as there has been in times past. This country does not produce over one-tenth of the sugar we use; and yet the people of the United States paid during the past year nearly $26 an acre in the tariff on sugar as a rental on the 227,776 acres in the cultivation of cane. Is it not better by far for us to pay a bounty of $20 a hogshead on the sugar raised in the United States in 1887, which would amount to about $7,000,000, or about 2 cents a pound, and thus save $49,000,000 which will be paid this year in the shape of a direct tax on the breakfast and tea table of every family in the land?

This would be a practical relief to the laboring classes whom our Democratic friends on the other side of the House are so loud in their professions to aid.

A bounty of the kind I have suggested, coupled with the proviso that this should not apply to countries that levy an export tax on sugar exported to this country, would, in my opinion, stimulate not only the growth of cane sugar in the South, but would also at the same time give an impetus to the production of sorghum and beet-root sugar, which our Western prairies and California are so well adapted to produce. The result would be that eventually we would produce all the sugar that the people of this country have use for.

All the interests of the reliable Democratic States are cared for in this bill. The sumac of Virginia is protected, and cement, which was first reported to be put on the "free-list," is now left with a protection of 10 per cent. because of the fact that in Democratic Kentucky is found not only one of the largest cement manufactories in the country, but it is also the banner State of Democracy.

The lead of Missouri is but slightly reduced, and even the peanut interests of North Carolina are looked after with care. In the draughting of the bill by the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means the interests of those States, a large number of whose members sit here elected by methods well known to this House and the country, have been tenderly touched where touched at all. Again, Mr. Chairman, this bill aims a blow at the prosperity of the agriculture of the North, the West, and the Pacific Slope by the fact that it places on the free-list many articles grown in Canada and other foreign countries, which will be an injury to our home producers of those articles.

Take one agricultural industry in my own State of Iowa for illustration. Flax is a fairly remunerative crop in that State under the protection now given to it and its product, flaxseed-oil. Let me show you how it works. A poor man comes to Iowa to make a home for himself and family. He buys 160 acres of land on long credit, with interest on the deferred payments, and this accounts for a large amount of the mortgages we hear so much about. In the olden time it took a whole season to break up a portion of his land to be ready to sow grain in the second season; since we have had a fair duty on flaxseed he commences to break up his land in the spring and as fast as he has 10 acres broken he puts it in flax. By the 1st of July he has 50 acres broken and sown in flax, from which he can realize five or six hundred dollars the first year, and in addition have his ground ready for wheat or corn the succeeding season. The result is that he is able to make his payment on his land and support his family during his first season.

In addition we have in Iowa eleven oil-mills, costing a large amount of money, and employing many men in their operation. This raising of flax in the West has been the means of the erection of these oil-mills and has reduced the price of oil, as was shown by my colleague, [Mr. HENDERSON], to a much lower price than it has ever been bef re.

By putting flaxseed and its product on the free-list you accomplish two things, you place the Iowa flax-raiser in direct competition with the ryot laborer of the East Indies and drive the oil-mills of the countr into "innocuous desuetude," and when this is done our people will inevitably pay higher prices for oil than now.

Again, we in Iowa have hoped that in the near future we would have factories erected in our State to utilize the lint of our flax fields into thread and linen. That hope, if this bill is to pass, will never come to fruition. The lint will rot on the ground where it is thrashed.

Again, the raising of potatoes under the existing protection is a fairly remunerative business in Iowa, the people of that State shipping to Chicago from five to seven hundred thousand bushels annually. This bill nominally retains the tariff on potatoes at 15 cents a bushel, yet really admits them free. I have no doubt that under this definition potatoes will be admitted free, thus letting in the Canadian potatoes by the cheap water transportation, while the small farmers in Iowa have to pay freight on their crop on two to four hundred miles of railway transportation.

These, Mr. Chairman, are only a few of the inconsistencies of this bill. Time will not permit me to elaborate its many injuries to the manufacturing, agricultural, and laboring interests.

But it may be well to inquire who has asked for the enactment of this proposed law. I have failed to hear presented on the floor of this House any petitions, nor have I seen in the RECORD any petitions asking us to pass this bill; but, on the contrary, from all parts of the country have come hundreds of petitions, not from manufacturers alone, but those who eat their "bread in the sweat of their faces," protesting against its passage. From the East, from the North, from the great West, and the States of Oregon and California the people have protested against its passage. Shall we close our ears to their protests?

I have personally been in receipt of many petitions and of letters by the score from my own State, from manufacturers, wool-growers, artisans, farmers, and laboring men, protesting against the bill. Sir, the people of my State believe in a fair degree of protection to American industries of all kinds.

Why, Mr. Chairman, we in Iowa have not timber enough to build a fleet of canoes, yet I, in common with my colleagues, have been in receipt of many letters and petitions from the laborers of that State, yea, from the Knights of Labor, urging us to vote for a subsidy to American vessels, so that the American flag may again be seen on the waters of the ocean as it was in the days of yore.

The last revision of the tariff was made by the Republican party. Since that revision the Democratic party has been in the ascendency in the lower House of Congress, which alone has the right to originate a measure of revenue; they have signally failed in adjusting the revenues to the constantly increasing surplus in the Treasury.

It is to the Republican party that the country must look for a proper adjustment of these economic questions. If a revision of the tariff is needed let us revise it by all means, but let it be done in such a manner as will not prostrate the industries of the country, as has been done by the Democratic party in the past; for it should be borne in mind that any revision of the tariff which will tend to throw out of their employment American laborers can but prove disastrous to the best interests of all, for labor, when employed at fair wages, is always contented. Drive labor out of employment by free trade or by any other method and at once it becomes demoralized and restless. [Applause.]

Sir, we are entering on one of the most remarkable political campaigns this country has witnessed—second only in interest to that of 1860. Already the millions of voters are arming, not with swords and bayonets, not with cannons and muskets—the time for that, thank God, is past—but with

> A weapon that comes down as still
> As snow-flakes fall upon the sod;
> But executes a freeman's will,
> As lightning does the will of God.

Sir, in this contest the candidate of the Democratic party is already known. The President has so dominated his party that they can not nominate any one else. On whom the choice of the Republican party will fall I do not know, but this I do know: he will be one well worthy to lead the Republican hosts to victory in that conflict. On the banner of the Democratic party will be inscribed free trade. Sir, behind that banner will follow all who believe in that fallacy, backed up by all the power and influence of the Cobden Club of England. On the Republican banner will be emblazoned protection to American industries, a fair ballot, and an honest count. Under the Republican banner will march all who believe in the progress and upbuilding of the American nation. On this issue we make the fight, and of its result I have no fear, for, Mr. Chairman, it is said that "coming events cast their shadows before." When the result is known it will be found that the American people have pronounced in unmistakable tones their condemnation of the principles underlying the Mills bill. And that at the close of that election day we shall hear from Lake to Gulf, from Maine to the "Golden Gates" of the Pacific pæans of victory welcoming the return to power of the Republican party, which has, by the policy it inaugurated, done so much for the moral and material elevation of the American people, and that for another quarter of a century in the future American interests will be as carefully guarded as they were from 1861 to 1883.

During the delivery of Mr. GEAR'S remarks the hammer fell.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague be permitted to proceed for ten minutes longer.

Mr. HOOKER. I hope the gentleman will be permitted to go on until he has concluded his remarks.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. If the time is extended it is simply taken from the time of somebody else.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to proceed for five minutes longer any how.

Mr. GEAR. I can probably conclude my remarks in that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request for an extension of the time of the gentleman from Iowa for five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEAR then resumed and concluded his remarks.

[Mr. DIBBLE withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. HAUGEN addressed the committee.

He was interrupted in his remarks by the arrival of 5 o'clock, when the Chairman stated that under order of the House the committee must rise.

Mr. HAUGEN. How much of my time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has fifty minutes of his time remaining.

The committee rose; and Mr. MCCREARY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order the House now takes a recess until 8 o'clock to-night.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House at 8 o'clock p. m. was called to order by Mr. MCCREARY, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 11, 1888.

I hereby designate Hon. J. B. MCCREARY to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House this evening.

JNO. G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Mr. DOCKERY. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills under the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the title of the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5961) to increase the pension now paid to Mrs. D. P. Woodbury.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may read the titles of the bills in their regular order on the Calendar, and unless some member present calls the bill up for consideration it shall be passed over, not losing its place on the Calendar.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

JOHN KALBFLEISCH.

The first pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. GROSVENOR) was the bill (S. 331) granting a pension to John Kalbfleisch.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Kalbfleisch, Company A, One hundred and sixteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, at the rate allowed for loss of leg above the knee.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 331) granting a pension to John Kalbfleisch, having examined the same, report it back with the recommendation that it do pass, and in support of this action adopt and make part hereof, as containing the facts of the case, the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is as follows:

"[Senate Report No. 63, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 331) granting a pension to John Kalbfleisch, private in Company A, One hundred and sixteenth Ohio Volunteers, have examined the same and report:

"That John Kalbfleisch enlisted on August 22, 1862, in Company A, One hundred and sixteenth Ohio Volunteers, in the war of 1861; that while in the service and in the line of duty, on or about the 24th day of February, 1864, in jumping from a train of cars in motion, he sustained a serious injury to the right leg, resulting in amputation, which operation was performed in the field hospital in camp at Sleepy Creek, West Virginia, where his company was stationed, performing guard duty for the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

"He was honorably discharged on the 15th of May, 1865. He was pensioned March 27, 1869, to date from May 15, 1865, and dropped from the roll by order of the Secretary of the Interior of date June 18, 1877, upon the theory that the disability was not received in the line of duty; and this is the only question in the case.

"All the evidence, from the filing of the original application for a pension down to the date of the last appeal for a restoration of Kalbfleisch to the rolls, shows that he was a good soldier, obedient, attentive, and faithful from the beginning to the end of his long service.

"The officer in command at Sleepy Creek testifies that on the day on which he received his injury he issued to him and two comrades a pass to go to a place called Hancock to procure sole-leather to repair their shoes, which were badly worn. This statement is corroborated by several other members of the company to which Kalbfleisch belonged, who had personal knowledge of the fact. The pass thus issued required the return of Kalbfleisch and his comrades at 4 p. m. They walked to Hancock, about 5 miles distant, and returned on the railroad in a freight train, which arrived at the camp a little before the hour at which the pass would expire.

"The railroad track was practically in the camp, and when the train arrived at its regular place for stopping, although they should have remained on the train, which they did not, they would have been in fact in the camp, amenable to its rules and regulations, subject to its discipline, and entitled to its privileges. It was usual for the train to stop at that point, but on this particular day it did not.

"The two comrades of Kalbfleisch jumped from the moving train and were uninjured. Kalbfleisch slipped, or was caught by his clothing or in some other way on the door of the freight-car in which they were riding as he was about to jump, and fell from the train, his right leg being drawn under the wheels of the car and crushed. He was immediately surrounded by his comrades in the camp and at once carried to the field hospital. There are a number of affidavits by these men, and there are also affidavits by the comrades who accompanied him to Hancock, and who jumped from the train before him without injury, to the effect that Kalbfleisch was not intoxicated—not perceptibly under the influence of liquor, although it was admitted by himself and comrades that one of these latter had procured liquor at Hancock in his canteen, and that all of them had drank moderately of it.

"But the fact that the two comrades, one of whom owned and had possession of the canteen all the time, jumped from the train and walked easily away; that the slip of Kalbfleisch in jumping, as described in the affidavits, would have been a perfectly natural one for any other perfectly sober man to make in the hurry and excitement of the moment; and the further fact that the quantity of liquor in their possession was insufficient to incapacitate them, or either of them, from taking ordinary care of himself if it was all drank by them, or by either of them, together with the abundant testimony above referred to in contradiction of this theory of excessive drinking, leaves it with no satisfactory support, nor is it believed by the committee that the soldier was strictly outside the line of duty.

"The testimony shows that he went only 4 or 5 miles away from the camp; that he went on a proper and necessary errand in the line of duty and by authority of his commanding officer; that he was mindful of this duty to return at or before the hour named in his pass, and that rather than be absent beyond the appointed time for him to be in camp, as he necessarily would have been if he had allowed himself to be carried by on the train, he risked his life in jumping from it while in rapid motion.

"He was actually in the camp when the accident occurred, and but for his injury would have been ready for any duty required of him. He did immediately receive as a soldier in the line of duty the first and highest privilege of the camp, namely, hospital service in the field hospital of the camp. He received afterwards the surgeon's certificate of disability on account of the accident 'received while in the line of duty,' and after that an honorable discharge on account of 'the disability resulting from such injury while in the line of duty.'

"The committee are unanimously of the opinion that John Kalbfleisch should be restored to the roll, and they recommend the passage of the bill."

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think no stronger statement of this case can be made than the statement embraced in the report of the committee, and unless some member of the committee desires to oppose the passage of the bill, I will say nothing further, but will submit it on the statement here made.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

REBECCA E. SHOEMAKER.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. WILLIAMS) was the bill (H. R. 6990) to place the name of Rebecca E. Shoemaker on the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place the name of Rebecca E. Shoemaker, widow of David R. P. Shoemaker, deceased, late a private of Company E, Eleventh Ohio Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

Rebecca E. Shoemaker is the widow of D. R. P. Shoemaker, late a corporal in Company E, Eleventh Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

Said D. R. P. Shoemaker died on 2d day of October, 1877, from disease of the liver. The claimant made application for pension on the ground that said disease was contracted by the deceased while in the Army in the line of service. The claim was rejected on the ground that the disease was not due to his military service. The evidence filed in the case is very contradictory, but an analysis of it gives the following well-established facts, to wit:

D. R. P. Shoemaker enlisted in Company E, Eleventh Ohio Volunteer Infantry; was promoted corporal; was captured at the battle of South Mountain; confined in Libby prison; was exchanged, and returned to Ohio in feeble health; was treated for liver disease by Dr. Debra; returned to regiment December 22, 1862, and was discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability December 31, 1863, and was treated for liver disease in 1864. He was a man of fine education, of good habits, and physically sound prior to his enlistment. The evidence is contradictory as to his habits from 1872 to the date of his death, and the Pension Office decided the doubt against the claimant; but from the evidence, carefully examined, the committee are of the opinion that the soldier died from disease contracted while a prisoner of war, and do therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN E. LEWIS.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. LANE) was the bill (H. R. 7665) granting a pension to JOHN E. LEWIS.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John E. Lewis, a private, late of Company F, One hundred and fifteenth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 7665, submit the following report:

John E. Lewis, the soldier in this case, made application to the Pension Office for a pension, and the claim was rejected on August 17, 1882, on the ground that the soldier was not mustered into the United States service. The facts are, as appear from affidavits on file and the record in this case, that the soldier enlisted August 12, 1862, and was discharged September 1, 1862, before he was mustered into service, and that on the 28th day of May, 1880, his declaration for a pension was filed with the above result.

There are several affidavits on file with this committee in support of this claim. Dr. I. B. McNutt swears that he knew the soldier personally since 1865, and has treated him ever since, and that the soldier has scrotal hernia of the left side, and that he treated him in August, 1887, for a very distressing disease of the lower bowels as well as stomach, which the doctor believes was the result of a strangulation caused by the aforesaid hernia in the scrotal sack until it set up an irritation of the stomach and bowels, and that affiant considers the disability one-half of his time by reason of said injury.

The claimant testifies that he enlisted in Company F, One hundred and fifteenth Regiment Illinois Infantry, for three years, on the 11th day of August, 1862, and immediately went into Camp Butler in Illinois, and was assigned to duty in said company, and for more than one month discharged the duty of a soldier; stood guard and did post duty along with the other members of the company, and drew clothing and rations, and answered roll-call as long as he was able. Some thirty days after his enlistment he was ordered to assist a teamster in turning a loaded army wagon in a narrow street, and the wagon fell on him in turning in such a way as to produce a rupture in the left side or groin, producing scrotal hernia of the left side, and because thereof he was unable to perform any more military duty, and was discharged by order of the post surgeon about the 13th day of September, 1862.

Affiant further testifies that when he went into Camp Butler he was examined by a board of surgeons and accepted, and that he had been discharged on account of the above injury, and that he has, since said injury, been disabled at least three-fourths of his time, and that his age is now fifty years.

W. T. Linn and George A. Henderson, two members of said company, on their oaths fully indorse the statement of the said soldier, as above set forth, as to his enlistment and injury.

Charles H. Griffith, captain of the company, testifies that the soldier enlisted, as above set forth, and was a member of said company; that the soldier, acting under the order of Colonel Fanning, who had charge of the post, assisted in turning an army wagon; the wagon tipped and fell on the soldier, which caused a rupture, or what is called scrotal hernia, of the left side, which so disabled him that he was unfit to perform further military duty, and was examined, in a denuded state, by the post surgeon and held not to be able to perform military labor or duty, and was discharged.

The consideration of all this testimony, as well as the papers on file in the Pension Office, leads to the conclusion that the soldier enlisted and was injured while in the service in line of duty, but before he was mustered into the service, and was examined then and there by the post surgeon, and his injury then and there received was pronounced by said surgeon to disqualify and disable said soldier from military duty, and in view thereof the committee recommend that said bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LEMUEL R. REA.

Mr. ROGERS. I desire to ask a favor of the House. Under other circumstances I would not do it. I have had a sick family for two weeks. I have come here to-night rather under protest. There is a single claim I am interested in—the case of a man totally blind. I desire to leave the House as early as possible. I have not asked the House to consider a case this session and should be glad if that favor is granted to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I think I must object.

Mr. ROGERS. If my wife were not sick I would not ask to interfere with the business of the committee. As I said, I came here to-night under a protest.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I shall not object, but I do not want this to be regarded as a precedent for calling up any other bill outside of the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. ROGERS. Then I call up the bill (S. 2419) granting a pension to Lemuel R. Rea.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lemuel R. Rea, late a private in Company I, Second Illinois Cavalry.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendment:

After the word "cavalry" insert "at $40 per month."

The report (by Mr. WALKER) was read in part.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the report.

There was no objection.

The report in full is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2419) granting a pension to Lemuel R. Rea, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to adopt as their own the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is as follows:

"This claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the disabilities alleged by the claimant—blindness, piles, and lung disease—did not result from the service. Rea enlisted August 6, 1861, in Company I, Second Regiment Illinois Cavalry, and was discharged August 11, 1864.

"The testimony shows that at enlistment he was 'remarkably healthy,' and that he 'took great pride in his ability to endure hardship and undergo fatigue.' James S. McCullough, who knew him from boyhood, testifies that the claimant was 'a strong, healthy young man' at enlistment, and adds:

"'Living on a farm adjoining his father's home enables me to state without hesitation what I am sure is a fact, namely, that he lost his health after entering the service.'

"The claimant alleges that while in camp at Camp Massac, near Metropolis City, Ill., in October, 1861, he had an attack of the measles, which induced piles and lung disease, and which occasioned weakness of the eyes that finally, in 1881, resulted in total blindness.

"That he did so suffer from measles is shown by an abundance of testimony. 'There was a very heavy rain, that flooded the quarters, and he got very wet.' The next morning was very cold, and on account of the measles his comrades were obliged to remove him to a neighboring house; they did not think he would live.

"Anthony Coyle, a comrade, who was detailed to attend Rea and several others who were suffering from the measles, testifies that 'he complained frequently about his suffering' after his recovery, 'particularly from bleeding piles and weakness in his eyes.' On account of the disabilities that resulted from this sickness he was often excused from duty. 'All the boys knew he was weakly, so he was never pushed hard while on fatigue duty.'

"Walter E. Price, a comrade, testifies:

"'I have seen him when on scouting duty grow pale and almost fall from his horse; at such times he has told me he was suffering with the piles. His eyes were weak when he had those bad spells. That his weakness resulted from his wounds I have not a doubt.'

"S. S. Irwin, another comrade, testifies that—

"'Rea had a cough and was generally regarded as weak-lunged. He also suffered with his eyes. There was a time that he wore goggles. He was appointed farrier of his company, to make his duties easier.'

"That the claimant has never since ceased to suffer from piles is abundantly shown. On a special examination the examiner in his summary said:

"'That the claimant had measles in the service, and that, most probably resulting therefrom, his eyes became diseased, there is no doubt in my mind. Granting "soundness" at enlistment, he certainly contracted piles in the service, and has been disabled thereby more or less since his discharge.'

"In 1879 Rea had a protracted spell of sickness, consequent on his weakness and general debility; in 1881 he had another attack, and this time erysipelas settled in his eyes, causing total and permanent blindness. The Pension Office then seized on the proximate cause of the blindness (erysipelas) and disregarded the former weakness of the eyes and general weakness of the system, which might naturally enough have induced the erysipelas, and rejected the claim not only for blindness, but also for piles, which was overwhelmingly established.

"The claimant comes of an excellent family, is a reputable and worthy citizen, is totally blind, has a family of nine children, and is in sore need of help."

Your committee believe the claim to be meritorious, and therefore return the bill with the recommendation that it do pass, amended, however, by inserting after the word "cavalry," in line 5, the words "at $40 per month."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment of the committee will be agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word about that amendment.

Several MEMBERS. It is not necessary. The bill is all right.

Mr. ROGERS. What I desire to say is very brief, and if the committee do not sanction it I shall have no more to say. I understand that the regular rate of pension for total blindness is $72. The report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions does not state why they propose to reduce it to $40 in this case, and I think the amendment ought not to pass. I think this man ought to have whatever pension is allowed to other persons who are totally blind. With these observations I submit the case. If the Committee of the Whole think he ought to have but $40 a month, of course I have nothing more to say.

Mr. LYMAN. You say the man is totally blind?

Mr. ROGERS. Totally blind; the report so states—totally and permanently blind.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that the bill simply places the applicant on the pension-roll subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. ROGERS. That is exactly what I desire. I do not care to have any sum fixed in the bill. I desire that the Pension Office shall rate him.

Mr. SPOONER. What rate does the committee's amendment propose?

Mr. ROGERS. Forty dollars.

Mr. SPOONER. By whom was the bill reported?

Mr. ROGERS. By Mr. WALKER, of Missouri, who is not present.

Mr. SPOONER. I submit that there must have been some reason for the amendment.

Mr. CHEADLE. Mr. Chairman, does the report state that this man is totally blind?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands.

Mr. CHEADLE. Then it seems to me that it would be ridiculous to make the pension for total blindness in this case $40 a month, when the law fixes the rate at $72. We ought to be consistent in these matters.

Mr. CASWELL. Will the Chair please have read again that portion of the report which speaks of this man's blindness?

The Clerk read as follows:

The claimant comes of an excellent family, is a worthy and reputable citizen, is totally blind, has a family of nine children, and is in sore need of help.

Mr. CASWELL. Why do the committee propose to reduce the pension to $40?

Mr. ROGERS. They do not state the reason in their report, and I know of no reason.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment reported from the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. What is the provision of the bill now, that the man shall be placed on the roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension law?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to thank the committee for its courtesy.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to take up a bill which I introduced at the request of an officer of the Pension Bureau. It is not for anybody in my district. I shall not be here for the next week or two, and therefore I ask that the bill be now taken up.

Mr. FORD. That is just my fix. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN]?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOMPSON] objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

HENRY L. POTTER.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. SPINOLA) was the bill (H. R. 7857) to increase the pension of Henry L. Potter.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Henry L. Potter, late colonel of the Seventy-first Regiment of New York State Volunteers, to $72 per month during his natural life, together with arrearage from January 4, 1876, the date of making his application, to June 17, 1878, at $30 per month, and from June 17, 1878, at $72 per month, in lieu of the pension heretofore paid and now received by him.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The record of the claimant is as follows: He entered the service as lieutenant-colonel of the Seventy-first New York Volunteers, July 18, 1861; he was granted thirty days' leave of absence November 25, 1861, on the ground of disability, resulting from a severe contusion of chest and injury to spine, caused by his horse falling with and upon him; wounded in action August 27, 1862, in battle at Bristoe Station, Va. Register of commissioned officers shows him severely wounded in the left hand at date and place aforesaid.

Under date of October 29, 1862, he was granted thirty days' sick leave on account of this wound. The surgeon's certificate shows that the wound of hand had not yet healed, and there remained a fistulous opening, through which purulent matter discharged. Mustered in as colonel May 1, 1863. On August 20, 1863, he was granted sick leave for twenty days upon the following surgeon's certificate:

"I have carefully examined this officer, and find that he is suffering from gastro-enteritis, nephritis, dysentery, causing general debility, besides contusion of left leg above the ankle, caused by a piece of shell striking the part at the battle of Gettysburgh."

He was finally discharged, to date December 31, 1864.

Colonel Potter is now in receipt of pension at the rate of $30 per month, or total in rank, on account of gunshot wound of left hand and wrist, gunshot and shell wound of left leg, chronic diarrhea, and injury to chest.

The wound of hand alone entitles this officer to total in grade, or $30 per month, because of the anchylosed condition of the wrist. The wound of knee, according to the report of the examining surgeons, is 7 inches from knee, and has the appearance of having been severe in character. The disability is of a muscular character. The other injury of the leg is confined to its inner side. The cordicle is highly discolored. The muscles of the leg are flabby, and the measurements around are decidedly less than those of the right. The concussion incident to the injury serves to explain the numbness, muscular inability, and swollen condition of ankle. Disability from wounds of leg one-half total.

In addition to the wounds above described, Colonel Potter is now and has been suffering for many years with lung affection as well as its usual sequel, disease of heart. The medical referee of the Pension Office, under date of December 30, 1886, admits the latter to be the greater of the disabilities under which Colonel Potter is laboring, but gives it as his opinion that the same are not shown to be chargeable to the military service. In this view he was sustained by the Secretary of the Interior on March 26, 1887.

The Secretary says: "The appellant claims that his disabilities are so great as to require the constant aid and attendance of another person, but, even admitting this to be true, he has not shown that all his disabilities are due to the incidents of service. Colonel Potter is now receiving the highest pension of his rank, for the proved disabilities, that can be allowed under the law. It remains for him to make good his claim by presenting the necessary evidence * * *" In other words, were it shown to the satisfaction of the Pension Bureau that disease of heart and lungs are chargeable to the military service, Colonel Potter would be allowed a pension of $50 per month.

It would seem that the severe injury to chest, which is a matter of record, and which disqualified Colonel Potter for a long time for the performance of military duty, should afford ample explanation of the present condition of lungs and heart. But your committee find that the fact that he has been suffering from these diseases ever since discharge is established by lay and medical testimony the reliability of which is not questioned. The attending physicians attribute this condition to the combined effects of the wounds, injury, and diarrhea, all conceded to have their origin in the service and line of duty. There is much evidence presented to the committee, all tending to show that this officer, because of the combined disabilities, is dependent upon the personal aid and attendance of others daily to administer medical relief and for other purposes.

Colonel Potter was a most gallant officer, on many occasions by his personal and daring efforts turning apparent defeat into glorious victory. His bravery and daring on many fields of battle was duly recognized by Generals Sickles, Hooker, and others, who invariably assigned him and his gallant command to where the greatest danger threatened. He is now a complete wreck, and having served his country well, should not be left to suffer in his old age.

While the committee is fully impressed with the justness of the relief asked for, yet neither the rules of the committee nor of the House would warrant to accede to all the provisions contained in the bill under consideration, but unhesitatingly agree to afford such relief as precedents will warrant; and therefore report favorably on the bill and ask that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out all after the word "volunteers," in line 6, and inserting therein instead the words "to $50 per month."

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELISHA GRISWOLD.

The next business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was the bill (S. 835) for the relief of Elisha Griswold.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elisha Griswold, formerly of Company F, Third Michigan Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 835) for the relief of Elisha Griswold, agree with the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions as to the facts.

The said report is as follows:

"The applicant entered the service January 23, 1864, in Company F, Third Michigan Cavalry, and was discharged February 12, 1866. He filed his application for a pension January 20, 1880, claiming that in January, 1865, he fell from a swing in a building occupied as a barracks and struck on his head and shoulder, sustaining injuries that have proved painful and materially interfered with his performance of manual labor. His statements as to the circumstances of the alleged injuries are substantiated by several comrades, and the examining surgeon gave him a one-half rating and the examining board a three-fourths rating.

"His application was rejected December 18, 1885, on the ground that the alleged injuries were not received in the line of duty.

"The soldier received his injury while engaged in recreation in the barracks where he was quartered. Notwithstanding, your committee are of opinion that such recreation is a necessary part of a soldier's life, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ENLOE. I wish to ask consent to have a bill taken up out of its regular order. It is a bill granting a pension to a constituent who, from all the information I have, will probably live but a very short time. The report is not long. If the House is willing to take up the bill, I would like to have it done at once, as I am scarcely able to be here this evening, and desire to retire.

Mr. THOMPSON, of California. I call for the regular order.

LEWIS DAVIS.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5903) for the relief of Lewis Davis, a soldier of the war of 1812.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to place the name of Lewis Davis, of Laclede County,

Missouri, a soldier of the war of 1812, on the pension-roll, at the rate of $33.33½ per month.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The record shows that the claimant served in Capt. William Wallser's company, Thirty-ninth Infantry, from October 26, 1813, to October 26, 1814, in the war of 1812 with Great Britain. He is now a pensioner under act of February 14, 1871, at the rate of $8 per month. He is aged about ninety-two years. The committee recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the words "thirty-three and a third dollars," wherever the same may occur in said bill, and substituting in lieu thereof the words "twenty dollars," and that the bill so amended pass.

The question being taken on the amendment reported by the committee, to strike out "thirty-three and one-third dollars" wherever it occurs in the bill and substitute "$20," it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE W. KINCAID.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7719) granting an increase of pension to George W. Kincaid.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask that this bill be considered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, of George W. Kincaid, war of 1812, to $50 per month.

The report (by Mr. FINLEY) was as follows:

The committee find the facts to be as stated in Senate Report No. 1373, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, which report is hereto annexed and made a part of this report, and is as follows:

"The committee have examined the papers in this case with very great interest. It is an application for increase of pension by a soldier of the war of 1812, and who is now fast verging to the close of a century of life, having been born in 1790.

"The claimant enlisted on the 28th of December, 1812, and was discharged on March 15, 1815, upon the certificate of Surg. T. Watkins, by reason of disabilities incurred by diseased liver and pulmonary affection.

"The claim was rejected on the ground that no certificate could be found on file, and that there was no evidence identifying the claimant as the soldier performing the service alleged.

"The claimant for increase is already a pensioner under the acts and supplements thereto giving pension to soldiers of the war of 1812.

"He is utterly and entirely destitute, and for many years has been wholly dependent upon his neighbors for care and subsistence, as the evidence discloses in a petition signed by numerous citizens and herewith appended as a part of this report:

"To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

"The petition of the subscribers, citizens of Richland County, Ohio, respectfully showeth that George W. Kincaid, whose residence for a great many years has been Belleville, Richland County, Ohio, was a soldier of the war of 1812; that his only means of support for many years has been the pension of $8 per month granted to the soldiers of that war. They further represent that in consequence of his great age, being now about ninety-six years of age, he has become so helpless that he requires the constant care and attendance of a nurse; that for several years this additional expense has been borne by his neighbors, as he has no family or relatives able to support him. In view of his services to his country, and his great age and helplessness, we respectfully ask that his pension be increased to $30 per month, which will barely pay the expense of his support for the remainder of his life.

"And as in duty bound, we will ever pray, etc.

"S. F. Hines, Wm. Gerloch, H. Farber, H. L. Maury, O. E. Oberlin, Irwin Fisher, R. J. Hubbill, Eli L. Hess, Reuben Evarts, Ben. O. Smith, O. S. Hawley, Gustav Etz, J. M. Reed, Wm. Long, U. F. Armstrong, C. V. Morrow, Wm. C. Beattie, T. A. Swonger, A. W. Lewis, J. J. Charles, Wm. Le Fever, Leroy Le Fever, J. M Alexander, J. R. Tennan, D. A. Lanehart, J. H. Burkholder, E. L. Garber, Wm. H. A. Raudebaugh, C. J. Brown, E. A. Brown, C. A. Lafferty, John Winemiller, S. B. Donel, M. Sharp, J. C. Potts, C. B. Waters, C. Strome, A. E. Shafer, Cyrus Gatton, B. Scott, W. A. Black, Cyrus Day, Wm. F. Madden, B. J. Levins, A. M. Young, C. N. Ink, W. H. Batterson, D. M. Teeter, A. G. Fans, J. C. Nelson, Charles Etz, J. P. Walsh, B. F. Greely, J. Jay Dean, R. W. Bell, J. W. Kelly, O. H. Gurney, A. Cunningham, Bent Charles, O. Howard, Henry Spain, Daniel Walker, W. H. Smith, H. O. Sheidley, Chas. Purcell, Jacob Winemeller, Wm. F. Charles, J. F. Greely, Aaron Leedy, J. S. Oberlin, H. L. Canfield, D. J. Rummel, H. C. McCluer.

"In his own sworn statement made before Hon. John Meredith, probate judge of Richland County, Ohio, on the 20th day of January, 1861, the veteran claimant qualifies as to his own identity as the same Kincaid who was a sergeant in Captain Barnard's company, Fourteenth United States Infantry, during the war with Great Britain declared in 1812. That his disabilities were incurred in Sackett's Harbor, N. Y., while in the line of duty, from which he has never recovered. For three years after his discharge he resided in Baltimore, and was treated for said disease of the liver by Surgeon Watkins, long since deceased. That he lived at other places for short intervals, and has been treated by other physicians, but received no benefit therefrom.

"His first application for the required increase of pension was made in 1861, and he testifies that the long delay in seeking aid from the Government arose from his ignorance of the rules of the Department and the law. In June, 1862, for some unknown reason, not stated in the records on file in the Pension Office, the further progress of the case was suspended. He comes now before Congress for the relief which, in the opinion of the committee, he should have had long years ago.

"In further proof of his identity the records of the Third Auditor's Office for September, 1835, the accounts of Paymaster Dobbin, United States Army, show George William Kincaid to have been a sergeant of Captain Barnard's company, Fourteenth United States Infantry, the dates of his enlistment, discharge, and the reason for the same.

"Further, the following certificate from Captain McIlvaine is to the minds of the committee conclusive:

"'I do hereby certify upon my word and honor as a late officer and a gentleman that I know George William Kincaid, and that he served in the Fourteenth Regiment United States Infantry faithfully and honestly in the late war, and that he was under my command as an attendant at the recruiting headquarters in Baltimore, and that I left him doing duty in the office under Colonel Lane and Captain Cummings in 1814.

"'WM. McILVAINE,

"'Late Captain in the Fourteenth Regiment United States Infantry.

"'WHITE HALL, BALTIMORE COUNTY, July 18, 1835.'

"Samuel B. Hugo, a surgeon's mate in the war of 1812, certifies to his personal knowledge as to the service of the claimant in that war.

"In January, 1861, Drs. H. O. Mack and S. M. Chandler made a personal examination of the claimant's condition, and found him suffering from chronic derangement of the liver, and by reason of this and a combination of diseases to be totally disabled from obtaining a living by manual labor.

"In view, therefore, of the foregoing testimony, which is conclusive to the committee as to the merits of the case, and from the great age of the claimant, they recommend the speedy passage of the bill."

The committee therefore adopt said Senate report as the report of this committee, and recommend that the accompanying bill do pass, with the following amendment: In line 6 strike out the words "fifty dollars" and insert in lieu thereof the words "thirty dollars."

The amendment reported by the committee, to strike out, in line 6, the words "fifty dollars" and insert in lieu thereof the words "thirty dollars," was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM COMPTON.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6574) for the relief of William Compton.

Mr. FINLEY. I call for the consideration of this bill.

The bill was read, of follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay William Compton, a soldier in the regular Army, in the Thirty-ninth Tennessee Infantry and other regiments, from 1814 to 1819, $25 a month, instead of $8 a month, as at present allowed and paid him.

The report (by Mr. FINLEY) was read, as follows:

The official records show that William Compton was duly enlisted on the 30th of June, 1814, and served in Capt. Richard H. Bell's company, Thirty-ninth Regiment United States Infantry, and was transferred to the Seventh United States Infantry, and after the treaty of peace he was sent in command to Creek Nation and was discharged at St. Mark's, Fla., June 29, 1819, from Captain Blackstone's company, Seventh United States Infantry, thus serving five years, being the entire time for which he enlisted.

On the 31st day of March, 1871, he filed an application for pension, and was allowed a pension of $8 per month, commencing February 14, 1871, under the service-pension act of that date. On the 2d day of April, 1887, the pensioner applied for an increase, alleging blindness, deafness, nervousness, and general disability on account of extreme old age, being unable to perform any kind of manual labor.

As the service-pension act fixed the rate of pension at $8 a month, and no provision being made for any increase over that amount, his application was rejected.

The soldier now appeals to Congress for relief, and asks that his pension be increased from $8 per month (the rate he is now receiving) to $25 a month.

He is now nearly ninety years of age; has no property; no one to care for him, and is totally unable to perform any kind of manual labor.

In view of the foregoing facts and in consideration of the soldier's long, faithful, and honorable service in behalf of his country, his extreme old age, his feeble condition, his poverty, and his high standing as a citizen, your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HANNAH H. LATHAM.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8506) for the relief of Hannah H. Latham; which, as no member called for its consideration, was passed over.

W. A. LEMASTER.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (S. 647) for the relief of W. A. Lemaster.

Mr. FINLEY. I call for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to W. A. Lemaster, of Iconium, Iowa, the whole sum of the pension due to George Lemaster, deceased, at the date of the death of said George Lemaster, to wit, June 23, 1873, said pension having been erroneously withheld from said George Lemaster from March, 1861, during and up to June 23, 1873: Provided, That said W. A. Lemaster shall first make proof satisfactory to said Secretary that he is the sole surviving heir of the said George Lemaster, deceased.

Mr. MATSON. I make a point of order against this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. MATSON. At these Friday evening sessions the business is expressly limited to the consideration of bills granting pensions. This bill is in the nature of a claim against the Government, and is not now entitled to consideration.

The CHAIRMAN (after examining the bill). The Chair is clearly of opinion that, in accordance with the special order under which these Friday night sessions are held, this bill can not be now considered. It is in the nature of a claim; and the special order confines the business of these Friday evening sessions to bills granting pensions.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. This bill was considered in the Senate by the Committee on Pensions, and in this House, after a reference to the Committee on Pensions, it has been reported favorably. I make the point that under the circumstances any rule which might have excluded this bill from consideration has been waived, and that it is competent now for the Committee of the Whole to consider it.

The CHAIRMAN. Within the recollection of the Chair, a similar point to the present was made in the Forty-ninth Congress, and it was then held that bills of this character were not in order at Friday night sessions. The question is now on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON].

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, is it necessary that this bill should be reported back to the House with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Claims?

Mr. CHEADLE. I make the point of order that if it is not proper for the Committee of the Whole to consider the bill, it is not competent for them to make any order whatever with reference to its disposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the motion is in order.

Mr. ADAMS. Undoubtedly the motion is in order. It will rest, of course, in the discretion of the House whether the bill shall take the course proposed. The bill, having been considered and reported by the Committee on Pensions, is properly on the Calendar. The point of order may be well taken that it can not be considered this evening; but it does not follow that the bill must be referred to any committee.

Mr. PERKINS. It should retain its present position on the Calendar.

Several MEMBERS. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. That was the point I was making on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If the Chair will allow me, I should like to be heard on this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MATSON. I apprehend the motion is perfectly in order, but I do not wish to hamper the gentleman who has charge of the claim, and therefore withdraw it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The motion having been withdrawn, it is not necessary for me to say what I intended to say, that the motion is clearly out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, after a full investigation of this question, that it occurs to the Chair if the bill is properly on the Calendar it ought to remain there.

The Chair is advised differently, though, by a number of gentlemen, but thinks, after all, that it should remain on the Calendar, and if we have no jurisdiction of it, that we should not disturb it at all. Hence it will remain where it is.

HENRY C. RICHARDSON.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. FINLEY) was the bill (H. R. 3706) granting a pension to Henry C. Richardson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry C. Richardson, late of Company K, Fifth Kentucky Volunteers.

Mr. FINLEY. This bill, if passed, will only give this man a pension of $2 a month for the loss of a finger; and as the report is lengthy, I ask consent to dispense with the reading of it.

Mr. MATSON. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

Henry C. Richardson was enrolled as a private in Company K, Fifth Kentucky Infantry Volunteers, October 15, 1861, and was discharged November 4, 1864. On April 13, 1885, he filed in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions a claim for pension on account of the loss of the third finger of the left hand on the 8th of October, 1862, near the battle-field of Perryville, Ky. This claim was rejected October 16, 1886, upon the ground that claimant had declared his inability to furnish evidence showing that the alleged injury was received in the line of duty.

The certificate of Claiborne J. Walton, M. D., shows that the claimant has lost the third finger of his left hand at the metacarpal joint.

In an affidavit filed April 1, 1886, the claimant states that his finger was shot away by the accidental discharge of his gun; that he was sitting upon a fence with his gun in his hands when the rail upon which he was sitting broke and threw his weight on the hammer of the gun and caused the discharge by which his hand was injured. He states that he does not now remember any one who was present when his injury was received.

In an affidavit filed January 21, 1886, the claimant states that the captain in charge of his company at the time is now dead, as are also the lieutenant and first sergeant. The claimant states also that he was injured as alleged about 4 p. m. October 8, 1862; that when so injured he was in the rear upon leave granted by his captain; that at the time he was suffering from chronic diarrhea, and that his captain had told him to go to the rear, and to remain there "until he got better, and when able to do so to rejoin his company."

The records of the War Department furnish the following information touching claimant's service:

"September and October, 1862, absent; accidentally wounded at Perrysville; now in Louisville, Ky.; same to December 31, 1862; January and Fubruary, 1863, absent; sick in Hart County, Ky., October 20, 1862; the claimant returned to duty April 6, 1863; July and August, 1863, on detached service as teamster and so continued, so far as shown by company records on file, until May, 1864, when he was reported sick at Nashville, Tenn.; he was mustered out of service, with detachment, November 4, 1864."

In response to a letter from the Pension Office, John D. Brent, late captain of Company K, Fifth Kentucky Volunteers, under date of September 23, 1886, says:

"Henry C. Richardson lost his finger on or about the battle of Perryville, in 1862, by the accidental discharge of his gun. He was a faithful soldier and did his duty when able."

D. T. Moneypenny states under oath that he knows that the claimant—

"Was wounded at Perryville, Ky., in the left hand, by the loss of his third finger; said finger was shot off close to the palm of the hand, leaving no joints; saw him a short time before he was wounded; also saw his wound dressed."

P. T. Richardson, a member of claimant's company, states under oath that the claimant—

"Was wounded at Perryville, Ky., in the left hand, by the loss of his third finger; said finger was shot off close to the palm of the hand, leaving no joints. He also says that he saw him at time he was wounded."

The reputation of these witnesses is reported good by the postmaster at Munfordville, Ky.

In view of the fact that claimant did faithful service for more than three years, more than two years of which service was rendered after he received the injury of left hand, and in view of the fact that said injury was undoubtedly received while he was in the service, although he is unable to furnish evidence showing technical "line of duty," your committee recommend the passage of the bill for his relief.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM BURK.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6245) for the relief of William Burk.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask the consideration of that bill.

Mr. FORD. I rise to a question of order. Do I understand that the order made this evening contemplates that any member present can call up a bill when it is reached on the Calendar? For instance, that a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions could call up his own bills or bills reported by him as they are reached, although the members who may have introduced them are not present to call them up for themselves?

The CHAIRMAN. Any member has the right when the bill is reached on the Calendar to ask its consideration under the order made to-night.

Mr. FORD. Whether interested or not?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to all the provisions and limitations of the pension laws of the United States, the name of William Burk, late lieutenant of Company D, Thirtieth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer United Infantry.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

The claimant filed a claim for pension in the Bureau of Pensions April 19, 1875, which was rejected upon the ground that at the time when the claimant contracted the alleged disability he was not in the military service of the United States.

The records of the War Department show that the claimant was mustered into the service as first lieutenant of Company D, Thirtieth Kentucky Volunteers, to date May 2, 1864.

The claimant alleges that about the month of "December, 1863, he was called to fill the position of first lieutenant of said Company D," and that about the month of February, 1864, at Monticello, Ky., he contracted rheumatism, which has totally disabled him for the performance of manual labor.

Notwithstanding the fact that the records of the War Department fail to show that the claimant was in the service in said company and regiment, there is abundant evidence on file to show that the claimant was, at the time when he alleges he contracted the disability, with the company, and was engaged in the performance and discharge of the duties of a soldier, and did contract rheumatism, which affected his left leg and ankle. The evidence on file establishes also the continuance of said disease to the present time.

The medical examinations show that the claimant's left leg has wasted away, and that there exists anchylosis of the hip, knee, and ankle joints. The evidence filed by claimant satisfactorily shows that prior to his service in said company and regiment the claimant was free from rheumatism. It appears from the evidence that the claimant is in destitute circumstances.

Your committee would recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the word "united" in the seventh line thereof, and by substituting therefor the word "mounted;" and by inserting, after the word "infantry," in the eighth line thereof, the words "and to pay him a pension at the rate of $17 per month," and when so amended that the bill do pass.

The amendments recommended by the committee were adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ABIGAIL SULLIVAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar, the consideration of which was asked by Mr. FINLEY, was the bill (H. R. 6577) granting a pension to Abigail Sullivan.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to all the limitations, restrictions, and provisions of the pension laws of the United States, the name of Abigail Sullivan, widow of the late William Sullivan, late of Company G, Twelfth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6577) granting a pension to Abigail Sullivan, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report:

William Sullivan, husband of Abigail Sullivan, was a soldier in Company G, Twelfth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, from October 15, 1861, to February 20, 1863; that he was discharged on account of disability contracted in the service in January or February, 1862; that his disability continued from date of discharge until his death in 1876, gradually and continuously growing worse; that in his lifetime he applied for pension on account of said disability, which was not allowed until after his death; that after his death his widow applied for pension as his, the soldier's widow, which was rejected on the ground that soldier did not contract the disease of which he died in the service, but that he died from pneumonia.

This conclusion of the Department must have been reached from the testimony of Dr. Baugh and Mary Ann Meisser. The former was not present and did not see soldier during his last sickness, and Mary Ann Meisser was not a physician and only gives her opinion. Dr. Baugh gave his opinion from what he had heard of the case, but testifies that soldier was sound when he entered the service; was in feeble health and not able to labor at date of and after discharge; that prior to his death soldier had been quite feeble, was suffering from general prostration of nervous system, and his lungs were affected from colds and disease contracted in the service. It is also shown by other reliable witnesses and by the record that soldier was partially paralyzed and suffering from rheumatism at date of discharge and suffered from same until his death, having a bad cough and complaining of severe pain in his left leg, hip, side, and breast.

The committee deem it unimportant as to whether pneumonia was the disease with which he died or not, since it is, in the opinion of your committee, evident from the proof before them that soldier contracted such bodily disability in the service of the United States and in line of duty as continued up to and must have invited and necessitated the disease of which he died, and besides, the proof as to the soldier's disability prior to and at time of death constitute a state of case likely to, and most probably did, result in pneumonia.

The committee, after a careful consideration of all the facts presented to them in the records in the Interior Department and other proof, are satisfied this is a meritorious case, and recommend that the bill pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PENELOPE MORTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar, the consideration of which was asked by Mr. THOMAS, of Kentucky, was the bill (H. R. 3690) granting a pension to Penelope Morton, widow of Lieut. James Morton.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Penelope Morton, widow of James Morton, late lieutenant Company F, Twenty-second Regiment Kentucky Volunteers.

Mr. THOMAS, of Kentucky. This bill, Mr. Chairman, or rather a bill identical in all respects with it, was passed by both Houses of Congress at the last session, but failed to receive the approval of the President.

Mr. MATSON. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) is as follows:

A bill was introduced in the Forty-ninth Congress to grant a pension to James Morton, late lieutenant Company F, Twenty-second Regiment Kentucky Volunteers.

The appended report, which the committee adopt, clearly and fully sets forth the evidence in the case:

"[House Report No. 3265, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

"James Morton was mustered into Company F, Twenty-second Kentucky Volunteers January 10, 1862, and resigned February 18, 1863.

"The claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground of no record, and that the disability did not make its appearance until after his resignation.

"The claimant states: December, 1862, he was detailed for picket duty; that it rained all night, and he became thoroughly wet and chilled, and was forced to march next morning without breakfast, and that night slept on some palings taken from a fence to keep out of the water, and the following morning was chilled through and stiff, and caught a severe cold, which lasted until he arrived home. The alleged rheumatism did not make its appearance until a few days after his arrival home, which was in March, 1863.

"Dr. Charles W. Secrest states that he became acquainted with claimant in 1857, and saw him up to his enlistment, and knows that he was an able-bodied man in every respect.

"J. W. Fulton states that he was a physician in early life, and knows claimant was a sound man and free from rheumatism at enlistment.

"W. J. Worthington, colonel of claimant's regiment, states that he knew claimant well prior to and at enlistment, and there was not a more robust man in the command until claimant contracted rheumatism, near Vicksburgh, by exposure to almost continuous rain and having to lie on the damp ground without shelter, and adds that this claim is certainly a meritorious one.

"F. C. Robb, adjutant of claimant's regiment, states that he has known claimant for about twenty-five years, and knows that he was a sound, stout, and healthy man when he entered the service, and believes his (claimant's) rheumatism was the result of exposure to bad weather while in the service.

"Thomas Bush, comrade of claimant, states that—

"'Claimant was very sick after the charge on Chickasaw Bluffs, and vomited a great deal. They were out in the swamp of Mississippi River without tents and exposed to bad weather, and believes claimant's rheumatism resulted from said exposure.'

"Capt. John L. Goodman testifies that—

"'When the claimant went into service he was uncommonly strong and healthy, and free from any disease; that in the latter part of December, 1862, the men had to lie on the wet ground while the army was moving from the mouth of the Yazoo River to Chickasaw Bayou, and on the day the charge was made claimant complained of sickness and looked sick: that he gave out during the charge and was compelled to lie down on the battle-field, and from that time on complained of being sick, claiming it to have been brought on by exposure and lying on the wet ground.'

"John Pratt, claimant's comrade, testifies that—

"'At the charge on Chickasaw Bluffs claimant was taken sick, and affiant knows that it was in consequene of claimant being exposed to the weather.'

"A. S. Davis, another of claimant's comrades, testified substantially as above.

"Lieutenant-Colonel Worthington states that claimant has never recovered from the rheumatism contracted during service, and is now hopelessly and permanently crippled.

"Adjutant Robb states that since claimant came out of service he has been disabled by rheumatism.

"J. W. Fulton, who in early life was a physician, states that he has seen the claimant off and on since his discharge, and that he has suffered continuously from rheumatism, first of an inflammatory character, and then chronic.

"Dr. Secrest states that he saw the claimant in 1867, and he was then not able to help himself on account of rheumatism. Up to 1881 claimant was one-half disabled, and since that time he has been totally disabled until about six months ago, when claimant was able to go on crutches.

"John Moran states that in June or July, 1863, he was working with the claimant, and claimant was then complaining of rheumatism in one of his legs, and had to quit work on account of said disease, and knows claimant has had it every year since.

"Mathew P. Stewart states that he was at claimant's house in 1863, and claimant was then complaining of rheumatism, and was suffering from that disease. Affiant boarded with the claimant from 1864 to 1866, and knows claimant suffered from rheumatism more or less during the time he staid with him.

"Voluminous testimony from the most influential and upright citizens in Greenup County, Kentucky, and Scioto County, Ohio, testify to claimant being a man of honor, standing high in the estimation of all to whom he is known; that claimant at one time possessed a large property, but has consumed it all on account of his disease, and while it lasted would not appeal to the Government for help, and a consideration of his claim would not only be appreciated by the claimant, but by all the old soldiers in his community.

"The claimant is well known to Hon. W. H. Wadsworth, member of the Forty-ninth Congress, who can say that the claimant is a deserving and reputable citizen.

"Your committee, after an examination of the case, find the claim to be a meritorious one. They therefore recommend the passage of the bill, amended by striking out lines 6 and 7 and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'of James Morton, late lieutenant Company F, Twenty-second Regiment Kentucky Volunteers.'"

Before said bill was finally acted on the said James Morton died. A bill was then introduced in the Forty-ninth Congress granting a pension to Penelope Morton, widow of said James Morton. This bill passed both Houses late in the session and was sent to the President for his approval, but not in time for his examination, and the bill failed for want of approval. Said bill is hereto attached and referred to. The bill under consideration is the same as passed and referred to above.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

During the reading of the report,

Mr. WILLIAMS said: I move to dispense with the further reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The gentleman from Kentucky has stated that this bill passed both Houses of Congress at the last session, but failed to receive Executive sanction. If there be no further objection, the reading of the report will be dispensed with, and it will be ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report is printed above.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JANE BROWN DUNN.

The next business on the Private Calendar, the consideration of which was asked by Mr. MATSON, was the bill (H. R. 8159) granting a pension to Jane Brown Dunn.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jane Brown Dunn, daughter of William H. H. Dunn, late a private in Company A, Sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, and Company L, Fourth Indiana Cavalry, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8159) granting a pension to Jane Brown Dunn, submit the following report:

William H. H. Dunn was a private in Company A, Sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, and in Company L, Fourth Indiana Cavalry, in which service he died on the 4th of December, 1863. His only child, Jane Brown Dunn, then a minor, was pensioned at the rate of $8 per month, commencing June 4, 1864, and ending by limitation December 5, 1877.

She now represents that she is prostrate and utterly helpless from spinal disease; that the death of her father left her without relatives and entirely dependent upon strangers upon whom she has no claim, and she prays for the passage of a special act for her relief.

Respectable citizens of Hanover, Ind., the home of the petitioner, make the following statement:

"To our knowledge she has been for over a year entirely prostrated, so as not to be able to raise herself in her bed, and we are sure the granting of a pension to her will meet the approbation of all who know the helpless condition in which she is placed.

"J. B. GARRITT,
"Professor of Hanover College.
"W. T. RANKIN,
"Merchant.
"DAVID ENNIS,
"Late Captain Company A, Twenty-second Indiana Volunteers.
"F. J. BRANDT,
"Postmaster, Hanover, Ind.
"L. H. JONES,
"Late Private Company I, One hundred and forty-fifth Indiana Volunteers."

Dr. E. L. Conklin, of Madison, Ind., makes oath that Jane B. Dunn is and has been under his professional care, and that she is a confirmed invalid from curvature of the spine.

The pension laws do not apply to the case of this helpless and dependent daughter of the dead soldier, but there are precedents for extending relief by special enactments in cases of this kind. The committee therefore report the bill favorably, and recommend that it do pass with an amendments triking out the word "twelve," in line 9, and inserting "eighteen."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES W. SANBORN.

The next business on the Private Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. DINGLEY) was the bill (H. R. 362) to increase the pension of Charles W. Sanborn.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Charles W. Sanborn, late a private in Company H, Seventeenth Maine Regiment, by giving said Sanborn a proper rating for right inguinal hernia, as an additional disability to those for which he is now pensioned.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 362) to increase the pension of Charles W. Sanborn, having considered the same, report as follows:

Claimant was a private in Company H, Seventeenth Maine Volunteers, and was pensioned for chronic diarrhea and gunshot wound of the foot, but failed to include hernia in his application. Soldier subsequently made application for an increase on account of hernia, which claim was rejected by the Department.

The evidence on file in this case conclusively shows that before soldier was discharged, and while at home on furlough and dangerously sick, a hernia appeared. On this point Dr. Albion Cobb testifies in these words:

"I am a surgeon and physician, and as such have, from time to time, since my return from the Army, attended Charles W. Sanborn. Said Sanborn has, and had at the time of his discharge from the service of the United States, a scrotal hernia on the right side, in regard to which I have repeatedly given advice and treatment; that being a medical officer in the same division with said Sanborn I knew him while in the Army at the front, and knew that he was sick with chronic diarrhea, and thereby reduced to an extreme degree of debility, and I believe and have no doubt that the debility, together with the violent straining occasioned by said diarrhea, was the predisposing and exciting cause of said hernia."

This claim was specially examined, and the special examiner found as follows: "I have no doubt but the hernia resulted from weakness, as is alleged. The surrounding circumstances were such that the witnesses could not well be mistaken as to the time they saw the hernia, as the soldier required the same care as an infant. As to his emaciated and feeble condition for at least eight months there can be no doubt. I think the claim meritorious, and recommend its admission."

It need only be added that soldier before discharge was for a long time so sick as to require constant and unremitting care, and that during that time the hernia appeared, unquestionably due to extreme debility and the results of straining at stool, and that the hernia was seen and examined by many persons during that time, including one physician. Your committee are fully persuaded that a mistake was made in not allowing this claim in the Pension Office, and therefore report the bill back favorably, and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

RAPHAEL FOWLER.

The next business on the Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. WEBER) was the bill (H. R. 8217) granting a pension to Raphael Fowler.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the name of Raphael Fowler be placed upon the pension-roll of the United States as the dependent father of Raphael S. Fowler, late a private in the Fifty-seventh Regiment Illinois Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) is as follows:

That it satisfactorily appears from the evidence in this case that Mr. Fowler, the beneficiary, is now a man seventy-three years of age, and is now living with and supported by one of his sons; that in the fall of 1860 his wife died, leaving him with eight children, five sons and three daughters, the oldest then being twenty-three years of age, and the youngest being three years of age; that in the fall of the same year he, with three of his children, was taken sick, and one of the children died. He was then compelled to break up his family, placing the younger ones with relatives.

Immediately on the breaking out of the war of the rebellion his oldest son enlisted in the Twenty-seventh Regiment New York Volunteers; that another son enlisted in the Ninth Illinois Cavalry; that another son, Raphael S. Fowler, in October, 1861, enlisted in the Fifty-seventh Regiment Illinois Volunteers; that being anxious to be with this last son, his namesake, the beneficiary, though past the age for military service, enlisted in the same company with his son, Raphael, and served with him until his death, he being killed in the battle of Corinth, Miss., in 1862.

The son left surviving him neither mother, wife, nor child. That the beneficiary remained in the service until July, 1865, he having re-enlisted in the Fifty-seventh Regiment Illinois Veteran Volunteers, when he was honorably discharged. That he has lost all property of every kind; has become too old and feeble to support himself by his own manual labor, and is now entirely dependent upon others for his support. That all his children are in poor circumstances, with families depending upon them for support.

The committee think that this poor old man, having given to his country the service of himself and three of his sons, and the life of one of them, and now dependent upon others for his support, is justly entitled to the relief given by this bill, and they therefore recommend that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EVELINE M. ALEXANDER.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4578) granting a pension to Eveline M. Alexander, widow of Bvt. Brig. Gen. Andrew J. Alexander.

Mr. WHEELER. If the gentleman is not present who introduced the bill I ask that it be considered.

Mr. WEBER. Let me state to the gentleman from Alabama that Mr. SAWYER is necessarily absent.

Mr. WHEELER. At the suggestion of some gentlemen around me, that the gentleman from New York may desire to be present, I withdraw the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

ELIZA ANN SHAVER.

The next business on the Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. SEYMOUR) was the bill (H. R. 891) granting a pension to Eliza Ann Shaver.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eliza Ann Shaver, as mother of Benjamin N. Shaver, late of Company E, Twenty-second Regiment New York State Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 891) granting a pension to Eliza Ann Shaver, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Eliza Ann Shaver is the foster-mother of Benjamin N. Shaver, who enlisted in Company E, Twenty-second Regiment New York Cavalry, December 18, 1863, and died November 6, 1864, while a prisoner of war, at Salisbury, N. C.

The soldier, as shown by the evidence, was adopted by the claimant at the age of three weeks, and was taken care of and provided for by her until enlistment at the age of seventeen years. She was a widow at the adoption of the soldier, and has remained so ever since. Was never possessed of any real estate, while her personal property does not exceed in value the sum of $125. For many years, and up to within a short time, she was supported by a son-in-law, but his death has cut off this avenue of support, and at the age of seventy-six is now left without means of adequate support. The evidence also shows that the soldier contributed to the claimant's support during his service. She has no status before the Pension Bureau, because the law provides for natural mothers only.

But Congress having in similar cases granted relief, and believing from the evidence presented that the case under consideration is meritorious, your committee report favorably on the accompanying bill and ask that it do pass, amended, however, by inserting after the word "as," in line 6, the word "foster," and also after the word "cavalry," in line 8, the words "and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EDMUND RYAN.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. BELDEN) was the bill (H. R. 7097) granting a pension to Edmund Ryan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Edmund Ryan, dependent father of Michael Ryan, late of Company K, Twelfth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension under the provisions and limitations of the general pension law.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7097) granting a pension to Edmund Ryan, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Edmund Ryan is the father of Michael Ryan, who was killed in battle at Bull Run, August 30, 1862, while serving as private in Company K, Twelfth Regiment New York Volunteers.

The father applied for pension October 2, 1878, but his claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that he was able to support himself at time of the son's death.

About 1859 claimant and his son, the soldier, contracted for the purchase of a salt block in Onondaga County, New York, and in security therefor mortgaged a house and lot, all the property the father owned. The son's enlistment necessitated the employment of a laborer, which reduced the profits in the works, and gradually the business began to run down, until the mortgage upon the house and lot was foreclosed. Claimant was thus left without means of support except that derived from his daily labor. For a time he was employed at the salt-works at a salary of $25 per month, but old age has compelled him to abandon all work, and, at the age of eighty-two years, he is dependent upon the charity of others.

Congress has always liberally responded to appeals made by dependent parents of deceased soldiers, who, under the provisions of existing laws, are prevented from a successful prosecution of their claims before the Pension Bureau.

The case under consideration appears to be meritorious and coming within the well-established precedents. Your committee therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill, and ask that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EMELINE C. YOUNG.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. BELDEN) was the bill (H. R. 6949) granting a pension to Emaline C. Young.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Emaline C. Young, widow of Roswell Young, late of Company D, One hundred and forty-ninth New York Volunteers, and pay her a pension, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension law.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendment:

In line 5 strike out "Emaline" and insert "Emeline."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Emeline C. Young."

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read in part.

Mr. SPINOLA (interrupting the reading). I ask unanimous consent that only the findings of the committee be read, and that the report be printed in full in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The report in full is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6949) granting a pension to Emeline C. Young, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

The claimant is the widow of Roswell Young, who enlisted in Company D, One hundred and forty-ninth New York Volunteers, September 5, 1862, and was discharged therefrom August 15, 1865. He received a shell wound of shoulder at the battle of Chancellorsville, Va., May 3, 1863, for which he drew a pension at date of his death, February 8, 1885.

The widow's claim has been rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that in the opinion of the medical referee the death-cause is not shown to be chargeable to the soldier's military service.

Dr. Erastus S. Mumford, the attending physician, and who made a post-mortem examination of the body, testifies:

"Attended the soldier about a month in spring of 1883. Had severe pain in left side, extending from the shoulder into the back and hip. Had high fever and vomiting. It was difficult to diagnose the case, but attributed the trouble to the wound of shoulder. In July and August, 1883, soldier was confined to bed, suffering from the same symptoms.

"From that time until November, 1884, affiant treated soldier more or less for the same trouble in a milder form. On December 26, 1884, found soldier in bed, weak, vomiting, pain in side, with hardened condition of stomach and liver, and continued to treat him until his death, February 8, 1885. Post-mortem found an enlarged liver scirrhus, extensive disease of stomach and pancreas. The whole upper part of the abdominal cavity was broken down, and the organs contained therein in a state of suppuration. There is no history of cancer in the family, and it was affiant's opinion that the disease was induced by the acute and chronic inflammation which had supervened from the wound of shoulder."

The wound was evidently a serious one, as soldier was under treatment for a long time after its receipt and transferred to the Invalid Corps. There is also record of treatment for chronic rheumatism while in the service.

Claimant was married to the soldier in 1844. After the receipt of his wound she went to the hospital in which he was treated and remained there as nurse, giving much of her time to the care of other wounded soldiers. She is now old and left without friends or means of support.

The soldier's death-cause is known, but the origin of the fatal disease must necessarily be more or less involved in doubt; but the sworn statement of the attending physician, who stands high socially and professionally, would seem to justify your committee in solving the doubts in the case in favor of this old and poor widow, and therefore return the accompanying bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

The amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JESSIE M. BARTHAUER.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was the bill (H. R. 8722) granting a pension to Jessie M. Barthauer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jessie M. Barthauer, widow of William C. Barthauer, late private of Company A, One hundredth Regiment New York Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read in part.

Mr. CHIPMAN (interrupting the reading). I suggest that only the letter part of the report be read, containing the recommendation of Commissioner Black.

There was no objection.

The report in full is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions have had presented for their consideration, under the joint resolution of May 29, 1830, through the honorable Secretary of the Interior, a letter addressed to him by the honorable Commissioner of Pensions, recommending favorable consideration of the pension claim of Jessie M. Barthauer.

From this letter and the files of the Pension Bureau it appears that Jessie M. Barthauer is the widow of William C. Barthauer, who served as private in Company A, One hundredth New York Volunteers, from August 22, 1862, to May 8, 1865. At the assault at Fort Wagner, July 18, 1863, he received a serious wound of left hand resulting in nearly total loss of same. He also received a gunshot wound of left thigh. From these wounds he suffered more or less the rest of his life. The pains became excruciating, often depriving him of sleep. He had necrosis of the bone of left wrist, and an open ulcer; the thumb had been amputated and the four fingers were stiff and entirely useless.

In the left thigh there was atrophy of the muscles, and an injury to the sciatic nerve. To relieve the suffering due to his wounds, morphine was taken under medical advice, increasing the doses as his sufferings became more intense. For the six days preceding his death his pains had been so severe that he could not sleep, but he abstained from the use of morphine until the night before his death, when he purchased ten half-grain pills. The next evening the attending physician was called in and found him in coma. The patient did not recover therefrom, dying six hours later.

The Commissioner of Pensions says:

"This claim is recommended for the action of Congress for the reason that the deceased had no suicidal intent, but resorted to the use of the narcotic which caused his death for the purpose of relieving the intense suffering caused by the wounds received in the service."

Your committee concur in the recommendation of the Department, and therefore submit a bill for the relief of the widow, and ask that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES LUCAS.

The next business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. CLARK) was the bill (S. 1096) granting a pension to James Lucas.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James Lucas, late a private in Company H, One hundred and eleventh Regiment Ohio Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read in part.

Mr. O'DONNELL. I request that the further reading of the report be dispensed with, and that it be printed in full in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The report in full is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1096) granting a pension to James Lucas, have examined the same and report:

The full statement of facts contained in the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is hereto attached and made a part hereof, induce the committee to believe that this is a meritorious case, and they therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill granting a pension to James Lucas, have examined the same and report:

"A bill to pension this claimant passed the Forty-ninth Congress. The report was full, showing clearly that he was entitled to a pension. That report was as follows, and is adopted:

"The claimant was a private in Company H, One hundred and eleventh Regiment Ohio Volunteers. His military record is without blemish. In the beginning of the year 1881 he applied for a pension, alleging his disability to be rheumatism, incurred in the service. The Pension Office rejected him 'on the ground that the disease alleged, rheumatism, had not disabled him to such an extent as to entitle him to a pension, as shown by the evidence.'

"The claimant appealed from this decision, and the Pension Office was sustained by the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, which, like the first decision, is based entirely on the report of the medical examining boards.

"The committee do not agree with the conclusions of the Pension Office and the Assistant Secretary, but assume that there is ample testimony to show that the man is disabled and has been so since his discharge.

"John W. Smith, captain of his company, says, of his own knowledge, claimant incurred the disability alleged, rheumatism and pains in the back, which still (April, 1881) exist.

"In April, 1881, Dr. Bishop, of Fond du Lac, Wis., the claimant's home since the war, swears that he treated him periodically the last previous ten years for pain in the left side and for rheumatism, which at times was so severe as to totally disable him. This, as medical testimony, is more reliable than that of the examining boards, before which, after three examinations, all of which did not probably consume an hour, he is dismissed with the information that there is nothing the matter with him, only that he was a broken-down old man.

"James H. Pease, of Fond du Lac, has known the claimant since 1870, during all of which time he has been afflicted with weak back and joints, and rheumatism; that he has been unable to labor to any extent, and often not at all—sometimes confined to his bed. Nine respectable citizens of Fond du Lac testify that they have known the claimant many years, some of them since he returned from the war, and that he has been continuously afflicted with rheumatism and unable to labor to any material degree. Here, then, we have the evidence of the captain of claimant's company, who also has a good record; that of a respectable and regularly attending physician, and nine reputable citizens, most of them known to the Senator who makes this report, against the reports of the examining boards, one of which says, when pressed for a careful examination:

"'The muscles and tendons appear normal and healthy. He is 5 feet 6 inches high; actual weight, 124 pounds.'

"The committee can not reconcile the statements that he is a broken-down old man, reduced by emaciation to 124 pounds, with 'muscles and tendons in a normal and healthy condition.'

"The committee report the bill favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BASILE CHAMPAGNE.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. CASWELL) was the bill (S. 801) for the relief of Basile Champagne.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Basile Champagne, late private in Company B, First Wisconsin Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read in part.

Mr. SPINOLA. I ask that the further reading of the report be dispensed with, except the recommendations of the committee, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The report in full is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 801) for the relief of Basile Champagne, have examined the same, and report:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions in this case, hereto attached and made a part hereof, makes a very full statement of the facts in this case and commends the case to the committee, and they therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 801) granting a pension to Basile Champagne, have examined the same, and report:

"The claimant enlisted September 14, 1861, in Company B, First Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, and he was discharged March 2, 1863. Prior to enlistment he worked in the northern pineries in his State, and the evidence shows that he was a healthy, hardy young man. He was discharged for disability incurred in the service, and the surgeon calls his disease hepatization of the right lung. The claimant disavows any affection of this character, but says he was treated for diarrhea and kidney trouble. He says the diarrhea was cured, but the kidney disease has gradually increased, and that its severity is and for a long time has been such as to disqualify him for manual labor

"The claim was rejected—that for chronic diarrhea, on the ground that he had not suffered from this cause since discharge; and that for kidney disease, because the War Department has no record that he was so afflicted, and because the claimant is unable to furnish evidence of its origin and existence. It is true that the War Department has no record that he had and was treated for kidney disease. Such accurate information is not furnished, nor can it be expected from this source. The Adjutant-General, however, does report that—

"'From enrollment to April 30, 1862, he was present. May and June, 1862, absent without remark. Return for June, 1862, sick at Shelbyville. Return for July, 1862, same. Return for September and October, 1862, in hospital at Bowling Green, Ky. So reported to February 28, 1863. March and April, 1863, discharged at Bowling Green for disability.'

"It is well known that the Department resources for information in pension cases are very meager, often contradictory, and seldom satisfactory. It is something in this case that they show that he was sick and required care and medical treatment for months in hospital. He probably did have diarrhea, for it was prevalent among soldiers, but he admits candidly that he recovered from it. He insists pertinaciously upon being pensioned for kidney disease, and there is evidence that he had it in the service, has it now, and has had it in the interval between the time of his discharge and the present time.

"Two witnesses, who are not impeached, swear that they were well acquainted with claimant from 1856 until he enlisted, and know that he was a sound man.

"Two of his comrades swear that they were with him in hospital; that he was treated for diarrhea; that he had a lame back, and they were informed it was from kidney disease.

"Another comrade, who was in hospital with him, says he was told that he had trouble with his kidneys, and he knows that he complained a great deal of his back and had to go to the sink very often.

"On examination by the special examiner, who is trying to make the witness contradict himself as to kidney disease, this witness says:

"'I do not really know that it was kidney disease, but I heard him complain of a lame back and said he had a pain there.'

"Again he volunteers this remark:

"'We were two pretty-looking birds when we were discharged. I weighed about 90 pounds and he about the same.'

"Here is what Dr. Cooper, a respectable citizen of Green Bay, says:

"'I have lived and practiced medicine in Green Bay and vicinity for the last thirty years; was surgeon of the Seventh Wisconsin Infantry; have known Basil Champagne, who is claimant for a pension, since the year 1865; have attended him and his family; he has been afflicted with general disability, a manifest disease of the kidneys, which will terminate in Bright's disease; he has been under treatment most of the time; I have kept no memorandum, but have considered his case hopeless.'

"There are three medical reports of surgeons directed to examine the claimant by the Pension Bureau, no two of which agree. The board at Fond du Lac report that there are no signs of kidney disease; that he is not well nourished; physical appearance is not good; the lungs are sound, but they found a severe follicular pharyngitis, causing cough and expectoration, which seems to indicate that there is inflammation in the passage from the throat to the stomach.

"The examining surgeon at Fort Howard makes a very superficial report,

He says examination does not reveal any particular disease of the kidneys. The symptoms point to some functional disease of the bladder, involving the ureters and perhaps the kidneys to some extent. From what he can learn from general appearance claimant is able to perform ordinary manual labor.

"If this doctor had explained that there are two ureters, one on each side, that they are the excretory ducts conveying the urine from the kidneys to the bladder, he would have shown that they are both diseased and that they are a severe and sympathetic cause of suffering.

"Dr. Reeve, examining surgeon at Appleton, says:

"'Applicant is, in my judgment, suffering from chronic nephritis, manifested by pain and tenderness in the region of kidneys, particularly the left one, by frequent urination, and by general weakness. And he rates him three-fourths disabled. Nephritis is in common terms inflammation of the kidneys.'

"The claimant was rejected by the Pension Office, and on appeal he had honestly admitted that his diarrhea was cured, but persisted in claiming that he had kidney disease, incurred in the service; and on this he is rejected on the ground that the War Department furnishes no evidence of it. In the opinion of the committee there is sufficient evidence to establish the incurrence and the existence of the disease.

"It is urged against him, in the rejection by Interior Department, that he delayed his application fifteen years. It is a well-known fact that soldiers postpone application from a dread of encountering the delays and difficulties attending the prosecution of a claim. He may have been tardy in claiming the compensation he earned and needs, but it lacks but two months of nine years since he filed his application, only to be rejected after having, in the opinion of the committee, established his claim by competent proof.

"The bill is reported favorably with the recommendation that it do pass."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DAVID A. SERVIS.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. GUENTHER) was the bill (S. 820) granting a pension to David A. Servis.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred above bill (S. 820) granting a pension to David A. Lewis, submit the following report:

This is a peculiar case. The claim was rejected at the Pension Office on the ground that the injury was not due to the service. A case similar to this has received the favorable report of the committee at this session.

The facts as established in the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, hereto attached and made a part hereof, present a case which by that committee and former committees have been favorably reported upon, and they therefore recommend the passage of this bill.

"The claimant was a private in Company B, Twenty-first Wisconsin Volunteers, and he claims a pension for injury to his eyes by the accidental discharge of a cartridge. The testimony shows that while at Bridgeport, Ala., acting as hospital nurse, one of his comrades filled a large pipe which claimant was in the habit of smoking with powder, placing a thin layer of tobacco on top; that claimant, ignorant of the trick, lighted the pipe, which exploded and blew him half across the tent. There is no record testimony in the case, nor does it appear that any notice was taken of this wanton act of his tent-mate.

"The application was rejected on the ground that the injury, to whatsoever extent it exists, was not due to the service. It was incurred in the service. It was due to the willful and reprehensible act of a soldier, for whose conduct the military branch of the Government was responsible. If he had killed this claimant, his wife would have been pensioned. That he escaped death and incurred injury to the most sensitive and valuable organ of his physical structure does not exempt the Government from the obligation of compensation and relief. Surely the Government is as responsible in this case as is the corporation that by accident destroys life or limb, and upon which the decisions of the United States courts have repeatedly imposed pecuniary penalties.

"The committee believe that the claimant should be pensioned to the extent of the existing damage to his eye-sight, and report the bill favorably with a recommendation that it do pass."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PERKINS). The Chair requests the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER.] In the report the applicant in this case has a different name from what appears in the bill. Which is correct?

Mr. GUENTHER. At this moment I do not know. I suppose the name David A. Servis, as it appears in the bill, is correct.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MELVINA GREENWOOD.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration was the bill (S. 805) granting a pension to Melvina Greenwood.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Melvina Greenwood, widow of William B. Greenwood, late a private in Company B, of the Sixteenth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read in part.

Mr. SPINOLA (interrupting the reading). I ask that the further reading of the report be dispensed with, except the conclusion.

There was no objection.

The report in full is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 805) granting a pension to Melvina Greenwood, submit the following report:

They have carefully examined the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions on above bill, and which is made a part of this report:

"The claimant is the widow of William B. Greenwood, private Company B, Sixteenth Wisconsin. She claims that he died of disease contracted in the service, and the Pension Office sets up the objection that he was diseased before enlistment.

"The Army doctor who issued the discharge certificate says he is unfit for duty by reason of heart affection, superinduced by rheumatism prior to entering the service. He was examined, pronounced sound, and accepted as sound at the time of enlistment. He was put on guard duty at Camp Randall, Madison, Wis., where, by severe exposure, it is claimed he incurred the disease of which he died.

"Twelve witnesses, some of them physicians who knew him well, testified that he was entirely sound, and all disavow the superinducing cause of rheumatism.

"The examiner who briefed the case rejects on the ground that Katharine K. Armstrong testifies that before enlistment the soldier was compelled to seek a change of climate. This witness, who was his elder sister, and in his youth supplied the place of a mother, says that when he was a boy he took cold easily; that he went to Buenos Ayres, remained four years, and came back sound and healthy. But the examiner, tenacious to reject, says:

"'It is presumed that even if the heart disease did not exist prior to enlistment, the foundation for it was laid.'

"And the widow is deprived of her pension on the presumption of a possible but not probable 'foundation.'

"A large proportion, if not a majority, of the pension cases appealed to Congress are rejected by the Pension Office on the ground of prior existence of disease. In the opinion of the committee this is not good ground for rejection, because it is an implied admission of the inefficiency of the Government's agents to determine soundness, and a repudiation of the obligation ensuing the examination and acceptance of the soldier. In this case the committee do not accept the fact of the existence of disease before enlistment, nor the presumption that the soldier in his youth laid a foundation for it.

"The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass."

They have also carefully examined the papers on file in the Pension Office. There was no dispute about the fact that the soldier had the heart disease while in the Army and died from that disease, or that the beneficiary was the lawful wife of the soldier.

The claim was rejected simply on the ground that the cause of the disease which produced death existed prior to enlistment. The only evidence upon which this was based, aside from the statement in certificate of discharge that the disease existed prior to enlistment, was contained in the affidavit of his sister, "that in his boyhood he was subject to coughs and liable, upon exposure, to cold; that she supposed at one time that his lungs were affected, and a change of climate was advised; that on account of such advice he left the State of Wisconsin and went to Buenos Ayres, in South America; that after a lapse of four and one-half years he returned apparently perfectly healthy, and that she never heard him complain of heart disease or of any affection of the heart; that he was always, after his return, strong and hearty and able to and did work at his trade as a carpenter and at farming."

The evidence shows the soldier was properly examined by the United States examining surgeon and received into the service.

Dr. James J. Brown testifies that during the year 1864, and at the time the soldier was discharged, he was assistant physician at the hospital where the soldier then was and from which he was discharged, and that he had reason to suppose that the soldier was under his care; that he does not know, and did not know at the time of his examination, that the disease on which the soldier was discharged was superinduced before enlistment by rheumatism or any other disease, and that he believes such a statement in his discharge may be unjust to the soldier and without proper knowledge of the fact.

A large number of witnesses, his acquaintances, having opportunities for knowing, testify as to his soundness prior to and at the time of his enlistment. The agent of the Government examined him and pronounced him sound. The evidence further shows that while on duty in the service he was exposed to storm and rain with poor protection against cold and rain; was soon taken sick with the measles and sent to the hospital, where he remained until transferred to another hospital and discharged therefrom with the heart difficulty.

The committee are of the opinion, from all the evidence in this case, that the evidence strongly corroborates the declaration of the surgeon examining him at the time of his enlistment, who then pronounced him sound and healthy, and they therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EMMA VON BERNEWITZ.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. CLARK) was the bill (S. 1717) granting a pension to Emma Von Bernewitz.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emma Von Bernewitz, a nurse in the Medical Department, United States Army.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read in part.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I ask that the further reading of the report be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The report in full is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1717) granting a pension to Emma Von Bernewitz, submit the following report:

The Committee on Pensions in the Senate made the following report on this bill:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill granting a pension to Emma Von Bernewitz, have examined the same, and report:

"Mrs. Von Bernewitz served as nurse in the Medical Department nearly three years. She made application to the Pension Office and filed proofs, but the Commissioner of Pensions informed her that her only resource was by special legislation. It is not questioned that she performed the service claimed, nor that she is entitled to relief.

"The bill is reported favorably with a recommendation that it do pass."

The committee would further state that from the evidence in the case, from the report of the Surgeon-General's Office, it appears that she was in the service of the United States as army nurse at general hospital at Quincy, Ill., from September, 1863, and the certificate of the surgeon, United States Army, at Quincy aforesaid, dated May 31, 1865, grants her an honorable discharge at that date.

Dr. F. W. John Rittler, in his affidavit, states—

"He has been a practicing physician, practicing medicine at Quincy, Ill., since before the war; had known Mrs. Von Bernewitz since 1859, and knew her and saw her while acting as nurse. When she entered the hospital as nurse in fall of 1862 she was a strong, healthy woman, with apparently sound eyes. She devoted her energy, strength, and health in taking care of the sick and wounded in this hospital. When she was honorably discharged from the service of the United States she returned a broken-down woman physically, and with a disease of the eyes, contracted, no doubt, by coming in contact with contagious diseases while in the United States service. That affiant has known said Emma Von Bernewitz ever since he met her in 1859, and she has not been able since leaving said United States hospital to perform any manual labor, nor could she, on account of her weak eyes, fill any position in an office, which, with her education, she could otherwise have filled. She has since earned a living by giving music lessons. Affiant states these facts from personal knowledge."

This testimony is fully corroborated by the testimony of two ladies who knew her when she entered said hospital and while there and ever since, and show her present condition to be a woman broken down in health, with sore eyes, which has continued since her service in the hospital, and that she is compelled to earn a living by giving music lessons.

The committee believe this a meritorious case, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM HEALY.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 806) granting a pension to William Healy, reported adversely from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

On motion of Mr. DOCKERY, the bill was indefinitely postponed.

JAMES M'CAFFREY.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. PERKINS) was the bill (H. R. 215) granting a pension to James McCaffrey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James McCaffrey, dependent father of Edward McCaffrey, late first lieutenant of Company A, One hundred and sixty-fourth New York Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The claimant is the father of Lieut. Edward McCaffrey, of Company A, One hundred and sixty-fourth New York Infantry, who was killed in the battle of Cold Harbor. The mother of the soldier died prior to the war. The application for pension was rejected on the ground that the father at the time of his son's death was able to support himself by manual labor, though it is shown that he had comparatively no property at that time and that the son contributed generously to his support. The father is now sixty-six years of age, so crippled by rheumatism that he can perform no labor, and without means of support.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES H. DARLING.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. PERKINS) was the bill (H. R. 780) granting a pension to James H. Darling.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James H. Darling, late of Company G, Seventy-third Regiment Ohio Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

Claimant was a private of Company G, Seventy-third Ohio Volunteers, having enlisted November 19, 1861, and was discharged December 12, 1862. On June 18, 1879, claimant filed his application for a pension, alleging that he contracted rheumatism at Camp Logan, Ohio, about January 20, 1862; his claim was rejected because "the evidence failed to show the origin of the alleged disability in the service and line of duty," and the claimant alleging his inability to furnish the required proof as to origin.

Two neighbors, who had known claimant for thirty years, testified in 1881 that he was a stout, able-bodied man, able to do all manner of farm work before his enlistment, and know that claimant had no such thing as rheumatism. It is shown by the testimony of Comrades McKee and Makinson that claimant broke down with rheumatism at Camp Fetterman, West Virginia, and was sent home about February 1, 1862, on account of his disability. In corroboration of this the report of the adjutant-general, United States Army, shows:

"Claimant reported on roll for March and April, 1862; at home, on sick-list, May and June, 1862; absent without leave, July and August, 1862; deserted March 5, 1862. Charges of desertion and absence without leave are removed; he went to his home in Jackson County, Ohio, by proper military authority, some time during March or April, 1862, where he remained sick and unable to travel to December 12, 1862, when he reported at Columbus, Ohio; he was discharged at that post December 12, 1862, on surgeon's certificate of disability."

It is shown by the evidence that claimant has been a sufferer from rheumatism since his discharge, at times being compelled to use crutches. Two medical examinations by examining surgeons of the Pension Office, dated March 7, 1881, and March 22, 1882, show him to be disabled by rheumatism, and the affidavit of Dr. C. Campbell, of Cherrydale, Kans., dated March 24, 1885, shows him still disabled.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

MARY MONTI.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. RICE) was the bill (H. R. 2529) granting a pension to Mary Monti.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Monti, widow of Ferdinand Monti, formerly an employé in the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army during the war with Mexico, and pay her a pension from the date of the death of her husband.

The report (by Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina) was read, as follows:

Ferdinand Monti, the deceased husband of the petitioner, was a pensioner by special act of Congress at the date of his death, which, the testimony of his physician shows, was accelerated by the loss of his leg.

It is shown in the evidence on which the special act was allowed that he served from 1846 to December, 1848, as a wagon-master in the Quartermaster's Department, during the war with Mexico, and that while in the line of duty at Vera Cruz, engaged in removing quartermaster stores and arms from that city, he was shot in the left leg above the knee, and in consequence of which his leg was amputated.

He also participated in the battle at Pueblo, and for gallant conduct during that engagement and for meritorious services to the Government he was presented by Congress, through General Lane, with a silver medal. (See Report 179, vol. 4, H. R. Reports, second session, Forty-third Congress.)

His widow would be entitled to a pension under existing laws if her deceased husband had been an enlisted man, or his name mentioned in any public act of Congress, or the one under which the medal was awarded to him, which act was of a general and not of a specific character. Mrs. Monti is poor and dependent upon her own exertions for a living, and is over sixty-two years of age.

Your committee respectfully recommend that the bill herewith reported be amended so as to strike out the words "and pay her a pension from the date of the death of her husband," where the same appear in lines 8 and 9, and that it do pass as amended.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES GLAMANN.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. LYMAN) was the bill (H. R. 2215) granting a pension to Charles Glamann.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll the name of Charles Glamann, late of Company C, Ninety-second Illinois Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. SPOONER) is as follows:

Charles Glamann was a private of Company C, Ninety-second Illinois Volunteers. His claim for pension was rejected by the Pension Office upon the ground that the injury to his left arm, upon which his claim is founded, was not incurred while in the line of duty within the meaning of the general pension law.

The soldier seems to have been somewhat unpopular with some of his comrades, and while in camp with his company, and engaged in cooking for his mess, a brick or part of a brick was thrown by a comrade, James Malarky, with whom he had previously had some difficulty, which struck Glamann's left arm near the elbow, producing a serious injury, from which he is yet suffering. Glamann does not appear to have been at fault or engaged in a quarrel at the time.

Dr. James Bradley, an examining surgeon for the Pension Office, gives the following description of injury and its results:

"The injury above named is a fracture of the olecranon process, a separation of the fractured ends, by putting the arm in semi-flexed position, as applicant states, a ligamentous union as a result. Arm can not be entirely straightened, and supination is limited, the arm possessing that quality to one-half or two-thirds the extent of the sound arm."

Under rulings of the Commissioner, the Pension Office holds that where a soldier has sustained injury, however serious, by the assault of a comrade, even if such assault was without fault upon the part of the soldier, no pension can be granted under general law.

Your committee and Congress have, however, frequently relaxed the rule, and granted pension for injuries and disabilities incurred in such circumstances; and, considering this case as one within the lines established by many precedents and fairly entitled to such recognition, recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment, by inserting in the fourth line of the bill, after the word "pension-roll," the words, "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LEWIS FICHTHORN.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. SPOONER) was the bill (H. R. 2174) granting a pension to Lewis Fichthorn.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Lewis Fichthorn, late a private in Company K, One hundred and thirty-first Pennsylvania Infantry Volunteers, and in Company F, Twenty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. SPOONER) is as follows:

Your committee find that Lewis Fichthorn was a private in Company K, One hundred and thirty-first Pennsylvania Infantry Volunteers, and in Company F, Twenty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers.

His claim for pension was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the evidence failed to show satisfactorily that the soldier's disability—bronchitis and lung disease—originated in the service.

The testimony in the case is voluminous, including testimony taken by special examiners of the Pension Office, and is conclusive in showing that the soldier at the time of and prior to his enlistment was an unusually sound, vigorous, and healthy man. It is equally clear and conclusive that he is now, and for years past has been, suffering from serious throat and lung diseases of continuously-increasing severity, entirely incapacitating him for any manual labor.

Upon the question of incurrence of said disease there is some unreliable and contradictory testimony on file, but, rejecting all that seems of doubtful character, there remains the testimony of neighbors, employers, and comrades to establish to the satisfaction of your committee that the claim and statement under oath of the soldier are true, and that his name should be placed on the pension-roll.

The original cause of the soldier's disease was a cold contracted while on guard at barracks in Philadelphia in March, 1864, resulting in temporary loss of voice, bronchitis, and lung disease of varying but increasing severity thenceforth to the present time, accompanied from time to time during a number of years past by hemorrhages, as the result of which the soldier has become a feeble, emaciated invalid, almost entirely disabled, and growing feebler day by day.

The evidence clearly establishes that he was a good, faithful soldier, serving his country with loyal devotion, and as a result of which service we find him to-day a helpless invalid, and clearly demanding the recognition from his country which he now asks.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELLIOTT JOHNSON.

The next bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE) was the bill (H. R. 8285) to remove the political disabilities of Elliott Johnson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the legal and political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, by reason of participation in the late rebellion, be, and they hereby are, removed from Elliott Johnson, of Accomack County, in the State of Virginia.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DELILAH VANDEVENDER.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. MATSON) was the bill (H. R. 4831) granting a pension to Delilah Vandevender.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Delilah Vandevender, dependent mother of Jacob Vandevender, late of Company D, One hundred and forty-ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

The petitioner is an applicant as dependent mother of Jacob Vandevender, who was a private in Company D, One hundred and forty-ninth Regiment Indiana Infantry, who died at Huntsville, Ala., August 29, 1865. The Commissioner of Pensions rejected the application on the ground of non-dependence at the time of the son's death, and on the admission of the father that for a period subsequent to the son's death he was able to work and support his family. There is no attempt to conceal the latter fact. The father did work and supported his family, and there was no effort to obtain a pension until he became physically disabled, as is proven by medical and other evidence, and they were menaced with poverty.

Under a rigid and arbitrary construction relief might be denied these people in old age, infirmity, and need on the ground assumed by the Pension Office, that there was no dependence at the time of the son's death; but the fact remains that there is now and for a long time has been dependence; that both are dependent, and that this condition of distress might not exist if the son was alive to aid them, now that they are old, poor, and infirm. It may be that no legal obligation exists to extend to them the very small and inadequate relief provided for in this bill, but the committee are of the opinion that the moral obligation will be recognized, and that Congress will freely extend the aid that can be conceded from no other source.

The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM SCOTT.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. CHEADLE) was the bill (H. R. 7115) granting a pension to William Scott.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of William Scott, of Kokomo, Howard County, Indiana, a special surgeon at hospital number 14, Nashville, Tenn., and then surgeon of the Eighty-ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, upon the pension-roll, subject to the rules and regulations governing the Pension Department.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

This bill is for the relief of Dr. William Scott, who alleges that he contracted chronic diarrhea while on duty as special surgeon at hospital No. 14, Nashville, Tenn., acting under appointment of Governor Morton, of Indiana, and before he was commissioned surgeon of the Eighty-ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteers. The claim was rejected by the Pension Department on the ground—

"Because it is shown by claimant's own statements as well as by the records filed at the date of origin he was not mustered in the service of the United States, but was under appointment of Governor Morton."

Dr. Scott's military service, as shown by the records of the Surgeon-General's Office, is as follows:

"Dr. William Scott entered into contract for services as acting assistant surgeon, United States Army, June 3, 1863, at Murfreesborough, Tenn., and was on duty with Ninety-fourth Ohio Volunteers to August 10, 1863, and at Cumberland General Hospital, Nashville, Tenn., from August 11 to August 31, 1863, when his contract was annulled on account of the ill health of his family. He is next reported on duty with his regiment, the Eighty-ninth Indiana Volunteers, as assistant surgeon from December, 1864, to February, 1865; and as surgeon from February, 1865, to July, 1865, when mustered out of service."

The Surgeon-General's Office also contains the following:

"The records of this office show Dr. I. C. Johnson and —— Scott to have reported to the medical director, Department of the Cumberland, July 9, 1864, under special appointment from Governor Morton. Dr. I. C. Johnson was ordered same day to report to surgeon in charge No. 1, general hospital, Nashville, Tenn. Dr. Scott was ordered same day to report to the surgeon in charge general hospital No. 14, Nashville, Tenn."

Charles R. Greenleaf, major and surgeon, United States Army, under date of Washington, July 12, 1887, in reply to an inquiry of Dr. Scott, says in regard to his service as contract surgeon in hospital No. 14, Nashville, Tenn., in June, July, or August, 1864:

"I am instructed by the Surgeon-General to say that the records of this office show that under date of Nashville, Tenn., July 9, 1864, Dr. —— Scott having reported under special appointment from Governor Morton, will report without delay to Surgeon S. E. Fuller, United States Volunteers, for duty at hospital No. 14."

There is abundant proof that Dr. Scott was in active service of the United States at Nashville in June, July, or August, 1864, as stated, and that the incurrence of the disability for which he asked a pension took place as stated in his application; that it continued and was aggravated during his term as surgeon of the Eighty-ninth Indiana, and that he still suffers from its effects.

The committee are therefore of the opinion that said William Scott was regularly in the service of the United States at the date above mentioned, that his disabilities occurred while in the Army and in line of duty, and so believing, we submit a favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: In line 8 strike out all after the words "subject to the" and insert the following: "provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BENJAMIN F. BYERS.

The next business on the Calender called up (by Mr. CHEADLE) was the bill (H. R. 5574) granting a pension to Benjamin F. Byers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Benjamin F. Byers, of Frankfort, Clinton County, Indiana, late a private in Company F of the One hundred and fiftieth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, subject to the rules and regulations governing said Pension Office.

The report (by Mr. MATSON), which was not read in full, but was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5574) granting a pension to Benjamin F. Byers, have had the same under consideration, and now submit the following:

Benjamin F. Byers was drafted and afterward had the privilege of enlisting, which he did, and was enrolled on the 14th day of February, 1865, in Company K, One hundred and fiftieth Regiment Indiana Infantry, and was honorably discharged on the 14th day of August, 1865.

On the 1st of November, 1884, he made application for pension, alleging that while in the military service and in line of duty—performing squad drill—he hurt or sprained the left leg. He admits that his leg was not as stout as the other before going into the Army, but the examining surgeon, Dr. L. B. Gentry, who examined him for admission into the Army, had been his family physician for many years before this, and knew of his defective leg, yet he accepted him as a sound, able-bodied man.

After his discharge and return home his leg has increased in disease until his condition is now diagnosed elephantiasis. He received no hospital treatment, but received medicine a few times from Dr. L. B. Gentry, brigade surgeon, above named. There is medical evidence on file, and the claimant admits that his leg was diseased to some extent before he was forced to enter the Army. His claim was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions on the ground that the alleged disability, elephantiasis, existed prior to enlistment.

In the opinion of the committee it is satisfactorily proven that the soldier received the hurt in his left leg as alleged, that he was excused from further duty at that time by the officer in charge, and that he was unable for further service by reason of said injury, and was excused from the same until he was mustered out; that the disease has continued to increase constantly ever since he returned home, until it has culminated in elephantiasis, as above stated.

The committee believe that this is a meritorious case, and therefore submit a favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. CHEADLE. I move to amend the bill by striking out the words "subject to the rules and regulations governing said Pension Office," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FLETCHER S. DEWEY.

Mr. MATSON. The next business on the Calendar is the bill (H. R. 2215) granting a pension to Fletcher S. Dewey. It has been reported adversely, but I move that it be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. My colleague [Mr. HOLMAN], who introduced the bill, informs me that there is a desire to present additional evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the bill will be reported to the House with the recommendation stated. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

JAMES FERRIS.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the next bill on the Calendar, House bill 366, granting a pension to James Ferris, which has been reported adversely, be reported back to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

HEMAN RANKINS.

The next business on the Calendar called up (by Mr. DINGLEY) was the bill (H. R. 7974) granting a pension to Heman Rankins.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the pension laws, the name of Heman Rankins, late a private in Company B, First Maine Coast Guards Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

Claimant was a private in Company B, First Maine Coast Guard Volunteers, and was discharged for disability. He made application for pension, alleging disease of liver and kidneys, due to a severe cold contracted at Fort Foote, Md. Soldier was unable to furnish medical testimony to establish his claim in consequence of the death of physicians, but there is on file the sworn affidavits of six comrades, who are certified to as men of credibility, showing that the cold was contracted as alleged, and that it resulted in malarial disease.

There has been filed with the committee a petition signed by 105 citizens of Camden, Me., representing that claimant is eighty years of age, in poor health and destitute circumstances, and that in their judgment he is justly entitled to pension. His last medical examination shows that, in the opinion of the medical examiner, he is suffering from chronic lumbago and sciatica, which disease can readily be recognized as a result of malarial poisoning, having its origin in a severe cold.

Your committee are of opinion that the weight of testimony is largely in favor of the claimant, and hence report the bill back with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANASTASIA WALTER.

Mr. GUENTHER. I ask unanimous consent that we go back to a bill on page 57 of the Calendar, which, by mistake, I overlooked when it was reached in regular order.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. 816) granting a pension to Anastasia Walter.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Amastasia Walter, widow of Peter Walter, late a private of Company G, of the Twenty-sixth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER), which was not read in full, but was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, is as follows:

The facts in this case are very fully set forth in the report of the Senate committee, which is made a part hereof, and they lead the committee to believe that the beneficiary is entitled to the relief asked for, and they therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

"[Senate Report No. 197, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

"Peter Walter, the husband of the claimant, was a private in Company G, Twenty-sixth Wisconsin Volunteers. He was wounded at the battle of Gettysburgh; was pensioned at the rate of $8 a month, which was afterwards increased. His widow claims that the wound ultimately caused his death; produced considerable testimony in support of this theory, which the Pension Office denied. The claimant appealed, the office decision was sustained, the Secretary holding that the issue was purely one of 'pathological sequence.'

"The certificates of medical examination show that the disability was from a gunshot wound of the hip-joint. The effects described are stiffness of the joint, atrophy of the muscles, weakness, and partial paralysis of the leg.

"There is evidence showing that the wound was very severe and caused the soldier continuous suffering, which increased to the time of his death. On this point Dr. Hallock, his family physician, says:

"'He was wounded in the left hip and was unable to do manual labor. He complained to me very often of the wound. It would swell up and then break open and discharge bloody pus. The said wound might have caused his death from blood poisoning or embolism, as he died very sudden.'

"Philander H. Lewis testifies to his intimate acquaintance with the soldier, and says:

"'I know Peter Walter complained a great deal from gunshot wound in his left hip, and that he died very sudden.'

"Dr. Hallock again testifies:

"'Knew the soldier during the last six years of his life; was his physician during that time. He often complained of his wound. He was very nervous, and always afraid it would break out again. He was partially deranged for a few months before his death, induced, as I believe, from effects of his wound and worry over it.'

"P. H. Lewis testifies that he was well and intimately acquainted with the soldier, being near neighbors, and saw him nearly every day for at least ten years before his death; that during the last three years they occupied the same building; that during all this time he complained of his wounds; that during the six months prior and up to his death he complained of suffering great agony and pain; that from the best knowledge and belief of affiant, Peter Walter died from the effect of his wound. His reasons for this belief are as follows:

"'During the last month prior and up to the time of his death affiant had frequent conversations with him, and he stated to affiant that he thought the pain and suffering he endured from his wound would end his life in a short time. This affiant was also a soldier.'

"John G. Hilderman testifies that he was intimately acquainted with Peter Walter, being neighbors, and saw him every day for five years, a portion of which time they lived in the same house; that he complained of his wound; that during three months prior and up to the time of his death he suffered great agony and pain, and from the best of his knowledge and belief he died from the effects of his wound.

"Dr. Hallock again testifies that Walter died of congestion of the brain, brought on by pains and worry.

"Without taking into consideration the opinions of the doctors as to the connection between the injuries the soldier received and the death cause, there does not appear to be any inconsistency in the conclusion that congestion of the brain was directly traceable to the cause of his constant and prolonged suffering. His wound, as shown by his honest and disinterested neighbors, gave him pain and agony, and it does not require a knowledge of surgery to trace fever, irritation, and congestion to acute and constant suffering from an incurable wound, the admitted effect of which has been to produce 'stiffness of the joint, atrophy of the muscles, weakness, and partial paralysis of the leg.' It is in evidence that a short time prior to his death it had become red, inflamed, and painful. Here was a man in poverty receiving a pension of $10 a month, looking for death and the expectation of leaving his family helpless. All of these conditions were, in the opinion of the committee, enough to produce congestion of the brain, and they are traceable to the service and the strict line of duty.

"The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. ABBA E. JACKSON.

The next business on the Calendar called up (by Mr. DINGLEY for Mr. REED) was the bill (H. R. 8629) granting a pension to Mrs. Abba E. Jackson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Abba E. Jackson, late a nurse in the Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER), which was not read in full, but was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, is as follows:

Pension in this case is asked on the ground of services rendered as a nurse in Armory Square Hospital, Washington, during the war of the rebellion. The annexed memorial of the petitioner fully explains the circumstances and the extent of the charitable work she did for the Government.

"To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

"The undersigned respectfully represents that she is the widow of Rev. E. W. Jackson, who during the war of rebellion was chaplain of Armory Square Hospital, Washington, D. C. Early in 1862 the wards were ready, and were soon filled to repletion with the wounded from the battle-fields of Bull Run, Chantilly, Groveton, etc., and from that hour till the close of the war Armory Square was the receptacle of 'stretcher cases' and the more severely wounded. All who died in transitu were brought there for burial. This added greatly to the labors and responsibilities of the chaplain, and he was probably the only chaplain in the department who had charge of the 'dead house.' By special orders of Dr. Bliss, the head surgeon, the chaplain had all care of the soldier from his death till his body was delivered to the ambulance drivers for burial, and all correspondence with relatives and friends of deceased soldiers was turned over to him for attention.

"Your petitioner was living in a house erected at their own expense near the hospital, and was able to literally give her time and strength to her country's cause in nursing the sick and wounded and supplying them with the little home comforts not always to be obtained in the regular routine of hospital life. From 500 to 1,000 sick and wounded were to be fed, nursed, and cared for day and night. Many will still remember the shelter and sympathy they found at our humble home, when overwhelmed with grief as they came to see sick or wounded loved ones and found them either in the dead-house or buried at Arlington or the Soldiers' Home.

"Another branch of the hospital work which the chaplain superintended personally was the preparing and sending to their homes the bodies of officers and soldiers (sometimes thirty or even a greater number in a month), besides exhuming, embalming, and forwarding many who, in the absence of orders to the contrary, had been buried in Washington. In all these cases, without money and without price, she attended personally to those little details where the tenderness of woman's care does much to assuage the bitterness of sorrow, and often with her own hands lined or upholstered the plain soldier coffin, making it more presentable to the friends at home, who were unable to purchase a better one than the Government provided.

"In all these labors, particularly in writing letters for soldiers, she was assisted by her sister, Miss Mattie McLellan, of blessed memory to many soldiers, who gave her life to her country's cause. After a service of two years and eight months in hospital life, in July, 1865, borne on a stretcher by soldiers through the cities of Washington, New York, and Portland, she was laid in her bed at her childhood home in Gorham, Me., from which she went out no more till in September, 1867, when she rested in peace.

"In all those months and years of weary toil they neither asked nor received any compensation from Government except her husband's pay as chaplain.

"Since the death of her husband, in June, 1873, she has worked diligently with her hands and taken care of herself, but is not able to do so any longer. She therefore respectfully asks for some remuneration from Government in recognition of honorable services faithfully performed for the brave who suffered and died in the wards of Armory Square Hospital. And as in duty bound will ever pray.

"ABBA E. JACKSON."

When Chaplain Jackson resigned in July, 1865, Dr. D. W. Bliss, the head surgeon, gave him a letter, highly complimenting him for his valuable services, counsel, and advice, making mention of his wife in the following words:

"I can not close without paying a slight tribute to the benevolent and Christian labor of your devoted wife, who has been untiring in her devotion to the sick and wounded, and in providing comforts and shelter for their friends. She has always labored with unostentatious Christian devotion for the living, and with her own hands prepared and arranged the soldier's shroud, and placed the flowers of affection around his cold and lifeless form. In the absence of dear friends she has tenderly performed the part of the Christian mother and sister, which has won for her the love and esteem of all."

Numerous additional certificates are on file setting forth Mrs. Jackson's valuable and unselfish services, and also representing that her health was seriously impaired thereby. Her home was literally a hospital, and those less fortunate than herself freely shared her food and money. Among those who have so testified are ex-Governors Perham and Robie, of Maine; Lieut. Col. Henry R. Millett, of the Fifth Maine Volunteers, and several soldiers who received her bountiful charity and kind care.

The case is certainly one deserving of special consideration, and your committee therefore report the bill back favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CAROLINE PAUTEL.

The next business on the Calendar called up (by Mr. CASWELL) was the bill (H. R. 7111) granting a pension to Caroline Pautel.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Caroline Pautel, widow of Frederick Pautel, late of Company D, Thirty-second Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER), which was not read in full, but was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, is as follows:

Caroline Pautel, the beneficiary, is the widow of Frederick Pautel, late private in Company D, Thirty-second Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, who enlisted in the Army August 21, 1862, and was discharged June 12, 1865. He was granted a pension for chronic rheumatism in 1884, commencing June 13, 1865.

His last examination by the pension examining board was March 17, 1886, and the surgeons describe his condition at that time as follows:

"We find this applicant very much reduced, emaciated, and debilitated; skin shrunken, sallow; there is muscular atrophy, with irritability of muscles, everywhere. Trunk drawn to the right, movements of all kinds imperfect and appear painful. We regard this condition as the result of general muscular rheumatism. We regard him nearly totally disabled for the performance of manual labor."

Upon this report soldier's pension was increased to $14 per month. The soldier died September 15, 1886, leaving surviving him the beneficiary, his widow, and four children, now under sixteen years of age. The soldier was shown to be a man of good character.

The widow made an application for a pension, but the same was rejected on the ground that the soldier's death was from disease of liver, not due to chronic rheumatism, for which he was pensioned. The only medical evidence in the case as to the soldier's last sickness, and as to the disease from which he died, is contained in the affidavit of Dr. W. D. Reid, a physician of over thirty-seven years' standing, and was for several years holding the position of examining surgeon under appointment of the Commissioner of Pensions, showing his high personal and professional standing. We quote his affidavit nearly in full:

"That I was acquainted with Frederick Pautel from October, 1881, when I examined him by order of the Pension Department, until his death, September, 1886, seeing him frequently as his family physician after April, 1884. That when I examined him for pension in 1881, in addition to the chronic rheumatism certified to upon which pension was claimed, a jaundiced appearance of the skin was noticeable, which I attributed to malarial poisoning, and which he claimed had been more or less prominent for years. That when first called professionally, April, 1884, he was confined to his bed; the symptoms of rheumatism, especially of the hip, were much worse than when examined for pension in 1881. The jaundiced appearance continued, and in addition pain, tenderness over the region of the liver, with severe gastric symptoms, retching, vomiting, with pain and flatulence of the intestines. That these symptoms of rheumatism and of the visceria continued, sometimes better and sometimes worse, with constantly increasing emaciation and debility, until his death.

"I regarded his symptoms as scirrhosis of the liver, but as there was no post-mortem dissection the exact pathological condition is not known. The heart may have been at fault and produced or contributed to the dropsy. Certainly the rheumatism continued to the end. That as there is no history of alcoholic intemperance, syphilis, or gout, the usual causes of scirrhosis, and as there is a well-marked and long-standing history of rheumatism, which is an occasional cause and always an auxiliary when present in an indirect manner, by impairing the vital power and damaging the heart, it is reasonable to suppose, and it is my opinion, that the rheumatism was the cause, at least an auxiliary, in producing the fatal result."

The committee believe from the testimony of the physician who attended the soldier during the last years of his life, including his last sickness, that the disability for which the soldier was pensioned so far contributed to and was so far the cause of the soldier's death that his widow is entitled to the relief granted by this bill, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LYDIA BURRIDGE.

The next business on the Calendar called up (by Mr. BELDEN) was the bill (H. R. 8400) for the relief of Lydia Burridge.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Lydia Burridge, mother of Edwin Burridge, late of Company E, Third New York Light Artillery, and pay her a pension, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER), which was not read in full, but was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, is as follows:

Lydia Burridge is the mother of Edwin Burridge, who died of chronic diarrhea while serving as private in Company E, Third Regiment New York Light Artillery. Mrs. Burridge lost two other sons and a son-in-law by reason of disease contracted in the military service during the late war. Her application for pension has been rejected by the Pension Bureau because at the time of the son's death her husband was able to and did support the claimant. It appears that at that period the husband had a small place, assessed at $850. This place was purchased with the help of the sons. It is admitted that at the time of the son's death the husband was in fair health, and at the age of fifty-three years was able to do a fair day's work. He is now seventy-seven years of age, and consequently has passed the period of manual labor.

The claimant has been sick much of the time in late years, thus increasing the expenses of the household. Old age of the husband has compelled him to exchange his small farm for a house in the village, which affords him a residence, but no income.

Claimant is now seventy-eight years of age, and while she has no title to a pension under the general law for reasons heretofore stated, your committee are clearly of opinion that her present condition clearly brings her within the more liberal practice of Congress in this class of cases, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill, and ask that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY F. HARKINS.

The next business on the Calendar called up (by Mr. CASWELL) was the bill (H. R. 3016) granting a pension to Mary F. Harkins.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary F. Harkins, widow of —— Harkins, late of Company E, First Regiment of Wisconsin Infantry.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER), which was not read in full, but was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, was as follows:

The beneficiary named in this bill is the widow of John Harkins, who enlisted in Company E, First Wisconsin Volunteers, October 1, 1862, and was discharged June 8, 1865. He was granted a pension, which he received up to the time of his death, which occurred May 5, 1882. He died, leaving surviving him the beneficiary, his widow, and two children—one, George, born June 10, 1875, and one, John, born November 25, 1875. The soldier drew a pension for a gunshot wound of right foot.

Of his last examination, made March 26, 1881, A. Farr, the examining surgeon, reports as follows:

"The scar extends from the second metatarsal bone near the tarsal end across the foot to the fifth metatarsal bone near its tarsal end. The scar is 3 inches long and one-half inch wide. It is very tender to the touch; at times it inflames. I have treated him several times when the foot and leg were very much swollen and tender; appeared to be inflammation of the ——. I treated him soon after his discharge, and as often as once a year since. Cramps frequently take him in the foot when walking."

The soldier died from "rupture of the heart."

The widow made application in behalf of the minor children and in her own behalf for a pension, which was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground "that the immediate cause of death, rupture of the heart, was not due to wound for which soldier was pensioned."

The only medical evidence giving any light upon this matter is given by Dr. Farr, holding the position of examining surgeon under appointment from the Commissioner of Pensions, which is sufficient indorsement of his high personal and professional character.

His statement as to condition of soldier at time of his last examination is above quoted.

In his affidavit, made after soldier's death and sworn to July 26, 1884, he says:

"In 1875 I attended John Harkens for neuralgia of the head and heart. It was caused by a wound in the leg. The cicatrix was painful and irritable, so much so that his nervous system was greatly affected by it. I have no doubt but it was the remote cause of his death. I have always been his family physician."

In his affidavit, sworn to March 26, 1883, he states that he knew John Harkins; that he was his family physician.

"That the said John Harkins had been treated by this deponent for a wound in the foot, which he received in the Army, more or less every year since he returned from the Army. This wound in his foot was a source of trouble and uneasiness to the said John Harkins. It made him irritable and nervous. I verily believe that said wound in his foot made and affected his whole nervous system, and produced and was the direct cause of his death; that it affected his nervous system to such a degree that it caused and brought on heart trouble. That said John Harkins died on the 5th day of May, 1882, from rupture of the heart, caused by the bursting and parting of the fibers of the right ventricle. That said John dropped dead suddenly. That I gave said John Harkins a prescription a short time before he died for nervousness."

In another affidavit he states:

"That to the best of his knowledge and belief said rupture of the heart was brought on by the nervous effect which said wound had on the system."

In view of this evidence the committee believe that it can be truthfully said that the procuring cause of the soldier's death was the gunshot wound received in the service, and that the widow is entitled to the relief granted by this bill, and they therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. CASWELL. I move that the blank in the bill be filled by inserting the word "John."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LYDIA D. HOLTZ.

The next business on the Calendar called up (by Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin) was the bill (S. 811) granting a pension to Lydia D. Holtz.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lydia D. Holtz, widow of William F. Holtz, late a private in Company G, Fourth Regiment Minnesota Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER), which was not read in full, but was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, is as follows:

They have carefully examined the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions on this bill, made a part hereof, and have also examined the papers on file in the Pension Office, and they think that when the wife "by the advice of friends" commences an action for a divorce from her husband "for her personal safety," and on account of his "cruel and abusive treatment," and obtains a divorce, she can hardly claim to be his widow. The evidence fails to convince us that the divorce was obtained against her protestation.

They then report adversely upon said bill and recommend that it do not pass.

"[Senate Report No. 284, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

"William F. Holtz, husband of the claimant, was a private in Company G, Fourth Minnesota Volunteers. She applied for a pension as his widow, and was rejected on the sole ground that the parties were divorced some two or three months before her husband died.

"It is apparent from affidavits and communications in the possession of the committee that the husband of this woman, from some cause unknown, made her life a burden to her. She was constantly liable to and did receive from him cruel and abusive treatment, which she bore to the endangerment of her life. Some seven months prior to her husband's death, by the advice of friends, they jointly made application to the court for a divorce, which proceeding they very soon mutually regretted.

"They appealed to the court to stay the proceedings, to which appeal no heed was paid. The wife was forbearing, the husband was penitent; both dreaded the sundering of their matrimonial ties. In token of his determination to do better the husband wrote a promise to maintain her, not to strike or threaten any personal abuse, and in matters upon which they could not agree to submit to the advice of his Lutheran clergyman or to Judge Heminpe.

"Pending the proceedings for divorce, the wife says her husband frequently came home promising each time better conduct. 'A few days before the time for a final hearing he came home, and we both became reconciled and mutually agreed to end the divorce proceedings.' Her husband gave her money, and she went to town to proclaim the fact of their reconciliation. The judge angrily refused to stop the proceedings, and against their mutual remonstrances, and after their reconciliation, they received their divorce papers.

"The simple story is that this suffering woman, for her personal safety, felt compelled to submit to a divorce; that the step was taken reluctantly by both; that as it progressed and a separation became inevitable neither of them could endure the thought; they became reconciled and ordered the proceedings to be stopped; that finally they were divorced in spite of themselves, the officers of the law disregarding their mutual protestations. In the opinion of the committee a divorce so accomplished should not have recognition, and so far as it affects this woman's claim to a pension we think it may properly be regarded as null and void, and that she should have all the rights in the adjudication of her pension case as though no proceedings had been had.

"The bill is reported favorably with an amendment, striking out all after the word 'infantry,' in line 8, with a recommendation that it do pass."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELLEN SEXTON.

The next business on the Calendar called up (by Mr. RICE) was the bill (H. R. 8174) granting a pension to Ellen Sexton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ellen Sexton, widow of Daniel Sexton, late a private in Company K, Tenth Regiment of Minnesota Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL), which was not read in full, but was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, is as follows:

The claimant in this case is the widow of Daniel Sexton, late a private in Company K, Tenth Minnesota Infantry. Soldier enlisted August 13, 1862, and was discharged June 11, 1864. He died May 29, 1875, of consumption.

The case was rejected on the ground that the fatal disease was not due to disease contracted in line of duty. The captain of his company testifies that the soldier was in good health at time of enlistment, but while in the Indian campaign, in the winter of 1862-'63, he was taken sick and was transferred to the Invalid Reserve Corps, and was discharged in June, 1864, having consumption and being unable for duty, said disease being brought on by exposure and hardships incident to the campaign.

The certificate of disability upon which he was discharged, dated June 11, 1864, recites:

"He is incapable of performing the duties of a soldier because of great weakness and constant aching pains in all of the extremities. The tibia in both legs is covered with nodes, and the muscles wasted away. He is salivated most of the time and has dyspepsia, and he has not done any duty for the last four months and has been sick a year, and he is unfit for military duty in the Veteran Reserve Corps. In my opinion the disease was contracted since the last enlistment.

"(Signed by J. W. Daniels, surgeon in charge of hospital.)"

The soldier filed an application for pension immediately upon discharge.

Dr. C. D. Williams testifies that he treated him in 1865 for hemorrhage of the bowels, and that it was a severe and dangerous case.

James King swears that the soldier enlisted in 1862 in good health, and that he saw him when discharged, and to all appearances he was a broken-down man and unable to make a living by manual labor, apparently suffering from consumption.

Christ Connolly and others substantiate the foregoing.

The adverse testimony in this case, and upon which the case was rejected in the Pension Office, is that the claimant contracted a disability in the service through his own vicious habits, which may have contributed to hasten his death. It is not in the power of any man to determine the degree to which each cause contributed to cause the death of the soldier.

In cases similar, where your committee have been utterly unable to decide the cause of death, they have invariably given the widow the benefit of the doubt, and they therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ADA PIATT, LEOTA PIATT, AND JESSIE PIATT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4743) granting a pension to Ada Piatt, Leota Piatt, and Jessie Piatt.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the names of Ada Piatt, Leota Piatt, and Jessie Piatt, minor children of Josiah Piatt, deceased, late of G Company, Eighty-ninth Regiment Illinois Infantry Volunteers, and to pay to their lawfully constituted guardian, for them, a pension, to take effect from the date of their father's death.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out the following words in the bill:

"And to pay to their lawfully constituted guardian for them a pension, to take effect from the date of their father's death."

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4743) granting a pension to Ada Piatt, Leota Piatt, and Jessie Piatt, submit the following report:

The parties named in this bill are the minor children of Josiah Piatt, deceased, late of Company G, Eighty-ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteers. The mother of these children is dead. They are aged, respectively, fourteen, nine, and seven years. The soldier applied in 1865 for a pension for heart disease resulting from an injury received in the service. The pension was granted and at the time of his death the soldier was in receipt of the pension. The application of the children was rejected on the ground that the death of the father was not the result of the disease for which he was receiving a pension.

The only evidence submitted showing the cause of death is that of Dr. George L. Lucas, who testifies—

"That he was called to see the soldier April 29, 1882, and found him suffering from acute pneumonia and heart disease; that owing to above disease of lungs and heart he died on the 3d day of May, 1882; that, in his opinion, if he had not had disease of the heart he might have recovered from the disease of lungs, but owing to the complication, might rather be said to have died from heart disease and pneumonia."

The doctor further says that owing to the fact that applicant lived 16 miles from him he was able to see him but three times during his last illness.

No one will ever be able to determine what the actual cause of death was, but your committee feel that the helpless orphan children of this faithful soldier, who for two years served his country devotedly, should have the benefit of the doubt, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment striking out all after the word "volunteers," in line 8.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN H. ROUNDTREE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5759) granting a pension to John H. Roundtree.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John H. Rountree, late of Company G, Thirty-fifth Regiment Iowa Volunteers.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (by Mr. SPOONER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5759) granting a pension to John H. Rountree, respectfully report:

John H. Rountree was a private in Company G, Thirty-fifth Regiment Iowa Volunteers. He was discharged the service upon surgeon's certificate of disability "because of scrotal hernia," it also being stated in said certificate that the soldier said:

"That for some months before enlisting he had pain and occasional swelling in the left side of the scrotum; that while drilling at Camp Strong, Iowa, the latter part of August last, the pain became intense and the swelling much increased. He has been in hospital and under treatment most of the time since, and done no duty."

His claim for pension was rejected by the Pension Office upon the ground that the soldier's disability existed prior to enlistment, presumably on account of the above-recited statement in said certificate being considered a record, and as such not to be disproved by any oral testimony.

The soldier personally made oath to his physical soundness at the time of and prior to his enlistment, and to the incurrence of said disability in the service; and the same facts are sustained and verified by the following testimony:

Dr. Staples testifies that he first became acquainted with the soldier in 1856, at which time he began to practice in his father's family, and knew him continuously until his enlistment in 1862; never had occasion to be consulted for him, and did not know but he was of sound health.

J. L. Wilson, who has known the soldier since 1856, and worked with him for years, including work breaking prairie with him in the spring and summer of 1862, prior to his enlistment, and went in swimming with him quite often, testifies that until after the soldier's discharge from service he never heard him complain or knew of his having any physical disability.

David H. Gill and William C. Long, who have also been intimate acquaintances of the soldier since 1856, corroborate the fact of physical soundness of the soldier prior to enlistment; and the latter testifies to seeing the rupture or varicocele when visiting the soldier at Camp Strong, when he was told by Rountree that he had been ruptured in a battalion drill a few days previously.

N. Gaskill, a comrade, of soldier's company, testifies to soldier coming to him at night after battalion drill and saying something was wrong with him, and showing the place of injury, which Gaskill told him was a rupture.

In the light of all the testimony on file, including the certificates of the examining surgeons, your committee are of the opinion that the fact of the physical soundness of the soldier at the time of his enlistment is sufficiently established; that the soldier is and has been afflicted both by hernia and varicocele, two distinct disabilities, and that it is probable that only some moderate symptoms of varicocele prior to his enlistment, if anything, gave occasion for the statement mentioned in said certificate of disability, which disease, if not incurred in, was undoubtedly greatly aggravated and increased by his military service, and should not be confounded with nor affect the claim of soldier based upon hernia.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

STEPHEN SINGLETON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 860) granting a pension to Stephen Singleton.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, directed to place the name of Stephen Singleton, late a private in Company G, Eighty-seventh Indiana Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (by Mr. SPOONER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 860) granting a pension to Stephen Singleton, respectfully report:

Stephen Singleton was a private in Company G, Eighty-seventh Indiana Volunteers, and was discharged June 10, 1865, after nearly three years' service.

His claim for pension, based upon injuries received and disease contracted in the service, was rejected by the Pension Office because of absence of record evidence of such injury or disease and lack of evidence required by the strict rules of the Pension Office.

The testimony of his family physician, Dr. Harris, and of his neighbors, Falconberg, three of the name of Kennedy, and Lewis Beagles, show that the claimant was a strong, healthy man prior to his enlistment.

Lieut. George Urquhart, of his company, states that while in line of duty, being detailed as teamster with the wagon-train near Savannah, Ga., about December 26, 1862, the claimant was thrown from his horse and severely injured, several of his ribs being fractured, in consequence of which said officer was called upon to detail another man to take his place. Lieutenant Urquhart was not an eyewitness of the injury, but knew of it as an officer of claimant's company and saw claimant soon afterwards.

Assistant Surgeon Gould, of claimant's regiment, testifies that he saw Singleton after his injury (a day or two after, he thinks); that three or four of his ribs were fractured; that the injury was followed by severe pleuritic inflammation, and continued to give him trouble up to the time of his discharge.

His comrades, Graves and Culp, whose good reputations fully verified, testify that claimant was much exposed to rain and snow at Camp Rolling Fork, Kentucky, in October, 1862; that he became quite lame from rheumatism; was treated therefor by one of the army surgeons; never had the disease before that.

His neighbors testify that since the soldier's return from his army service in 1865 he has suffered from rheumatism; and that he has been and is largely incapacitated for labor.

Dr. West, who treated him from his discharge, died in the spring of 1868; but Drs. Graham, Marsh, and Meredith have all treated him since for pains in side or rheumatism, Dr. Graham commencing such treatment soon after soldier's return from service.

The lack of direct medical evidence of soldier's physical condition at the time of and immediately after his discharge, occasioned by the death of Dr. West, is, in the opinion of your committee, supplied by the testimony of neighbors, who are certified to be credible witnesses, corroborated by the testimony of Drs. Graham, Marsh, and Meredith, above referred to.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SALLIE T. WARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8574) granting a pension to Sallie T. Ward, widow of the late W. T. Ward.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

Mr. CHEADLE. I give notice I will demand a quorum on this bill.

Mr. MATSON. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. BYNUM. I ask the bill be passed over, to retain its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MARY A. WELLS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5792) granting a pension to Mary A. Wells.

Mr. O'DONNELL. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary A. Wells, a resident of Marshall, Mich., at the rate of $25 per month, on account of disability resulting from disease contracted while serving as a hospital nurse during the war of the rebellion.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out, in line 6, the word "twenty-five" and insert the word "twelve."

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5792) granting a pension to Mary A. Wells, submitted the following report:

The bill proposes to place Mary A. Wells on the pension-rolls at the rate of $25 a month. She was appointed a nurse in April, 1864, by Miss L. L. Dix, superintendent of the Western Sanitary Commission. James E. Yeatman, president of the commission, certifies to her great skill and fidelity, and to the efficiency of her service. Miss Dix and many others with whom she came in official contact describe her as in all respects a valuable and faithful coadjutor in their humane work.

She was pecuniarily well off when she entered the service, but is now poor and eighty-five years of age. Her age, her services, her necessities all appeal to the Government for kindly recognition. The good women who nursed the sick and cared for the wounded have a strong place in the affection and respect of their countrymen. It is very hard to contemplate one who was so full of charity and patriotic devotion in her vigor now destitute in her age.

We recommend that the bill do pass, but that it be amended by substituting "twelve" for "fifty" in the sixth line.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIAS SHAFER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6907) granting a pension to Elias Shafer.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of law, the name of Elias Shafer, late of Company K, Twenty-third Michigan Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $45 per month, in lieu of the sum he now receives.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6907) granting an increase of pension to Elias Shafer, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Elias Shafer was a private in Company K, Twenty-third Regiment Michigan Volunteers, and is now a pensioner at $36 per month for loss of right leg above the knee, from wounds received at the battle of Resaca, Ga., May 14, 1864. From the files of the Pension Bureau it further appears that in August, 1863, while crossing the Cumberland Mountains, pensioner became ruptured on right side. This fact is established to the satisfaction of the Pension Bureau, and on December 10, 1887, a new certificate was issued to him including this additional disability, but because the combined disabilities are not of such a character as to require the regular aid and attendance of another person, that bureau is estopped from granting a pension above that provided for the loss of a leg above the knee.

Medical examinations in the case show the following as to rupture: He has a complete inguinal hernia of the right side. External ring is relaxed and large enough to admit two fingers. The strapping of the limb necessarily interferes with wearing of the truss and increases the irritation.

Claimant's power of locomotion is necessarily more impaired by this complication than it would be by the loss of the limb only. In consequence of his inability to take regular exercise he has become broken down in health and emaciated. At a height of 5 feet 10 inches his weight is only 124 pounds.

Congress has always liberally responded to calls for relief in this class of cases, and the one under consideration being particularly meritorious, your committee report favorably on the accompanying bill and ask that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LEWIS C. KECK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7577) granting a pension to Lewis C. Keck.

Mr. O'DONNELL. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and instructed to place on the pension-roll the name of Lewis C. Keck, invalid son of David Keck, deceased, late a private in Company I, Sixth Michigan Heavy Artillery, said pension to be at the rate of $18 per month.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7577) granting a pension to Lewis C. Keck, report:

Keck was the son of Daniel Keck, deceased, who was a private in Company I, Sixth Regiment Michigan Heavy Artillery. He was placed on pension-rolls until he was sixteen years of age, his pension number being 148483, and the pension ceased November 18, 1876.

Petitions and affidavits filed with the committee show that he is deaf and dumb, has poor eye-sight and stomachic difficulties, and utterly incapable of self-support. He is dependent on a step-father, who is very poor, and that whether he can continue to receive this support is very doubtful.

The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FREDERICK BENO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 39) to grant an increase of pension to Frederick Beno.

Mr. HERMANN. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

Mr. MATSON. I ask that it be passed over informally.

Mr. HERMANN. I hope that will not be done. There is not a more meritorious case on the Calendar. This man is entirely paralyzed, absolutely unable to move, and confined to his bed.

Mr. MATSON. What is he drawing now?

Mr. HERMANN. Fifty dollars, but he is compelled to have the service of one or two assistants. He is poor, destitute, with no means to employ assistants.

Mr. MATSON. Very well; let it go.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to increase the pension of Frederick Beno, of East Portland, Oregon, to $72 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of California) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 39) to grant an increase of pension to Frederick Beno, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

A careful examination of the files of the Pension Bureau discloses the fact that claimant's disabilities are of such a character that the relief asked for should be granted without hesitation, and therefore respectfully return the accompanying bill, and ask that it do pass, the committee taking the liberty of adopting the report of the Senate committee in the case as their own, which is as follows:

"That said Beno was a private in Company F, Twelfth Missouri Infantry, and was severely wounded in thigh and arm at the battle of Vicksburg, May 22, 1863, and was only pensioned first at $4 a month; afterward increased to $50, and is clearly entitled to $72, as fully appears by the inclosed letters.

"All the papers in the Department clearly establish this claim, and your committee recommend the passage of the bill, with an amendment, inserting company and regiment in which he served.

"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
"Washington, D. C., December 6, 188—.

"DEAR SIR: I desire to especially call your attention to the pension case of Frederick Beno, certificate No. 131076, who desires to have his allowance increased from $50 per month to $72 per month, the full sum which I understand can be given for a total disability.

"I desire to state, on my own personal knowledge, that Mr. Beno is totally disabled, being unable to walk and having no use of his arms or legs. He suffers intensely, and his neighbors frequently hear him several hundred yards away screaming in his misery. He is compelled to take morphine from six to twelve times a day, and has done so for years, to suppress his pain. From the use of morphine his body has become poisoned, until sores have appeared all over him, scarring his body almost completely.

"It is necessary to have some one by him all the time to attend him. Both testicles have had to be removed. He has a wife and three children, and possesses no property, but is a subject of charity upon his relatives, friends, and neighbors. His pain causes him to become delirious at times, and I have seen him in a perfectly insane and raving state; in fact, he is frequently insane, and when in that condition is dangerous to handle, for he then appears to have the power to strike wildly with his arms.

"In his sane moments I have conversed with him regarding his service in the war, and strange to say, notwithstanding his terrible condition, he becomes enthusiastic over the fact that he has sacrificed everything in defense of his country; and I have heard him say he would do it all over again rather than to see his country destroyed.

"If there was ever a case that possessed true merit for a full allowance for total disability it is this one.

"Yours, truly,

"M. C. GEORGE.

"Hon. W. W. DUDLEY, Commissioner of Pensions."

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., September 18, 1886.

"SIR: In response to your inquiry of recent date relative to the pension claim of Frederick Beno, late of Company F, Twelfth Missouri Volunteers (certificate No. 131076), I would state that I have caused the evidence to be carefully examined and have personally considered the case.

"Claimant's physical condition, as set forth in your letter, would seem to entitle him to the highest rate of pension conferred by law, but the act of June 16, 1880, granting an increase from $50 to $72, provides only for those who were receiving or, as liberally construed by this office, entitled to receive $59 at date of the passage of said act.

"As claimant was not in receipt of $50, and as the evidence does not show his condition to be such as to have entitled him to said rating at that time, it is evident that he is not entitled to the benefits conferred by said act, and there is no provision under the law by which his present rating can be increased.

"Very respectfully,

"EAST PORTLAND, OREGON, October 21, 1887.

"SIR: I have the honor to make the following report relative to Frederick Beno, Company E, Twelfth Missouri Volunteers. I have this day carefully examined him and find him a complete and total wreck, both physically and mentally.

"He can not stand on his feet. He can not dress or undress himself. He is almost helpless.

"Respectfully, your obedient servant,

"HEADQUARTERS SUMNER POST, No. 12,
"DEPARTMENT OF OREGON, G. A. R.,
"East Portland, Oregon, November 3, 1887.

"GENTLEMEN: We wish to draw your attention to the case of Frederick Beno, late private Company E, Twelfth Missouri Infantry, who, from the nature of wounds received in the late war, is not only rendered mentally and physically helpless, but a constant and suffering charge to others. The amount of his pension ($50) is barely sufficient to meet the expenses of attendants, to say nothing of his support and medical attendance. Death has lately deprived him of his most vigilant and loving attendant (his wife), thus leaving him doubly dependent on others for care and comfort.

"You will readily perceive that with daily medical attendance and constant personal attendant, together with the amount necessary for his support, that $50 per month is entirely inadequate to meet the demands.

"We ask, therefore, that you use your utmost endeavors to have his pension increased to an amount sufficient to meet his daily expenses, until death, the only cure, shall relieve him from further want.

"We send herewith a surgeon's certificate of the patient's personal condition and disabilities.

"Hoping you will give this matter your attention and support at the earliest practicable period,

"We remain yours, obediently,

"C. E. BARTON,
"Post Adjutant.

"On this 11th day of November, 1887, personally appeared before me W. W. Royal, a practicing physician, residing in East Portland, county and State aforesaid, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he has this day carefully examined Frederick Beno, an applicant for increase of pension, and found him a complete and total wreck, both physically and mentally; that he is unable to stand on his feet; can not dress or undress himself, and is almost helpless.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ADVERSE REPORT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2840) to pension Winemah Riddell.

The CHAIRMAN. What disposition will be made of this adverse report?

Mr. FINLEY. I ask that it be allowed to remain upon the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

SUSAN JONES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3125) for the relief of Susan Jones.

Mr. BYNUM. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Susan Jones, widow of Marion Jones, formerly a member of the Thirteenth Missouri Volunteers.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out in line 7 all after the word "of" and insert "Company C, Thirteenth Illinois Volunteers."

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3125) for the relief of Susan Jones, have had the same under consideration, and now submit the following report:

The applicant for relief under this bill is the widow of Marion Jones. The military history of the said Marion Jones, as gleaned from the papers before the committee, is as follows:

The records of the Adjutant-General's Office show that—

"Marion Jones was enrolled September 1, 1861, as a private in Company C, Thirteenth Illinois Volunteers, which regiment was subsequently designated the Twenty-second Ohio Volunteers, to serve three years, and was present with his company from enrollment to April 30, 1862. On the muster-rolls of the company from April 30, 1862, to October 31, 1862, he is reported "absent, sick in hospital at Corinth;" on subsequent rolls to August 31, 1863, "present;" on rolls for September and October, November and December, 1863, "detached in Eleventh Ohio Battery;" on subsequent rolls to June 30, 1864, "present;" on roll for January and February, 1864, "re-enlisted as a vetern volunteer, February 28, 1864;" on roll for July and August, 1864, "absent on veteran furlough since July 22, 1864;" on roll of Company B, same regiment to which transferred, for September and October, 1864, "sick in Columbus, Ohio;" on the roll for November and December, 1864, "deserted November 28, 1864;" and on the muster-out roll of the company, dated August 28, 1865, Little Rock, Ark., "deserted November 20, 1864, at Columbus, Ohio."

The widow in her application says that her said husband served continuously until the month of July, 1864, in which month, he being then stationed at Little Rock, Ark., left that place for Columbus, Ohio, for the purpose of procuring a furlough, since which time she has never heard of him, and she believes that he died or was killed while on the road from Little Rock to Columbus.

There is ample testimony to show that the said Marion Jones disappeared at the time stated, and that the widow or any of her relatives or friends have never seen or heard of him since. There is evidence that she was legally married to the said Marion Jones, and that she has never since remarried; that she has no estate of any kind, personal or real, and is entirely dependent on her own labor for support and maintenance; and that she was the mother of Calvin Gritten, who was a private in Company L or T, Seventh Regiment Indiana Cavalry, who died May 15, 1869.

The record shows that the said Marion Jones was a faithful soldier during a three-years' enlistment, and that when his term expired he re-enlisted as a veteran, and that at the time of his disappearance there was no cause why he should have deserted. The committee believe that now, after the lapse of twenty-three years, it is fair to presume he was either killed or died while on his way from Little Rock to Columbus.

The committee believe this is a meritorious case, and therefore submit a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendments: In line 7 strike out all after the word "the" and insert "Company C, Thirteenth Illinois Volunteers."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANN V. FERGUSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7944) granting a pension to Ann V. Ferguson.

Mr. BYNUM. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Ann V. Ferguson, of Indianapolis, Ind., a nurse in the United States Army during the late war of the rebellion at Hospital No. 1, Murfreesborough, Tenn., and other places, upon the pension-rolls, and that she be paid a pension during the remainder of life at the rate of $20 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee recommend striking out "twenty" and inserting "twelve dollars per month."

Mr. BYNUM. I think the committee have heretofore pensioned nurses at $20.

Mr. SPOONER. The ordinary rate is $12.

Mr. BYNUM. Then I do not object.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7944) granting a pension to Ann V. Ferguson, have examined the papers on file, and submit the following report:

Ann V. Ferguson was regularly appointed as an army nurse by the sanitary commission of Indiana for the United States armies. She nursed at the Hospital No. 1, Murfreesborough, Tenn., and other places until the close of the war. Capt. Theodore W. McCoy testifies that claimant came to the army at Murfreesborough, Tenn., as a volunteer nurse, the first one that within his knowledge came to that part of the Army; that from the time she came she labored diligently, and rendered invaluable service as nurse in the field and general hospitals in and around Murfreesborough. She became the head of the volunteer nurses in one of the general hospitals, and remained there until the army moved in June, 1863. Her services are further attested by affidavits of persons who knew her and the valuable services she performed during the war.

The claimant is now sixty-nine years of age; in needy circumstances; broken in health, and physically unable to do anything for her support. There is no evidence that she received any compensation for her services as nurse, but, on the contrary, that she contributed from her own means in alleviating the suffering of our sick and wounded soldiery. She is alone in the world, her husband having died at Murfreesborough, Tenn., while looking after the interests of the soldiers by the request of the sanitary commission of Indiana.

Your committee favor the passage of the bill, and recommend it do pass with the following amendment: Strike out "twenty," in line 9, and insert "twelve."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LIEUT. JAMES G. W. HARDY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8281) for the relief of Lieut. James G. W. Hardy.

Mr. CHEADLE. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws, the name of James G. W. Hardy, late second lieutenant Company K, Eleventh Regiment of Indiana Cavalry Volunteers, to commence from date of discharge.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

The facts in this case are these: James G. W. Hardy enlisted in Company H, Sixty-third Regiment Indiana Volunteers, in August, 1862; transferred to company B in 1863, and in October of that year detailed to recruit for a new regiment of cavalry. January 9, 1864, he was mustered as second lieutenant of company K, Eleventh Regiment Indiana Cavalry. He resigned, to take effect February 4, 1865, upon the following certificate:

"GRAVELLY SPRING, ALA., January 22, 1865.

"Lieut. James G. W. Hardy, of Company K, One hundred and twenty-sixth Regiment (Eleventh Cavalry) Indiana Volunteers, having applied for a certificate on which to ground a resignation, I hereby certify that I have carefully examined this officer, and find him with fracture of right humerus of ten months' standing, which, not having been properly adjusted, disables him so that he can not mount a horse from the ground, or draw a saber, in consequence of which he is, in my opinion, unfit for duty. He is, in my opinion, physically disqualified for service in the Veteran Reserve Corps.

"SAMUEL H. BUSHNELL,
"Assistant Surgeon Eleventh Indiana Cavalry."

The manner in which this injury was incurred is thus stated in Pension Office letter of rejection:

"On or about January 15, 1864, he was traveling on the railroad from Indianapolis to La Fayette, Ind., on business connected with recruiting for his regiment, and near the former place he raised the window by which he was sitting and put his right elbow on the sill; while in this position his arm was struck by some object outside the car, and was fractured and otherwise injured."

While a strict construction of the law concerning "contributory negligence" would deprive Lieutenant Hardy of his right of damages against the railroad company, and might justify the Pension Office in its adverse action, your committee regard it as a case clearly within the duty of Congress to grant relief. Lieutenant Hardy's arm was broken and permanently disabled while in the service, zealously and effectively laboring for the interests of the public service, and we recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. MATSON. I move to amend by striking out that portion which provides the pension shall begin from the date of discharge.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ENOCH WEATHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6973) for the relief of Enoch Weathers.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Enoch Weathers late captain of a company of Indiana militia during the Morgan raid, subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6973) for the relief of Enoch Weathers, have considered the same, and now submit the following report:

Enoch Weathers enlisted in a volunteer militia company formed in Crawford County, Indiana, in July, 1863, called the Marengo Light Guards, organized expressly for the purpose of suppressing the "Morgan raid."

The organization was in conformity to the militia law of Indiana, approved May 11, 1861, and it is proved that said company elected its officers and was mustered into the Indiana Legion, and that each member thereof took the oath of allegiance. The said Enoch Weathers was elected captain of said company, and was duly commissioned by Governor Oliver P. Morton. He asks that Congress pass a special act for his relief on the ground that while acting as a member of said company, and in line of duty, about the 17th day of July, 1863, at New Albany, Ind., while assisting in bringing a cannon on board of a boat he was ruptured in the right side by being severely struck with the tongue of a gun-carriage. He has made no application for pension for the reason that the Pension Department do not consider claims arising from injuries received by persons belonging to State militia organizations.

Lee Hazelwood testifies that he was the family physician of the claimant for twenty years prior to the rebellion, and was personally acquainted with him, and had good reason to know that he was a sound, able-bodied man, and free from hernia of any form when he joined the Union forces at the time of the Morgan raid in 1863. He also testifies that on or about July 20, 1863, claimant called at his office asking for advice and medical treatment. On examination, he found that he was badly ruptured—inguinal hernia of the right side; that he reduced the hernia and applied a truss, which answered the purpose for the time; that claimant said this rupture was caused by aiding and assisting in moving artillery at New Albany, Ind. He also says he knows from observation that said hernia continues to exist, and has gradually grown worse, disabling him more or less each year since 1863, and by reason of said hernia he is not able to perform manual labor over one-third of his time.

Dr. William B. Ballington, acting surgeon of said organization, testifies as follows:

"That on or about the 17th day of July, 1863, while in line of duty, in the Morgan raid at New Albany, Ind., Enoch Weathers was severely ruptured in the right side and was under my treatment for the same for some one or two days. I know these facts from personal knowledge."

Nathan N. Morgan, acting colonel, testifies as follows:

"I was the acting colonel of the Home Guard forces that marched after the Confederate John Morgan when he made his raid in 1863. Enoch Weathers was a duly commissioned captain of the Marengo Light Guards and served under me in the raid. At New Albany, Ind., I ordered him to put a cannon on board a steam-boat in order to transport same to Leavenworth, Ind. While assisting to get the cannon on board the boat he was jerked violently and injured. I saw him a few minutes after the accident and found him very sick, and he told me he had been ruptured by being jerked by the cannon. He continued indisposed until the forces were disbanded at Leavenworth, Ind."

John House testifies:

"I was a member of claimant's company; that on or about the 17th July, 1863, while helping to put a cannon on board a boat at New Albany, Enoch Weathers was injured in form of rupture, which disabled him from duty. I know these facts from personal knowledge, being present at the time."

Jacob Hutzlar, Michael R. Tucker, and William T. Vance all testify that they have been personally acquainted with Enoch Weathers for over thirty years; that prior to 1863 he was an able-bodied man, and that since that time to the present he has been suffering from rupture.

The evidence fully establishes the fact that the claimant enlisted, was mustered in, and served as a soldier as above set forth; that he was a sound, healthy man, free from hernia prior to and at the time of his enlistment; that he was ruptured as claimed; that said rupture was incurred in the service and in line of duty; and that said hernia or rupture has continued since its incurrence up to the present time.

After a careful examination of all the evidence submitted, the committee are of the opinion that this is a meritorious case, and so believing they submit a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANNA M. THIELE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6976) for the relief of Anna M. Thiele.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reinstate the name of Anna M. Thiele on the pension-roll, and pay to her the same amount of pension to which she was entitled, and for which she was rated as the widow of Peter Simonson, deceased, late captain of the Fifth Indiana Battery, and chief of artillery on the staff of General Stanley.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (by Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6976) for the relief of Anna M. Thiele, submit the following report:

Claimant was the widow of Peter Simonson, who was commissioned in September, 1861, as a captain of the Fifth Indiana Battery, and for meritorious services was promoted chief of artillery on General Stanley's staff, and from his promotion until the time of his death he served in that position; that while in the service and in the line of duty he was instantly killed while engaging the enemy on the 16th of June, 1864, before Pine Mountain, near Atlanta, Ga. As the widow of said Peter Simonson she was pensioned from the death of her husband until her marriage with Herman Thiele, October 28, 1870.

Claimant lived with her second husband for several years, when he abandoned her after having got possession and control of what little property she had received from her first husband, and leaving her without any means of support with an aged father dependent upon her. That her second husband died at Portland, Oregon, October 2, 1882, leaving no estate. She now seeks to have her name replaced upon the pension-rolls as the widow of Peter Simonson at the same rate she was entitled to and received up to the date of her remarriage with Herman Thiele.

It is an established rule of this committee where a husband has been killed in battle while engaging the enemy to recommend such class of cases to the favorable consideration of Congress. This claimant is advanced in years and is in destitute circumstances, and relies upon her own exertions for support. Her second husband squandered all her means and abandoned her, leaving her in her old age destitute. We therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY T. BRIDGES.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. PERKINS. Before that is done I ask unanimous consent, at the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE], who was unable to remain in the House, to call up the bill (H. R. 6545) to increase the pension of Henry T. Bridges. This soldier is in a dying condition, and the bill ought to pass.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant an increase of pension to Henry T. Bridges, late a soldier of the United States in the war with Mexico, and to pay him, from and after the passage of this act, $30 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6545) to increase the pension of Henry T. Bridges, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The claimant, Henry T. Bridges, served in the Mexican war in Company B, Second Tennessee Volunteers, from the 4th day of June, 1846, to the 25th day of May, 1847, a period of nearly one year, as shown by the records of the War Department. He applied for pension in 1856, claiming that while in the military service, and especially while at Vera Cruz, where he participated in a battle, and at Cerro Gordo and Jalapa, Mexico, in the spring of 1847, he contracted a severe illness, for which he was treated in hospital, and which necessitated his being carried in a wagon on the march to Jalapa, and that, although he somewhat recovered, he suffered a relapse on his return to the United States.

In this declaration he did not state the exact nature of his diseases, but in the testimony filed therewith (in 1856) it appeared that the diseases were of the lungs and rheumatism, one comrade stating that near Tampico, Mexico, one of claimant's ankles became swollen, so that he was carried in an ambulance. The hospital records not having been preserved, and the testimony of a commissioned officer not having been furnished, the claim, upon the death of the claimant's attorney, was abandoned, and not reopened until about 1876.

In April, 1883, the claim was allowed for chronic bronchitis, and pension has been paid for that disease alone at the rate of $8 per month from January 24, 1876, to January 23, 1885, and $16 per month thereafter.

In addition to the chronic bronchitis, for which claimant is pensioned, there is also a claim for rheumatism and dyspepsia on file among the pension papers, and it appears that the disability from these latter diseases, with the bronchitis, have rendered claimant a confirmed invalid and permanently disabled him for performing manual labor. Upon this point the examining board of three physicians at Cairo, Ill., May 19, 1886, report as follows:

"The claimant is anæmic and weak; chest is flat, with ribs and clavicle very prominent; percussion notes are dull over both lungs; the respiratory murmur is feeble, and is accompanied by sibilant and mucous râles varying in degree and position; has frequent cough; throat and fauces are red and inflamed. The right elbow-joint is enlarged and partially stiffened; can not be fully extended by about 15 degrees. Both knees are enlarged and stiffened by plastic deposits, neither can be fully extended or flexed by 10 or 15 degrees.

"These joints do not seem tender to moderate pressure. There is an exostosis as large as a hen's egg 2 inches below upper end of left fibula; it appears tender. The left tibia is enlarged nearly one-half throughout the shaft of the bone. There is an exostosis about 1 inch in diameter elevated three-fourths of an inch near spine of right tibia, and another about 3 inches above knee-joint of posterior side of femur. The instep in both feet is depressed, producing slight talipes valgus. We consider this man permanently disabled for the performance of any manual labor."

At a previous examination by Examining Surgeon J. T. Jones, of Jackson, Tenn., the claimant was found to be severely affected by dyspepsia as well as bronchitis and severe disability from rheumatism.

From the claimant's statements to these surgeons, it appears that about 1870 the rheumatism began to assume its severe form of enlarged joints and the growth of bony tumors, and Dr. D. S. Laws, a reliable physician, testifies to the continued existence of that condition ever since, and gives it as his opinion, after studying the claimant's diseases for twenty years, that the rheumatism, bronchitis, and dyspepsia grew from the same cause.

The claimant has presented to your committee reliable testimony showing that he was affected by rheumatism, as well as piles and bronchitis, at his return from the service in 1847, and that said diseases have continued to affect him ever since that year. There is also testimony in the pension claim which establishes the existence of rheumatism and dyspepsia (or diarrhea) during the soldier's military service, and of the continuance of dyspepsia since that time.

Your committee are well satisfied that the rheumatism, which constitutes claimant's chief affliction and which confines him to his house, prevents him from performing manual labor and renders his existence almost unendurable, had its commencement in the winter of 1847, near Tampico, Mexico, where claimant's "ankles were swelled," as was sworn to by his comrade, John M. King, in an affidavit filed in the pension claim more than thirty years ago.

The soldier served a long period of service, endured the privations incident to an army in an enemy's country, participated in battles, and is now in his old age rendered helpless by diseases in that way incurred.

Your committee are of the opinion that the bill should pass, and return it to the House with that recommendation.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I ask that the bill (H. R. 7907) granting a pension to Mary Ann Lang be taken up for present consideration.

Mr. MATSON. I must insist upon the motion, as we will not have more than time to pass the bills already acted upon.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCCREARY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar under the special order, had directed him to report sundry bills to the House with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole, were severally considered and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed; namely:

A bill (H. R. 6990) to place the name of Rebecca E. Shoemaker on the pension-roll;

A bill (H. R. 7665) granting a pension to John E. Lewis;

A bill (H. R. 2116) granting a pension to Johanna Eckhardt;

A bill (H. R. 6574) for the relief of William Compton;

A bill (H. R. 3706) granting a pension to Henry C. Richardson;

A bill (H. R. 6577) granting a pension to Abigail Sullivan;

A bill (H. R. 3690) granting a pension to Penelope Morton, widow of Lieut. James Morton;

A bill (H. R. 362) to increase the pension of Charles W. Sanborn;

A bill (H. R. 8217) granting a pension to Raphael Fowler;

A bill (H. R. 7097) granting a pension to Edmund Ryan;

A bill (H. R. 8722) granting a pension to Jessie M. Barthauer;

A bill (H. R. 215) granting a pension to James McCaffrey;

A bill (H. R. 780) granting a pension to James H. Darling;

A bill (H. R. 2174) granting a pension to Lewis Fichthorn;

A bill (H. R. 4831) granting a pension to Delilah Vandevender;

A bill (H. R. 7974) granting a pension to Heman Rankins;

A bill (H. R. 8629) granting a pension to Mrs. Abba E. Jackson;

A bill (H. R. 7111) granting a pension to Caroline Pautel;

A bill (H. R. 8400) for the relief of Lydia Burridge;

A bill (H. R. 8174) granting a pension to Ellen Sexton;

A bill (H. R. 5759) granting a pension to John H. Roundtree;

A bill (H. R. 6907) granting an increase of pension to Elias Shafer;

A bill (H. R. 7577) granting a pension to Lewis C. Keck;

A bill (H. R. 6973) for the relief of Enoch Weathers;

A bill (H. R. 6976) for the relief of Anna M. Thiele;

A bill (H. R. 6545) to increase the pension to Henry T. Bridges; and

A bill (H. R. 5756) granting a pension to David Gibbons.

The following bills reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments were severally considered, the amendments concurred in, and the bills as amended ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 7857) to increase the pension of Henry L. Potter;

A bill (H. R. 5903) for the relief of Lewis Davis, a soldier of the war of 1812;

A bill (H. R. 7719) granting an increase of pension to George W. Kincaid;

A bill (H. R. 6245) for the relief of William Burk;

A bill (H. R. 8159) granting a pension to Jane Brown Dunn;

A bill (H. R. 891) granting a pension to Eliza Ann Shaver,

A bill (H. R. 2529) granting a pension to Mary Monti;

A bill (H. R. 2215) granting a pension to Charles Glamann;

A bill (H. R. 7115) granting a pension to William Scott;

A bill (H. R. 5574) granting a pension to Benjamin F. Beyers;

A bill (H. R. 3016) granting a pension to Mary F. Harkins;

A bill (H. R. 4743) granting pensions to Ada Piatt, Leota Piatt, and Jessie Piatt;

A bill (H. R. 5792) granting a pension to Mary A. Wells,

A bill (H. R. 3125) for the relief of Susan Jones;

A bill (H. R. 7944) granting a pension to Ann V. Ferguson;

A bill (H. R. 8281) for the relief of Lieut. James G. W. Hardy; and

A bill (H. R. 6949) granting a pension to Emeline C. Young; the title of the latter being amended to conform to the amendments in the bill.

The bill (H. R. 8285) to remove the political disabilities of Elliott Johnson was considered.

Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE. I move to amend this bill by making it read "Johnston," as the name is incorrectly spelled.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed (two thirds voting in favor thereof).

The following Senate bills reported from the Committee of the Whole were considered, ordered to a third reading, and being read the third time, were passed; namely:

A bill (S. 331) granting a pension to John Kalbfleisch;

A bill (S. 2419) granting a pension to Lemuel R. Rea;

A bill (S. 835) for the relief of Elisha Griswold;

A bill (S. 1096) granting a pension to James Lucas;

A bill (S. 801) for the relief of Basile Champagne;

A bill (S. 816) granting a pension to Anastasia Walter;

A bill (S. 820) granting a pension to David A. Servis;

A bill (S. 805) granting a pension to Melvina Greenwood;

A bill (S. 1717) granting a pension to Emma Van Bernewitz;

A bill (S. 811) granting a pension to Lydia D. Holtz;

A bill (S. 860) granting a pension to Stephen Singleton; and

A bill (S. 39) granting an increase of pension to Frederick Beno.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the several votes taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECOMMITTED.

The bill (H. R. 2115) granting a pension to Fletcher S. Dewey was reported back with the recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The recommendation of the Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

The bill (H. R. 366) granting a pension to James Ferris was reported back with the recommendation that it be laid on the table.

The recommendation of the Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The bill (S. 806) granting a pension to William Healy was reported from the Committee of the Whole with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

The recommendation of the Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

ANNA MERTZ.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent to call up from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (S. 1237) granting a pension to Anna Mertz.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Anna Mertz, the widow, and the minor children of Charles A. Mertz, late a captain of Company K, Sixty-second Illinois Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. LANE) is as follows:

The committee to whom was referred the bill (S. 1237) beg leave to report that they have considered the same, and adopted the report of the Senate on said bill as their own report, which is as follows:

"[Senate Report No. 448, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1237) granting a pension to Anna Mertz, widow, and the minor children of Charles A. Mertz, have examined the same, and report:

"The claimant is the widow of Charles A. Mertz, deceased, who was a captain in Company K, of Sixty-second Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry, in the war of the rebellion. The husband was mustered into the service as captain, April 10, 1862, and resigned June 7, 1863. It appears from the certificate of Dr. John W. Cameron, surgeon of the regiment, dated Jackson, Tenn., 6th day of January, 1863, that he was suffering from disease in such manner as to require a furlough of thirty days, and furlough was recommended for that time. He returned, however, to the regiment at Jackson, Tenn., but on the 17th of May, 1863, the surgeon of the regiment again certified that he was wholly unfit for duty, and that there would be no probability of his recovery in less than six months, if at all. Upon this he tendered his resignation, and the same was accepted. He returned home, but never recovered.

"It appears from the testimony of his comrades and neighbors on file that he was a sound, healthy man before he entered the Army. It is shown that he was attacked while in the service, from the labor and exposure incident thereto, with chronic intermittent fever, followed by acute dysentery, which debilitated him to the extent that he was wholly unfit for duty. Upon his return home, as appears from the evidence of his neighbors, and Dr. Keneper and others, he was continuously affected with chronic diarrhea, catarrh, and intense pains in the head. To ease his suffering, he frequently took laudanum and morphine under the advice of physicians. This relief was, however, temporary. He never applied for a pension, although he constantly attributed his complaints to his army service. He worked occasionally at his trade, but was subject at any time to attacks of very severe diarrhea, accompanied with acute catarrhal pains in the head and face.

"On the 1st of December, 1884, he died from the effects of an overdose of morphine taken to alleviate his suffering. The evidence does not show that he had a prescription from a physician upon the occasion of the fatal dose. It shows that he had, under medical advice several times given him, taken the same medicine, and was in the habit of taking it when attacked by his disease. We think the death clearly traceable to the disease as its primary cause.

"The widow is very poor; has two children of this soldier, offsprings of her marriage with him, depending upon her support.

"We recommend passage of the bill, amended by inserting 'captain' in seventh line in place of 'private,' which is a misdescription of the deceased."

In consideration of the facts of this case the committee recommend that said bill do pass.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CANNON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MATTHEW H. REYNOLDS.

Mr. FORD. I ask unanimous consent to call up from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 4774) granting a pension to Matthew H. Reynolds.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to put the name of Matthew H. Reynolds, late private of Company B, First Michigan Cavalry, on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4774) granting a pension to Matthew H. Reynolds, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

Reynolds enlisted August 25, 1861, as a private in Company B, First Regiment Michigan Cavalry, and was discharged November 27, 1862, "on account of rheumatic lameness of the back and shoulders, with acute pain through the lungs." The certificate of disability for discharge further stated—

"He was severely injured in the back by a load of logs falling upon him before his enlistment, and has suffered from that injury nearly all the time since."

On July 1, 1879, Reynolds filed an application for a pension, and alleged that while in the line of duty near Manassas, Va., and being engaged in shoeing a young horse, he became injured and contracted rheumatism. His claim was rejected July 15, 1884, on the ground "that claimant's alleged rheumatism is the result of an injury to his back incurred prior to his enlistment, as shown by the certificate of disability upon which he was discharged the service."

From the testimony submitted to the committee it can not be doubted that, at the time of his enlistment, Reynolds was a sound, able-bodied man. Albert Hoag and Daniel Fraser, in a joint affidavit, testify that they well knew Reynolds prior to his enlistment, and that he was a "strong, healthy man." Edward M. Watson testifies that he enlisted at the same time with Reynolds, and in the same company, and that he distinctly remembers Reynolds as a sound, healthy man, and that—

"Reynolds was one of the first men put on duty as company blacksmith, and during the year that I remained with his company don't think he was away or unable for duty. In fact, I do not hesitate to state that in 1861 he (Reynolds) had no visible ailments that I ever heard of, and I was acquainted with him for several years previous to the war."

Edward N. Negus, late first sergeant of Reynolds's company, testifies that he knew Reynolds at the time of his enlistment, and that he was then, to all appearances, as sound and healthy as any man in the regiment. That Reynolds, upon enlistment, was at once appointed company blacksmith, and served in that capacity until discharged. Also, that in 1862—

"Reynolds was shoeing one of the company horses, it being a colt that had been captured a few days before; the horse struggled and threw Reynolds, and wrenched his back, from which hurt he never recovered while in the service."

Dr. Louis D. Cyr, of Marquette, Mich., testifies that he knew Reynolds for four or five years before he enlisted, and that he then seemed to be strong and vigorous and not suffering from any disease.

In an affidavit dated the 26th of March, 1888, and which has been submitted to the committee, the claimant, Reynolds, emphatically and positively denies that he was ever injured by a load of logs falling upon him; that he never had anything to do with logs or logging prior to the war; that he never was on or near a load of logs; that before enlistment he was engaged in mining in the iron region of Northern Michigan; that the surgeon must have made a mistake in certifying that he (Reynolds) was injured before enlistment by a load of logs falling upon him; that the surgeon evidently confounded him (Reynolds) with another blacksmith named Hutchins, who worked at the forge, but who could not shoe horses or ride in the saddle on account of some weakness or injury to his back. And he further says, "It is my belief that the surgeon has mixed his (Hutchins) case with mine."

This recent affidavit is hereto appended and made a part of this report.

Reynolds is now an inmate of the Michigan Soldiers' Home, and, owing to his injury, is in a perfectly helpless condition.

The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

"STATE OF MICHIGAN, County of Kent, ss:

"In the matter of the claim for original invalid pension of Matthew H. Reynolds, of Company B, First Regiment Michigan Cavalry Volunteers.

"Personally came before me, a notary public in and for aforesaid county and State, Matthew H. Reynolds, of Soldiers' Home, in the county of Kent, State of Michigan, reputable and entitled to credit; and who, being duly sworn, declares in relation to the aforesaid claim as follows:

"My post-office address is Soldiers' Home, Grand Rapids, Mich.; my age is sixty-two years. Having lately learned that my claim for pension as given above was rejected because some one has claimed that I was injured before my enlistment by a load of logs falling on me, I do most solemnly swear that the allegation is false; I never was injured by a load of logs; I never was on or near a load of logs; I never had anything to do with logs or logging previous to the war, as I was engaged in the iron business and was living in the mining regions of Northern Michigan. I would respectfully call attention to the fact that Capt. E. L. Negus, in command of my company, has also sworn that I was as sound a man at my enlistment, in August, 1861, as any man in the regiment; and has also testified to the very time when I was injured, viz, at or near Centreville, Va., in August, 1862, while at work shoeing a wild colt which had been captured from the enemy.

"I would also call attention to the fact that I shod horses over a year in all sorts of weather—often in the mud; sometimes set as many as twenty shoes in a day. My witnesses—Edward Watson, Joseph Harris, George Harris, Albert Hoag, James Maloney, Matthew Hardyman—have each testified to my being a sound man before the war. There was another blacksmith named Hutchins, who worked at the forge, but could not shoe horses or ride the saddle, on account of some weakness or injury to his back, and it is my belief that the surgeon has mixed his case with mine. As I have been perfectly helpless for many years on account of said injury to my back, incurred while in the United States service, and am now confined in the Michigan Soldiers' Home Hospital, I entreat the kind consideration of your honorable body.

"MATTHEW H. REYNOLDS."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELLEN M. THIERS.

Mr. O'DONNELL. I ask unanimous consent to call up from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 5789) granting a pension to Ellen M. Thiers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Ellen M. Thiers, a resident of Battle Creek, Mich., at the rate of $25 per month, on account of disability resulting from disease contracted while serving as a hospital nurse during the war of the rebellion.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendment:

In line 6 strike out "$25" and insert "$12."

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5789) granting a pension to Ellen M. Thiers, submit the following report:

Ellen M. Thiers was appointed a nurse in the hospital service of the western department of the Chicago sanitary commission, and her appointment confirmed by Miss D. L. Dix, general superintendent of nurses in military hospitals of the United States. She entered the service in 1863; was detailed for duty at Paducah, Ky., and served in the hospital there until the close of the war in 1865. She had the general supervision of two wards, and her labor was very severe.

The hospital was in a very high building, and she, in the performance of her duties, was obliged many times a day to descend from the top to the bottom and to ascend again twenty-five steps. This brought on her sickness peculiar to women, from which she has suffered ever since, and has resulted in fatty degeneration of the heart. She is now an old woman, and is unable to labor by reason of the ailments she incurred in the service, and is dependent on relatives for support.

We recommend that the bill be amended by inserting "twelve" in lieu of "twenty-five" in the sixth line, and as amended, passed.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. O'DONNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 10.30 p. m. having arrived, the House, pursuant to order, stands adjourned until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 12, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER laid before the House bills of the Senate of the following titles; which were severally read twice, and referred to the committees indicated:

The bill (S. 269) to grant to the Fort Smith and El Paso Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (S. 449) for the erection of a monument to the memory of Maj. Gen. Henry Knox at Thomaston, Me.—to the Committee on the Library.

The bill (S. 658) for the erection of a public building at the city of Beatrice, Nebr.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (S. 1322) providing for the erection of a public building at the city of Hastings, Nebr.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (S. 1507) providing for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Territories.

The bill (S. 1725) for the relief of the legal representatives of Lewis W. Washington, deceased—to the Committee on War Claims.

The bill (S. 1813) for the relief of Susan B. Hopkins, widow of Arvah Hopkins, late of Tallahassee, Fla., deceased—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (S. 1929) to authorize the purchase of five manuscript volumes (being letter-books) of William Vans Murray, formerly minister at The Hague and at Paris—to the Committee on the Library.

The bill (S. 2024) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at or near Clarksville, Mo., and for other purposes—to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (S. 2536) granting to the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company the right of way through the Nez Percé Indian reservation—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (S. 2542) to reimburse certain persons who expended moneys and furnished services and supplies in repelling invasions and suppressing Indian hostilities within the territorial limits of the present State of Nevada—to the Select Committee on Indian Depredation Claims.

The bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SAWYER, for Saturday and Monday, on account of important engagements.

To Mr. DARLINGTON, until Tuesday, on account of important business.

To Mr. GAINES, for ten days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. O'DONNELL, by unanimous consent leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Nelson Green, Forty-ninth Congress, without leaving copies, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 339) for the relief of J. E. Pilcher;

A bill (H. R. 671) for the relief of the heirs of John S. Fillmore, deceased;

A bill (H. R. 1473) authorizing the President of the United States to arrange a conference between the United States of America and the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America, Hayti, San Domingo, and the Empire of Brazil; and

A bill (H. R. 6831) to detach the county of Audrain, in the State of Missouri, from the eastern, and attach it to the western, judicial district of said State.

PORT OF NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. LAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar and put upon its passage the bill (H. R. 3376) to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limits of the port of entry of New Orleans, La., shall be, and the same are hereby, extended so as to include that portion of the parish of Jefferson lying between the Mississippi River, Lake Pontchartrain, the upper line of the parish of Orleans, left bank, and a line running parallel thereto, commencing at the Mississippi River at a point 2 miles above the upper line of the said parish of Orleans, and extending to Lake Pontchartrain.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I think there ought to be some explanation of that bill.

Mr. LAGAN. Mr. Speaker, the Southern Pacific Railroad having been extended through from Texas, they found it necessary to procure space for wharves at New Orleans. They could not be accommodated in the city within the limits of the port, and in consequence they had to purchase property beyond, and they now wish to have the limits of the port extended so as to take them in.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Is this concurred in by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. LAGAN. Yes; they are working now under permission from him to receive goods.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LAGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING, EMPORIA, KANS.

Mr. RYAN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 1913) and put it on its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will send for the bill and will recognize the gentleman later.

OLD UNITED STATES COURT BUILDINGS, UTICA, N. Y.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 103), and that it be now put upon its passage.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Department of Justice be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to transfer and relinquish to the city of Utica, State of New York, all the right, title, and claim of the United States to the rooms in what is described as the city hall, in said city of Utica, which were formerly used for the United States courts and officials thereof under a deed or lease executed on the 25th day of May, 1857, the same having been entirely abandoned by the said courts and officials thereof, a new building having been erected by the Government for the convenience and occupancy of said United States courts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN]?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Will the gentleman explain the object of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. The letter of the Attorney-General at the end of the report covers the whole case. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, February 13, 1888.

SIR: Your letter of the 9th instant has been received, transmitting House resolution 103 respecting the rooms of the United States at Utica, N. Y., leased for court purposes. In reply, you are informed that the Department has long had no use of the rooms for the purpose mentioned. They have been annually a source of some expense to the Department in its official supervision of the same through the marshal of the northern district of New York, and some other slight expenses. In my annual report to Congress, December 1, 1887, legislation was recommended to dispose of the interest of the United States in the rooms.

It is understood that there is no probability of a future need for them by the courts. I therefore renew my recommendation that Congress shall dispose of them in such a manner as it shall deem proper, and, in my judgment, the action proposed by the joint resolution is appropriate.

Very respectfully,

A. H. GARLAND,
Attorney-General.

Hon. J. R. NEAL,
House of Representatives.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHERMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

A. M. ANDERSON AND OTHERS.

Mr. COWLES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5222) for the relief of A. M. Anderson and others.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, an amount sufficient to adjust and settle the accounts of A. M. Anderson, Hall Caldwell, A. C. Bryan, and C. C. Crumpler, special deputy collectors employed by J. J. Mott, then collector of the sixth collection district of North Carolina, during and for the months of January and February, 1879, to each, or to his legal representative or heirs at law, the pay of a special deputy collector for the two months above mentioned, they having been employed by the said collector of the district on said duty, and never having received any compensation therefor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COWLES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the bill to which I referred a while ago is not on the Speaker's table. I wish to remind the Chair that I called it up some days ago and asked unanimous consent, but my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] suggested that I should let it lie on the Speaker's table until I could find an opportunity to bring it up later.

Mr. MILLS. What is the nature of the bill?

Mr. RYAN. It is a public-building bill.

Mr. MILLS. I must object to that bill.

Mr. RYAN. It is not quite necessary for the gentleman to object just yet. I am merely informing the Speaker of the status of the bill. I understand that by a mistake it was referred to the committee, although it was intended that it should remain on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair remembers the circumstances. It was to have been retained in the hands of the Chair, but it was inadvertently sent to the committee. The Clerk will read the bill, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9770) for the erection of a public building at Emporia, Kans.

Mr. MILLS. Do I understand the Chair to say that that bill is now before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that it be now considered.

Mr. MILLS. I stated that I objected to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. MILLS. Five days have been granted for the consideration of public-building bills, and besides that other days have been set aside for that purpose. I am willing to have unanimous consent to go on with other business in the morning, but I am unwilling that public-building bills shall absorb any more of the time of the House.

THOMAS MATHEWS AND OTHERS.

Mr. NUTTING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4581) for the relief of Thomas Mathews and others, and that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the claims of Thomas Mathews, for the sum of $54.80; H. A. Crane, for the sum of $37.80; William McChesney, for the sum of $20.20; John K. Post & Co., for the sum of $324.20; E. W. Rathbun & Co., for the sum of $585.20; Irwin P. Sloan, for the sum of $611.40; C. C. Morton, for the sum of $103.20; Charles H. Getman, for the sum of $115.20; Edward Monen, for the sum of $124.60; Smith, Murdock & Co., for the sum of $107.60; Daniel L. Couch, for the sum of $142.80; Failing and Pratt, for the sum of $71.40; Failing and Rundell, for the sum of $45.60; L. A. Card, for the sum of $75.20; E. L. and S. Thornton, for the sum of $35.80; Paige, Fairchild & Co., for the sum of $64; D. P. Fairchild, for the sum of $55.20; O. M. Bond & Co., for the sum of $49.20; I. P. Wetmore, for the sum of $32; Ross & Co., for the sum of $72.60; Bond and Jenkins, for the sum of $23.20; Crane, Belden & Co., for the sum of $46.20; Bond, Kinyon & Co., for the sum of $8.40; Kinyon, Wright & Co., for the sum of $41.80; Charles O'Harra, for the sum of $10.40; Page & Co., for the sum of $7.20; Hogoman and Murdock, for the sum of $35.60; Cheeney, Ames & Co., for the sum of $10.80; now or formerly importers in the customs district of Oswego, N. Y., being the several amounts of fees alleged to have been unlawfully collected of them respectively, by collectors of customs at the port of Oswego, N. Y., from the 1st day of April, 1873, to the 31st day of December, 1882, inclusive, under section 2654 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (second edition); and in case he shall be satisfied that such claims or any part or parts thereof were unlawfully collected, he shall refund the same to the said firms or parties, or their legal representatives, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

The report (by Mr. BURROWS) was read, as follows:

That the Committee on Ways and Means of the Forty-eighth Congress made favorable report of this bill after referring the claims therein provided for to the Secretary of the Treasury for consideration, and after due investigation this committee adopt their favorable report, and append hereto a recent letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in relation thereto.

The collector of customs at the port of Oswego, N. Y., from the 1st day of April, 1873, to the 31st day of December, 1882, inclusive, demanded and collected of the persons and firms hereinafter named the several sums set opposite their respective names. These several sums are made up of fees collected by the collector at said port during the time named for certificates claimed to be of the character authorized and covered by section 2654 of the Revised Statutes (section 2, act of March 2, 1879, Statutes at Large, vol. 1, page 706.)

The legality of these several payments was tested in the case of Cochrane v. Schell, Supreme Court of the United States, October, 1882, term, in which decision it was held that the stamp affixed to consular invoices (on importations similar to those made by the persons named in the bill) was not such a certificate as warranted the collection from the importer of a fee of 20 cents. In a letter from the Secretary of the United States Treasury concerning the subject-matter of this bill and the fees therein mentioned, dated December 19, 1884, the Secretary disposes of the whole matter. Following is a copy of the letter:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
"Washington, D. C., December 19, 1884.

"SIR: In response to a communication made under your direction on the 24th of June last to the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting for his consideration H. R. 7106, a bill for the relief of Thomas Mathews and others, I have the honor to return herewith a copy of a letter under the date of the 10th instant from the collector of customs at Oswego, N. Y., advising the payment to Thomas Mathews and the other persons named in the bill of the amounts set opposite the several names of the same persons in his letter. The claims to these sums arise under a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States procured at the October term, 1882, in the case of Cochrane vs. Augustus Schell, in which decision it was held that the stamp affixed to consular invoices (on importations similar to those made by the persons named in the bill) was not such a certificate as warranted the collection from the importer of a fee of 20 cents. The sums named in the letter were for fees of this character exacted under the supposed authority of section 2654 of the Revised Statutes (section 2, act of March 2, 1879, Stats. at Large, vol. 1, page 706). Accompanying the letter are detailed statements of the sums collected from each person named in the bill, with the date of collection as taken from the records of the collector's office.

"The claimants would seem to be justly entitled to a refund of the amounts exacted of them.

"Very respectfully,

"CHAS. E. COON, Acting Secretary.

"Hon. H. A. HERBERT,
"Of the Committee on Ways and Means,
"House of Representatives."

The following is a list of the persons and firms affected by this bill and covered by the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury and the letter of the collector of the port of Oswego, N. Y., to wit:

Charles H. Getman	$115.20	Irwin P. Sloan	$611.40
J. K. Post & Co	324.20	Edward Monen	124.60
E. W. Rathbun & Co	585.20	Smith, Murdock & Co	107.60
Kinyon, Wright & Co	41.80	Hogoman & Murdock	35.60
Paige, Fairchild & Co	64.00	Charles O'Harra	10.40
Cheeney, Ames & Co.	10.80	Page & Co	7.20
William McChesney	20.20	Bond, Kinyon & Co	8.40
Crane, Belden & Co	46.20	C. C. Morton	103.20
Bond & Jenkins	23.20	Thomas Mathews	54.80
O. M. Bond & Co	49.20	E. L. & S. Thornton	35.80
Failing & Pratt	71.40	Failing & Rundell	45.60
Ross & Co	72.60	D. P. Fairchild	55.20
L. A. Card	75.20	I. P. Wetmore	32.00
H. A. Crane	37.80
Daniel L. Couch	142.80	Total	2,911.60

These sums, there is no doubt, were collected without authority of law, and in the opinion of your committee ought to be returned to the parties named. These several sums are now in the Treasury of the United States.

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 9, 1888.

"SIR: The Department is in receipt of a letter, dated the 6th instant, from Mr.

Henry Talbot, clerk of your committee, in which he incloses bill H. R. 4581, entitled 'A bill for the relief of Thomas Mathews and others,' and requests that you be advised whether the Department has any information in the matters referred to in the bill since the date of its communication to Mr. Herbert, of the Committee on Ways and Means of December 19, 1884, which is embodied in the report of the committee on the bill in Forty-eighth Congress (Report No. 2698).

"In reply, you are informed that the Department has no knowledge of any facts or matters which have occurred in connection with the claims set forth in the bill since the date of its said letter which would throw any further light upon the merits thereof.

"It would seem, however, upon reading said letter of the 19th December, 1884, that the Department failed to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the customs fees in question, which the bill proposes to refund to Mr. Mathews and the other parties mentioned, were paid at the custom-house at Oswego, during the period stated, without protest and appeal, and consequently that under the provisions of the fifteenth section of the act of June 30, 1864 (U. S. Statutes at Large, volume 13, page 202), now section 2932 of the Revised Statutes, the decision of the collector of customs at Oswego, in exacting such fees, became 'final and conclusive.'

"Respectfully, yours,

"I. H. MAYNARD,
"Assistant Secretary.

"Hon. J. C. BURROWS,
"Committee Ways and Means,
"United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to. They are embodied in the bill, as printed above.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NUTTING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORT SMITH AND EL PASO RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, being called away from the House last evening by illness at my home, I requested the Clerk not to permit a Senate bill in reference to right of way through the Indian Territory to be laid before the House until I could be present to-day. As I have been detained in reaching the House this morning, the bill to which I allude has been taken up and referred. It is the bill (S. 269) to grant to the Fort Smith and El Paso Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be now taken up and put upon its passage. A House bill identical in its terms with this Senate bill has, by a unanimous vote of the Committee on Indian Affairs, been favorably reported in this House. The bill simply grants the right of way from Fort Smith to El Paso through the Choctaw and Chickasaw country and one or two Indian reservations.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. BLOUNT. Did the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] state that this bill has been unanimously reported?

Mr. ROGERS. It has been in both Houses; and it contains all the restrictions heretofore agreed on by Congress in reference to grants of right of way through the Indian Territory.

There being no objection, the reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROGERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, House bill No. 9582, similar in terms to the Senate bill just passed, will be laid on the table.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

BRIDGE ACROSS RED RIVER OF THE NORTH.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2572) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Red River of the North by the Duluth, Rainy Lake River and Southwestern Railway Company.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. This bill has been favorably reported by the Committee on Commerce. With the amendments recommended by the committee, the bill is in the usual form for bridge bills. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill at length.

There being no objection, the reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The amendments reported by the Committee on Commerce will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the beginning of section 2 strike out the words:

"That the said bridge shall be constructed as a pivot draw-bridge, and shall be so constructed that a free and unobstructed passage may be secured to all water crafts, rafts, or logs navigating said river at the point aforesaid."

And insert the words:

"That the bridge authorized by this act shall be constructed as a pivot draw-bridge, with a draw over the main channel at an accessible and the best navigable point, and with spans giving a clear width of water way measured at the lowest stage of water known at the locality, of not less than 80 feet in the clear on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw, and the bottom chord of said bridge shall not be of less elevation than 1 foot above the plane of the highest known flood at the locality; and provision shall also be made in the location and construction of abutments and approaches to allow the free passage of flood water; and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel to and the bridge itself at right angles to the direction of the current of said river. And said corporation shall provide, at its own expense, such sheer-booms, guide-piers, and other devices as may be necessary to facilitate the safe passage of boats or other water-craft through the spans of said bridge."

In line 26 of section 2 strike out the words "Secretary of War" and insert the words "Light-House Board."

After the word "bridge," in line 9 of section 4, insert "and equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph companies."

Add as a new section the following:

"SEC. 7. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date thereof."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NELSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LYDIA D. HOLTZ.

Mr. MILLS. I now demand the r gular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] desires to call attention to an error in reference to the bill (S. 811) granting a pension to Lydia D. Holtz.

Mr. DOCKERY. The bill just mentioned by the Chair was reported adversely from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SAWYER], but by inadvertence it appeared upon the Private Calendar as if reported favorably, the Calendar not showing that there has been an adverse report. In consequence of this fact, the Committee of the Whole House last evening, acting under a misapprehension as to the nature of the report which had been made, laid the bill aside to be reported favorably to the House; and later in the evening it was passed by the House and the motion to reconsider laid on the table. I now ask unanimous consent that the action of the House in passing the bill be reconsidered, and the action of the Committee of the Whole House in favorably reporting it be vacated so that the bill shall remain on the Private Calendar for future consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There being no objection, the order requested by Mr. DOCKERY was made.

CONVICT LABOR.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 9932) to prevent convict labor from competing with organized labor, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Labor, and ordered to be printed.

MAJ. JAMES BELGER.

Mr. FORD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. 9196) for the relief of Maj. James Belger; which was laid on the table.

He also, from the same committee, reported back, in the nature of a substitute for the foregoing, a bill (H. R. 9933) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Maj. James Belger with the rank and grade of colonel; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I now demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the morning hour for the presentation of reports be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I now ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to present may hand them in at the Clerk's desk for reference to the appropriate Calendars.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

TARIFF.

Mr. MILLS. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAUGEN], whose remarks yesterday were interrupted by the rising of the committee, is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HAUGEN resumed and concluded his remarks, which are now published entire.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, if it were not for the "surplus," the Democratic party would, indeed, be in dire distress for an argument upon which to base their claim to continuance in office. Four years ago their rallying cry was "Cleveland and reform." It would be sheer mockery to repeat that cry in the coming struggle, for not even the saintly Mugwump is any longer capable of sustaining the President as a reformer. The President himself by his silence on the subject admits that "civil-service reform" no longer occupies that prominent position it did in the balmy autumn days of 1884. "Public office" has become a "Democratic trust," and not a "public trust," and is rapidly coming to deserve the scondemame nation as those other unholy combinations which prey upon the public under the misapplied name of "trusts."

There is no longer, thinks the President, that supreme danger in accepting a second term of the highest office in the gift the American people, of which he was so apprehensive in his letter of acceptance. In his immaculate hands no danger of abuse lurks in the great power of appointment to effect the goal of personal ambition.

The view changes before the Presidential vision. The "public trust" of 1884 has given way in 1887 to the "surplus," with the "vicious, inequitable, and illogical tariff" heaving into sight. We were on the very brink of ruin, according to the President's message, on the 5th of December, 1887. He starts out with saying:

> You are confronted at the threshold of your legislative duties with a condition of the national finances which imperatively demands immediate and careful consideration.

And further on—

> It will not do to neglect this situation because its dangers are not now palpably imminent and apparent. They exist none the less certainly, and await the unforeseen and unexpected occasion when suddenly they will be precipitated upon us.

The danger, he tells you, is there, although "not now palpably imminent or apparent." Queen Elizabeth, in like manner, was in the habit of telling the House of Commons when that body clamored for administrative reform in England, that she knew best what was for the welfare of her subjects, and that they better attend to those duties He Majesty graciously assigned them. History records no such supreme insight into affairs "not palpable or apparent" to the citizen or legislator since the days of "Good Queen Bess" until the reign of Grover the First.

But the alarm seems to have faded away as gently as the last echoes of the Presidential message. While his fellow-partisans took up its sad refrain and carried it to every nook and corner of the land, the people of the United States, confident in the strength and stability of their institutions, refused to be convulsed. The public mind and business confidence are certainly as composed as at the date of the message. As a prophet of evil the President is a failure.

Even this Democratic House betrays by its masterly inactivity its failure to appreciate the warning signal of impending danger, for, although the alarm note was sounded in early December, no remedy is proposed by the Democratic Committee on Ways and Means, the only source from which it could originate, before the middle of April. Suspicion might suggest that Democracy fears to meet the issue recklessly precipitated upon it by the President without first hearing from its nominating convention in June, and that the interval has been purposely bridged over by inaction. The next few weeks will disclose whether this is well founded.

The bill before us, Democrats say, is intended to meet the danger of an accumulated surplus in the Treasury. I believe as firmly as any Democrat that no more revenue should be collected than necessary to meet the expenses of the Government economically administered. But parsimony is not economy. I would pay the nation's just debts and moral obligations as well. I would at least make an honest effort to fairly, equitably, and liberally compensate the herbic veteran volunteer soldiery, whose prowess in its death throes preserved the nation's life and integrity. I would consider with liberality, without wastefulness, the imperative needs of our internal commerce, and improve our great national highways, recognizing that to the interior portions of the country the navigability of our lake and river routes furnishes the surest safeguard against extortionate railway charges.

The President entertains different views. He vetoed the dependent pension bill, as well as the river and harbor appropriation bill passed by the last Congress. It might well be asked, was there premeditated malice in this? Had he signed those bills, as Congress by its well-considered action said he ought, and the needs of the country demanded that he should, the excess of our income over our expenditures during the last fiscal year would not have added alarmingly to the surplus, and, what is of more importance, it would have been an act of humanity in the one case, relieving thousands of sufferers, and in the other would have cheapened the cost of transportation of every bushel of grain carried from interior and Western States to the seaboard. For some inexplicable reason—unless he considered it necessary to create a surplus, so that he might have some pretext on which to base his attack upon the protective system of the country—he failed to meet the reasonable expectations of his countrymen. Now, using this surplus, for which he is individually largely responsible, as a shield, he proceeds to launch against the enterprise, the genius, the thrift of the people the venomous darts of free trade by parading in his message the surplus as the necessary result of what he is pleased to term the "vicious, inequitable, and illogical tariff." And to his stubborn resolution his party bows in abject submission.

The President in his message expresses doubt as to whether the law authorizes the payment of the bonded debt out of moneys now in the Treasury in advance of its maturity. By the unanimous vote of this House he was relieved of his doubt, not even Democrats having the effrontery of upholding him in this misconstruction of a plain law. Had the President continued the policy of his own and former Secretaries of the Treasury he would have had no surplus to point to. This doubt never occurred to his mind until some $17,000,000 had been paid out of the Treasury by his Secretary. Then first did it occur to the President that there was danger that he would be deprived of his dear surplus. Had he continued to obey the law as he started in, the money locked up in the Treasury would have been restored to its legitimate channels of trade and the interest on the bonds purchased saved to the people.

It is made apparent in this prolonged discussion that harmony does not altogether prevail in the ranks of the supporters of this bill. They are all agreed that a protective tariff, in the language of the President, is "vicious, inequitable, and illogical," except where it has breathed the spirit of life into some industry in the district of a Democratic member.

SUGAR.

The Democratic sugar of Louisiana, costing the people of my State some $2,000,000 per year of unnecessary and vexatious taxation, without a redeeming feature, which it has been repeatedly demonstrated has failed of the only legitimate object and purpose of protection, that of stimulating an industry in order that it may eventually meet the wants of our own people, and thus by force of home competition lower the price, has been treated more tenderly by the Mills bill.

If there were any reasonable hope that continuing the protective duty on sugar would result in production approximately commensurate with our consumption, I for one should object to its abolition; but after a trial of twenty-seven years, and a cost to the people of this country of hundreds of millions of dollars in vain efforts to encourage and stimulate an industry which refuses to respond, it does seem that the sugar tax ought to be abolished.

Sugar is certainly one of those articles commonly called the necessaries of life, used by the poor and rich alike, and the abolition of this duty would cheapen sugar to the consumer and would insure a decided and material relief to the Treasury by cutting off one of the principal—indeed, the very largest—source of revenue. But the sectionalism of the bill is apparent at the very outset, and the planter of Louisiana need have no fear. His special interest will receive no harm at Democratic hands. There is but little relief offered in this direction by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, considering the opportunity here presented to accomplish their avowed purpose of materially reducing the surplus.

During the fiscal year 1886 and 1887 we imported sugar to the value of $68,897,102.27, the duty collected thereon amounting to the enormous sum of $56,515,601.67.

Including with the tariff on sugar the $1,496,836 collected on imported molasses gives a total of $58,012,464 paid out for the encouragement of this industry, which has so far failed to furnish one-eleventh of our consumption.

While I do not admit the general proposition so frequently laid down by the other side, that the price of an article is increased by the amount of the duty where the subject of the duty is an article which is capable of development to the extent of our demands, I do admit that where so small a part of our consumption is of domestic culture and manufacture as is the case with sugar the proposition is approximately correct.

So that, according to the favorite Democratic method of illustration, whenever a poor laborer takes his hard-earned wages and at the grocery invests them in sugar, for every dollar's worth of sugar purchased he is taxed by the rich planter and sugar refiner an additional 82 cents. This "robber tariff," to quote the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, enables the monopolistic "sugar trust" and sugar barons to take out of the consumer's pocket $1.82 for that which, were the duty removed, would cost him $1.

We produce only about 9 per cent. of the sugar consumed in this country, and the expense of this duty to our people is even greater than the amount collected, as the same rule of increased cost must be similarly applied to the Hawaiian sugar admitted free of duty, and which last year amounted to $9,255,351, as well as to domestic sugars. It would likewise affect the price of molasses and sirups. Of these we imported last year 38,007,700 gallons, valued at $5,355,475; 113,574 gallons of this being admitted free under the Hawaiian treaty. The duty is 4 cents per gallon on the lower and 8 cents on the higher grades.

It is proposed by my Republican friends, I believe, to substitute for this duty a bounty to be paid directly to the producer. On principle a bounty does not strike me favorably. Once established any effort to decrease or abolish it would encounter the most determined opposition. But I do not propose to set my judgment up against the intelligent opinion of my party. Very few men are able to sustain successfully or profitably to their constituents the rôle of independents, and I have no such conceit or inclination. I was elected as a Republican by a Republican constituency, which has the right to expect to find me in the Republican column. I do not intend to disappoint them.

It is satisfactorily demonstrated that the proposed plan to repeal the duty on sugars and grant a bounty instead, retaining only sufficient duty to meet the cost of this bounty, will save to the people about $50,000,000 per year, and at the same time leave the producer as fully protected as under the present law. This will certainly recommend itself to every citizen earnestly desiring a reduction of income, and to whose political ambition the surplus scarecrow is not absolutely essential. The planter ought not to object, for his protection remains intact. The consumer certainly will not, for he will be saved $50,000,000 per year. The Democratic politician alone will feel that his chief occupation, that of berating Republicans for heaping up the people's money in the Treasury, will be gone.

In this connection it is proper to say that the new diffusion process which seems to have been successfully introduced in Kansas, holds out the hope that we are on the eve of a revolution in the sugar industry, and that the sugar necessary for our consumption may still be produced by our own labor and prove profitable to the agriculturist, and result eventually in reducing the price to the consumer. If this desirable result can be attained, the broad, rich prairies of Kansas, and fertile fields of Wisconsin as well, now producing cereals, will be largely turned into cane-fields, thus reducing the oversupply of grain, and giving to our people sugar of our own production. As the grain crop of one State competes with that of every other in the common market, the effect of transforming to any considerable extent the grain-grower into a cane-grower will be an advantage to both.

RICE.

Rice is another Democratic product—I dare not say Southern, for fear of being accused of sectionalism, admitting, however, that I love the North better than the South, my own State better than any other, even in the North, but my adopted country as a whole better than any other country on this or on the other side of the Atlantic, not excepting that land of pine-clad mountains, laughing water-falls, and beautiful fiords, with a history humble as a nation, but of heroic individualism—the Land of the Midnight Sun. [Applause.]

A duty was placed upon rice in 1846, and it has since remained dutiable. It is a crop to the production of which, as hitherto to sugar, nature seems to have fixed a limit. It is healthful and nourishing, and a duty enhancing its cost to the consumer and failing to encourage its production to an extent influencing in any perceptible degree the market price, is indefensible with a large surplus in the Treasury. The following statement of the crops raised, prices prevailing, and duty will illustrate my argument:

Rice crop of the United States before and since the war.

Yearly consumption per head, England (1886), 10¾ (10.76) pounds.
Yearly consumption per head, United States (1886), 4 (4.02) pounds.
Rice at 3 cents per pound, cleaned in New Orleans, nets planter on plantation, as follows:
Forty-four bushels (10 barrels clean), per acre, low yield, $22.
Sixty bushels (16 barrels clean), per acre, average yield, $33.
Eighty bushels (20 barrels clean), per acre, not unusual yield, $48.
Better than wheat.

The last two rice crops have not varied materially from that of 1885, about 150,000,000 pounds. We imported in 1887, 94,686,659 pounds. With cheaper rice it is safe to say a much larger amount of this food product would be consumed per capita, as the table shows is the case in England. In their search for "raw and unmanufactured material" to be placed upon the free-list why did not the Democratic committee include in their proposed bill rough and uncleaned rice?

LEGITIMATE PROTECTION.

Unlike a bounty, a protective duty works its own repeal when imposed on legitimate objects; that is, such as are capable of development to the extent of our wants. A bounty remains stable, and its expense increases with the increase of domestic production. Under a proper protective duty, when home production approximates a point commensurate with the demand, prices, by the very force of domestic competition, gravitate to their natural level, the tax fading away without the least disturbing or alarming effect upon business. The price of many articles of clothing used by the laborer and artisan is no higher here than in England, showing that as to those goods protection has effected its purpose. From personal experience as to prices, I remember myself that in the latter part of the sixties a pair of ducking overalls, such as was then commonly used by lumbermen, cost $2.50; reduced to a gold basis, not less than $1.75. This sum will to-day buy a whole suit of the same material, and better made. A pair of driving-boots, costing at that time $10, costs to-day $5. Instead of ducking, the lumberman now uses woolens, paying for a Mackinaw suit $5, finding it cheaper and more comfortable.

The cost of a lumberman's outfit going into the woods in Wisconsin at present, may be stated as follows:

1 pair woolen pants	$2.50
1 Mackinac coat	2.50
2 pairs socks, at 75 cents	1.50
2 pairs drawers, at $1.25	2.50
2 undershirts, at $1.25	2.50
1 pair mittens	.75
2 overshirts, at $1.75	3.50
1 pair boot packs or rubber shoes	2.75
Total	18.50

These goods are of the very best material, and are principally manufactured in St. Paul and Minneapolis. The wearing-apparel is wool. The above is a complete outfit for winter use and wear.

And reduced to gold his wages are now higher than they were twenty years ago. Even the poor man's blanket, which is giving our friends on the other side so much concern, and with which they have been vainly trying to cover the hideous skeleton of free trade, is little, if any, dearer here than in England.

The cost of a pair of five-pound woolen blankets in England is $4.45. American blankets of precisely the same weight and quality cost $5.20. The duty is $4.25 and custom-house fees 65 cents. If the free-trade argument, that the cost is increased by the amount of the duty, were true, the poor man's blanket should cost $9.35 instead of $5.20, and that without allowing anything for transportation and incidental expenses of exchange.

But the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD], whom I do not see in the House, whose figures submitted here a few days ago I have examined, would go at it in this way:

Price of one pair poor man's blankets	$5.20
Robber tariff	4.95
Price of one pair poor man's blankets with robber tariff removed	.25
Gain to poor man	4.95

He would have you believe that under free trade a pair of blankets could be bought here for 25 cents. This is exactly the process of his deductions in figuring up the "gain" on necessaries under this bill. The proposition is too absurd for further comment. That gentleman also seems to labor under the misapprehension that an ad valorem duty is imposed on the article at its retail value here, for he quotes salt in his list at $3 per barrel (which is more than twice its value, even in Minnesota) and the duty at $1.20. The gentleman's statement will need a great deal of salt to preserve it through the summer months for use in the fall campaign. [Applause and laughter.] The same gentleman from Minnesota, in his over-anxiety to strengthen his case by large figures, includes among the necessaries of life "manufactures of silk" (page 3942 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD). On this article he says $15,540,301 duty was collected last year, a great share of it, no doubt, ruthlessly abstracted from the toiling farmers of the Third Minnesota district. The gentleman nicely discriminates between silks and diamonds, classing the former as "necessaries," but the latter as "luxuries." The evolutionary process seems at present to be resting at "silks" in the gentleman's district. When he returns he may, however, find his farmers reaching out for diamonds. He is a Ruskin in his tastes, who claimed that the true policy was to cheapen luxuries so that the poor might afford them as well as the rich, and he will easily catch up with the procession.

The statement made on this floor that common cotton prints can be bought here as cheaply as in England has not and can not truthfully be disputed. In some cases the duty is as high and even higher than the selling price here. The more expensive cotton fabrics are somewhat higher here than in England, owing to the fact that more labor enters into them and that our laborer demands and receives better wages than his European brother; but even in those the difference in price is not equal to the duty.

The report of the Bureau of Statistics on our foreign commerce shows that of $32,275,935 worth of cotton goods imported in 1887 a relatively small part consisted of goods entering into the clothing of the laborer's or farmer's family, allowing, of course, that common grades entered largely into the consumption of all classes. The statement is as follows:

Articles.	Quantities.	Values.
Cotton, manufactures of:
Cloths—
Not bleached, dyed, colored, stained, painted, or printed.....square yards...	3,021,696	$301,636
Bleached, dyed, colored, stained, painted, or printed .....square yards...	24,928,404	*3,033,946
Total.....square yards...	27,950,100	3,335,582
Clothing, ready-made, and other wearing-apparel, not including knit goods.....	.....	436,356
Embroideries lacings, insertings, trimmings, and lace window-curtains.....	.....	10,467,073
Knit goods:
Stockings, hose, half-hose, shirts, drawers, and all goods made, fashioned, or shaped on knitting machines, or frames, or knit by hand.....	.....	6,910,104
Thread (not on spools) yarn, wraps, or warp-yarn .....pounds...	1,894,798	919,994
All other.....	.....	6,871,244
Total cotton, manufactures of.....	.....	28,940,353

In this table the largest item, nearly one-third of the whole, consists of luxuries. The next largest would also, in a modest community of laborers or farmers, be considered in that class, for very few of these people wear imported stockings, hose, half-hose, &c., of which this item consists. How few luxuries enter into the item "all other," it is impossible to say. The cotton goods entering mainly into the clothing of the laborer and farmer are contained in the three first items and amount to only the sum of $3,771,938, while 60,000,000 people necessarily use of these common good,—necessaries to every family—hundreds of millions of dollars' worth a year. To the question whence these goods are supplied, the answer is, from our own manufactories. Home competition in the common cotton fabrics has reduced the price until it has successfully closed the door to foreign competition. Supplying all our wants it has lowered prices until these goods are cheaper than at any previous time. Protection has effected its purpose. The modester the attire the less is the tax imposed on the wearer under a protective duty.

This ought to set at rest the oft-repeated charge that the tariff bears most heavily on the clothing of the poor, as far as cotton goods are concerned at least.

SALT.

Salt has been laid down in Milwaukee within the last three years at 53 cents per barrel, wholesale. The empty barrel costs between 20 and 25 cents. Calling it 20 cents, would leave 33 cents per barrel for the salt. The tariff is 12 cents per hundred-weight, or 36 cents per barrel of 300 pounds. According to the Democratic argument advanced here that the wicked Republican tariff increases the price of an article by the amount of the duty thereon, salt ought to be given away in Chicago and Milwaukee, and 3 cents per barrel paid the purchaser for taking it away, or, in other words, the price of a barrel of salt should be that of the cost of the empty barrel, less 3 cents. This refers to Michigan salt. Removed from water transportation, the value of an article as heavy as salt is rapidly increased by railway charges, and the price to the consumer at inland points may be many times its original cost where produced. But at lake ports it costs as much to haul a barrel of salt from the dock to the residence as the price of the salt amounts to.

An examination of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing this debate leads me to the inevitable conclusion that, even in the minds of those gentlemen who have most vehemently urged the passage of this bill and their free-trade views upon the country, there lurks after all a suspicion that dire results may possibly follow should it become a law.

Each one carefully guards the special interest of his district. They impliedly admit the danger of the experiment by their anxiety to try its effect upon Republican communities first. If free trade is such a good thing, why not tear down the walls surrounding the Louisiana sugar-planter and give him the advantage of the world's market? If Louisiana is for protection let her declare it by her vote. If she believes in the theories of President Cleveland give her a practical trial of them. No Republican State is here asking to have the duty on wool removed, and they represent the large majority of wool-growers in the country. They have knocked in vain at the door of the Committee on Ways and Means to be heard in opposition to it.

Under the Mills bill the Democratic sugar, rice, coal, iron, and whisky of the South are left untouched or but slightly interfered with, while the Republican wool, lumber, salt, and farm products of the North are subjected to the experimental dissecting-knife of these Democratic tariff-tinkering quacks.

I refer in this connection to several speeches coming from Democratic supporters of the Mills bill upon this floor. During the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], a Democratic member of the committee reporting this bill, a question was raised by the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] as to whether a certain clause in the bill might not be so construed by anti-protective Treasury officials as to put iron ore and coal upon the free-list. My genial friend from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL], in whose district, by the way, coal mining is quite an important industry, became very much alarmed. "Put coal on the free-list? Never!" says my friend to himself. "I am a free-trader, it is true, but not in Virginia coal. I am a follower of the Presidential policy of putting raw materials on the free-list, but the President meant Republican wool, not Democratic coal." He rose in his seat and interrupted the gentleman from Tennessee, but being informed that no such intent had ever possessed the Democratic end of the committee, and that if it should appear that any such danger lurked in its terms the bill should be so amended as to remove all question, the gentleman from Virginia found peace for his troubled soul and quietly and serenely let the discussion go on. (Page 3599, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

A few days later my much-esteemed friend from Virginia with eloquence earnest and fervid, denounced the Republican robber tariff and declared himself unqualifiedly for the Mills bill. Coal troubled him no longer.

Even the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], whose kind heart would shut out no labor and no product of labor—even the much-abused and long-suffering Chinaman finds a warm nook in his affections—has a tender regard for rice. But rice is a product of South Carolina. I do not desire to misquote the gentleman, and will therefore use his very words:

Mr. DAVIS. Do you approve of those features of this bill which put wool on the free-list and yet protect rice?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I approve of this bill from beginning to end.

A few minutes latter he announced the oft-repeated Democratic doctrine that he believed in buying where we can buy the cheapest, undoubtedly with a mental reservation as to rice, and was again interrupted as follows:

Mr. PERKINS. If we should be permitted to buy where we can buy the cheapest, why should we not be permitted to hire where we can hire the cheapest?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Exactly. I think that is right.

California Chinamen will please take notice that South Carolina is extending to them a hearty welcome. [Applause and laughter]

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] will support the Mills bill, but thinks the glass-blowers of his district deserve more consideration than it gives them, and may be expected to ask to amend in that particular. It has a bitter taste to him on that account, but should he fail he will try to swallow the pill and smile. (RECORD, April 30).

My friend from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY] favors the bill, of course, as a Democrat in good standing should; but we may look for an earnest effort from the gentleman to restore salt to the dutiable list. On the whole that gentleman prefers "a sliding scale," and, inferentially at least, must be opposed to this sudden and abrupt placing of wool, lumber, salt, etc., on the free-list. He is more of a believer in the late Hon. William R. Morrison, of "horizontal" memory, than a disciple of Mills. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 3643).

And last, but not least, the wool interest finds a defender in the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], who dissents, it would seem, from his colleague, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and thinks that even on the boundless prairies of the Lone Star State free wool is not just the thing. He is contented, however, with an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent.; thinks that amount about right for a Texas sheep. (Page 3914, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD).

It is safe to say, however, that these gentlemen will all eventually vote for the Mills bill. Not that they believe in it, but it follows closely in the line of the President's ukase, and party discipline demands their support. Their Moses has spoken and they are preparing to follow his lead into the wilderness for another weary tramp of twenty-four years.

Of our Northern Democrats it is unnecessary to speak. They are humble followers, not leaders, in the Democratic procession. They received such a castigation only a short month ago at the hands of their valorous Southern leaders for following out the wishes of their constituents in supporting the bill to refund to the States the direct war tax, amounting to some $17,000,000, that it is with fear and trembling they now approach the Democratic altar to solemnly declare with their hearts in their throats that they are for the Mills bill just as it is, and they are, oh, so sorry that they acted as they did in laying their unsanctified hands upon the sacred surplus. [Laughter.] Why, the indignation of my distinguished friend and neighbor from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD] rose to such a pitch at the outrage of having some sixty men of this House filibuster to prevent that just measure to restore to the people of this country $17,000,000 of war tax from passing that he rushed into print and in one of the daily papers of this city denounced such infamous proceedings whereby the will of the majority was thwarted, not even hesitating to thereby censure (by necessary implication) his learned colleague [Mr. WILSON], whose more perfect party training had taught him that Democracy means Southern supremacy, and who had early got himself into line on that basis. [Applause]

Not three days had passed after this public explosion on the part of my friend before he, too, became convinced that it was dangerous to reduce the surplus by $17,000,000 just before election, even to pay just debts, when the money would largely go to the loyal States of the North. I did not expect him to consider the $446,000 which Wisconsin would have received, but did think he would stand by his colors for Minnesota. But he and his fellows have learned, what Mr. Cleveland discovered in the early summer days of 1885, that the majority and controlling element of their party being at the solid South, the wishes of that section must be respected. Had the outcome of the war resulted in defeat to the North, no one can say what the feeling of that section would have been. But if the Southern sympathizers with our unsuccessful cause had, after the restoration of peace, bowed in that servile submission to our dictation, which is now evinced by the Northern Democrats to their Southern masters, they could only have provoked the contempt the brave soldier entertains for the cowardly deserter.

THE FARMER AND THE TARIFF.

Much has been said about the farmer and whether he is benefited by protection. The farmer in my part of the country is decidedly a laborer. He is almost universally a small land-owner, small as compared with the farmer of the prairie States west of the Mississippi. The number of farms in Wisconsin in 1885, was 136,108, or about one farm to each 11½ inhabitants, the population being 1,563,413. The aggregate value of farms was $568,187,288, averaging $4,174 each. The value of farms is governed largely by their distance from cities and manufacturing towns, showing that their productive value increases accordingly as the market is accessible.

While lumbering still holds the first rank, considerable progress towards other manufacturing in various branches has of late been made, and quite a number of woolen mills have been built, nearly all, however, thus far in the southern part of the State.

The State has been largely settled by men whose only capital was industry, intelligence, economy, and perseverance. It has been an almost unbroken rule that in new settlements the farmers have spent their winters in the logging-camps, which have offered steady employment at fair wages. As the pine receded to the north before the woodman's ax new settlements followed, and the same thing was repeated. This continues until a time when the development of the farm and increase of his stock demands the whole time and attention of the owner. But the advantage of the proximity of the lumber camp and mill does not cease with his ceasing to be a wage-worker. The market they afford has always taken a goodly share of his surplus produce. The advantage of his location has insured the husbandman good prices, besides the ready sale of produce which would not bear transportation to distant city markets. Since the extension of railways into our pine belt, carload after carload is, during the logging season, shipped from Southern and Western Wisconsin, from Minnesota, Iowa, and Illinois, and even from more distant Dakota, to supply the loggers with hay, oats, corn, butter, lard, cheese, beef, pork, beans, peas, and milling stuffs.

The lately developed Gogebic iron range, with its 15,000 people settled in there within the last three years, also makes a constant and reliable market. Goods shipped to the camps and mines are, as a rule, purchased directly from the country dealer along our railway lines.

How well the advantages of an easily accessible market is understood and appreciated by our farming communities was made very apparent in the western counties of Wisconsin three years ago. A proposition was submitted by a railroad company having in contemplation the construction of a railroad from Chicago to St. Paul to build upon a designated line provided the towns through which it would pass would raise a specified amount of money to assist in the construction. This proposition received universal approval by the farmers along the line whose farms lay so close to it that they had reason to expect to receive any benefit from the new conveniences to reach the market.

The recognition of the advantage of a home market is universal. Many farm products do not bear long transportation, and they are frequently those most profitable with a near market and make up the important difference between profit and loss.

DIVISION OF LABOR AND TRANSPORTATION.

The home market saves transportation, charges of middlemen, and consumes articles which would otherwise swell the volume to be exported, and which would, if exported, help to reduce prices by flooding the foreign market. Besides all that, the home market is somewhat within the control of the seller. If he does not receive fair treatment and fair prices the causes are within reach of his own investigation. Every farming community gives welcome greeting to any kind of manufacturing whose establishment it can secure, from a saw-mill down to a cheese factory, and willingly taxes itself to get it, wisely considering such contribution money well invested.

With the new division of labor which yearly takes from the country population to add to that of the town, it is made more essential than ever before that the distance between the producer and consumer should be reduced. Protection has effected this largely for New England, and I confidently believe will do the same for the West and South if we are permitted to continue the good work commenced. The farmer is more dependent on the mechanic and manufacturer than at any previous period in the world's history, for he receives nearly all his goods ready-made.

The fact that he is relieved from many cares in this manner enables him to more closely devote his intelligent energy to his special calling. The tiller of the soil of half a century ago had to be somewhat of a carpenter, not a little of a cobbler, and frequently something of a blacksmith. But these avocations have disappeared from the farm. The hum of the spinning-wheel and stroke of the loom are legends to the young American housewife of to-day. Even the farmer's clothing is no longer made at his home. It is cheaper bought ready-made, just as good in quality, and does not distinguish him from his brother laborer in the city. He has more interest in the city and town than formerly, for work not connected strictly with agriculture is done in the centers of population, and his sons and daughters hie thither for employment when not needed on the farm.

This is the natural outgrowth of the use of machinery. It belongs to the evolution of our age. In the industrial race individual labor can not compete with the mill where one engine or water-wheel moves thousands of spindles and scores of looms, and where the workman by constant attention to one duty acquires the quick precision of the machine he attends, by his very efficiency cheapening the product. More produce has to be sold off the farm than formerly when much of the work now substituted by articles ready made was done on the farm. Even in Wisconsin I think it true that the population on farms constitutes but little if any more than half of the total population, and that of the products which leave the farm two-thirds never cross the State line.

Eliminating from the computation the counties within easy reach of Chicago, and a much larger proportion is consumed in the State. But as to those counties, Chicago is a home market and a most valuable one. I hope to see the day when Southern cotton will pass directly North from the cotton-fields to reach the markets of the Upper Mississippi Valley, and relieve us from the extra cost of roundabout transportation of 1,000 miles to Eastern cotton mills. And if you can not send it to us manufactured, let us have it raw, and we will manufacture it ourselves, provided you do not by continual threats of disturbing the whole industrial system of the country keep timid capital from making the necessary investment.

TRANSPORTATION WASTE OF FORCE.

All unnecessary transportation is a waste of energy, and our development ought to tend in the direction of reducing it to the minimum. Of all things I am impressed with the importance of supplying our own necessaries of life. With our vast area, offering every variety of soil and climate, every dollar expended in the development of our latent possibilities raises the wall of defense against possible foreign foes, and largely serves the purpose of naval and military expenditures.

Transportation only consumes; it does not create. It is a tax on every article carried, and should be avoided as far as possible, and the forces now going into its wasteful service released for more profitable and productive labor, or at least not increased unnecessarily. This can only be done by encouraging the building up of home markets. As we are legislating for this country and not for any other, the first step is to relieve our people from dependence upon the foreign market. Every bushel of wheat consumed here is a bushel less added to the foreign surplus, and every acre of land taken from wheat-growing and applied to other purposes means so much less wheat for an already overloaded foreign market. We largely control the grain prices in Liverpool by the quantities we send there.

Wheat bears transportation better than any other cereal, having the greatest value proportioned to its weight; and still, at present prices, wheat raised 300 miles or more west or northwest of Chicago pays one bushel out of every three to transportation companies between the place of its production and Liverpool. Every third bushel is given away for the transportation of the other two. A considerable part of the price received for the other two bushels is paid for carrying back such articles as the farmer needs.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the industrial and commercial system Democrats promulgate when they want "to tear down the walls in order that our farmers may have the open markets of the world." The Republicans, on the contrary, teach the doctrine that articles at present imported shall be manufactured in this country as far as nature has provided us the means and facilities for manufacturing them. The farmer may well pray Heaven that he may be released from the foreign market by an enlarged home market that will still further supply its place.

THE THEORY OF BARTER.

We are told that unless we buy from England, England will not buy from us, etc. But according to the Democrats themselves, England, being a free-trade country, does what they say we should do—she "buys where she can buy the cheapest and sells where she can sell the dearest," without consulting what will most please us.

I venture to say that the English consumer never asks where the flour he uses comes from, or whether the wheat he buys grew in India, Russia, Asia Minor, or the United States. The free-trader pictures to himself an American farmer with a sack of wheat on his shoulder entering an English clothing store, offering it for sale. The English merchant tells him that he can not buy American wheat unless the farmer will buy his woolen goods; he is willing to barter, but pay out his English shillings for No. 1 hard Dakota wheat, never. Now this ridiculous and much-repeated "you-buy-of-me-and-I-will-buy-of-you" argument is the merest theoretical vapor. Modern business is not conducted in that way.

The grain merchant of England is much like his American brother. He, too, has been thrown into one specific line of business. He deals in grain and nothing else. By the time the grain product reaches the English consumer he does not know whether to credit it to India, Russia, or the United States, and it is very likely that he does not care so that he gets it at a reasonable figure.

We buy very freely of Brazil, our imports from that country during 1887 amounting to $52,953,176, nearly three-fourths thereof being coffee, while our exports to Brazil amounted to only $8,071,653. But not even a free-trade Congressman would refuse his morning decoction of coffee because the balance of trade was in Brazil's favor. Such a question as that never occurs to the American coffee merchant, and it is fair to presume that his English cousin still bears some slight resemblance to him. Neither one permits Democratic free-trade theories to obscure his business vision.

THE HOME MARKET THE BEST.

The home market now is the farmer's best market. It consumes nine-tenths of his yearly product, leaving for export only one-tenth. If the exports could be reduced to half of their present volume the result would no doubt be enhanced prices.

Each country brings from other lands only what is necessary to supply deficiencies in its own productions. If the crops are good in western Europe, the wheat bins of India, Russia, and America are drawn on very lightly, and the American wheat-grower suffers a decline of prices. When the European crops are poor the demand for our wheat and that of our competitors increases. But at best the foreign market is the most unsatisfactory and uncertain to the farmer, and is that market from which he mostly needs to be emancipated. England pursued a strongly protective policy, not for twenty-five years, merely, which Democracy thinks ought to have set our industries upon a sure footing, but for centuries, and thereby built up and diversified her industries until she proudly claimed to be the workshop of Europe. She is now endeavoring through the free-trade party in this Congress to regain in the United States that supremacy which she lost a century ago.

HOME TRADE.

The fact that commerce is guarantied by the Constitution to always remain free between the States gives the American producer a constant accessible market to meet the wants of sixty million customers. This is a world in itself, and worth more to all classes of producers than all other countries combined many times over.

Our soil and climate are as divers as those of all Europe. We may not be able to supply the products of the tropics, but there is no reason why we should lean on Europe for any of our necessaries. He would be a mean man indeed who would not lift a finger or pay a cent to aid in securing for his own town, city, or village a mill, a factory, or a furnace which would increase the number of consumers of some articles and the producers of others. And he who would pass by his home merchant for a more distant market would be no better. As a rule it pays well to trade with the home merchant, even if his prices are a little higher than those of a more distant market.

LABOR PRINCIPAL PART OF ALL PRODUCTS.

Wages are lower in England than in the United States, and capital commands a lower rate of interest. When we consider that the value of any manufactured article consists almost wholly of labor, our present wages certainly could not be maintained were we put in open competition with England.

In computing the amount of labor in a given article I dissent most emphatically from the method adopted by the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, who proceeds upon the theory that the labor entering into a coat is only that bestowed upon it by the tailor. I should commence with the care, attention, and labor which the farmer bestows upon his flock, and follow the sheep until the shearing. I would follow the wool through its various manipulations until the coat was handed over the counter by the salesman, and add to the whole a small sum for the use of the farm for grazing purposes, upon the theory that the farm represents the owner's accumulated labor, upon which he is entitled to a fair return. The labor of developing it and putting it in condition for grazing purposes and raising the necessary fodder, besides furnishing shelter for his flocks, should most certainly be included, and all this labor receives its share of protection, under properly adjusted duties. Wool may be the manufacturer's "raw material," but it is the farmer's finished product. It is the result of his patient toil and care. Lumber is the "raw material" of the cabinet-maker, but it is the finished product of the saw-mill, logs being the finished product of the woodsman. From the time the first blow is struck to build the camp until the last stroke of the painter's brush the value of lumber is constantly enhanced by the labor expended upon it. As there is no duty upon logs, shingle-bolts, and stave-bolts, the protection upon lumber applies to it only in those stages where labor forms its principal value.

RESOURCES OF WISCONSIN.

When I stop to consider the vast natural resources of the State that honors me, her rapidly-growing manufacturing industries, her mines, which are just being developed, and her advantageous natural location, with the two most extensive water-way systems known to internal commerce touching her eastern, northern, and western borders, I feel it my duty to protest upon this floor against that spirit of vandalism which would not only retard her triumphal march toward more diversified industries, which she is rapidly attaining, but which would make her further progress impossible.

If it were not for the constant threats of the enemies of protection to overturn that system to which we largely owe our economic success, investments in manufacturing enterprises would long ere this have reached a degree which would have nearly if not quite supplied this people with the ordinary necessaries of life now imported.

CRITICISMS.

I can not permit this opportunity to pass without making some comment on the peculiar position of my distinguished friend from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], whose anxiety to explain his position on this question led him to argue the case before it was in court, and to discuss the tariff while addressing the House on the Indian appropriation bill. I will not dwell on his new terminology of "high tariff, low tariff, and revenue tariff," for which he is kind enough to promptly furnish a glossary, evidently recognizing the necessity of one.

My friend commences and closes his argument with protestations that he is in favor of protection, but spends an hour in denouncing its policy. He gives it credit for nothing, but lays many sins at its door. Our Democratic friends crowded about him in great glee, chuckling over the supposed new convert. There was more rejoicing over this one sinner than over the one hundred and fifty-odd Democratic worshipers of the English idol. [Laughter.] Moved by the esprit de corps of his Democratic surroundings, the spirit of free-tradeism visibly affected the manner of his delivery, and when in closing his discourse by introducing some personal correspondence breathing a spirit harmonious with his own, he laid particular stress on the phrase, "Let the bill pass, and it is the Waterloo of protection"—the writer referring to a bill introduced by the gentleman himself, not to the Mills bill—I say when he read that phrase no man watching the joyful countenances of his Democratic admirers and their hearty applause of this sentiment could have any doubt that their purpose is to destroy the protective policy of the country entirely. "Waterloo to protection" is their aim; and, like Samson of old, they have laid their hands upon the very pillars upon which the temple rests.

Why my friend should introduce this letter with such apparent approval of its sentiments I do not comprehend if he is in favor of protection. Neither do I see the application of the "Waterloo to protection" which it applies to the bill referred to, which had been introduced by the gentleman himself early in this session. There is no consistency between the gentleman's bill and his speech. The letter referred to must have encouraged my friend to make the speech, for the general reduction which he advocates in his address in order to reach what he calls "a low tariff" finds no place in his bill. That proceeds upon the Republican theory of placing a few articles on the free-list, leaving the rest untouched. But it may be that he found it more difficult to give his "low-tariff" views practical shape in a bill than a theoretical airing in a speech. [Laughter.] In his bill he proposes to place upon the free-list sugar, rice, salt, coal, lumber, manilla, jute, and sisal grass; perhaps, also, some minor and less important articles. He advocates in his address both the propositions embraced in his own bill and his general reduction theories, and suggests that he will, as a compromise, take the internal revenue off tobacco. I take no issue with the gentleman's bill.

As to the more important additions it proposes to the free-list I agree with it, but those who have so indiscriminately praised the gentleman's speech and his bill can not have read both, for no man would by comparing them suspect them of the same authorship. His bill is the very opposite of the Mills bill; and although so warmly greeted by enthusiastic Democrats as the lost lamb they had just discovered, I will not do the gentleman the injustice of even suspecting him of favoring a bill so injurious to his section of the country and mine as the bill under discussion. It is safe to say no believer in the Mills bill would vote for my friend's bill. If the gentleman's views are presented in his bill he is not in favor of a "Waterloo to protection," and I prefer to judge him by it rather than by his enthusiastic speech.

There is a characteristic streak of Minneapolis enterprise and having an eye to the main chance about the letter he reads from Mr. Pillsbury. Mr. Pillsbury first proceeds to renominate my friend to his present position (in which he so well guards the interests of his district, as he sees them), but comes very soon to what to a Minneapolis miller is the milk in the cocoanut, in this manner:

I hope, whatever is done, that the duty on jute cloth will be removed. There is only one manufactory in the country that I know of that manufactures the jute cloth, and they make it direct into the seamless bags.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And he is incorrect about the number of mills, too.

Mr. GUENTHER. Democrats are generally incorrect.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes, but that is only the usual free-trade inaccuracy. Mr. Pillsbury is one of the largest mill-owners in Minneapolis, and "seamless bags" appear to him more important than any other article on the protected list. He takes a kindly interest in my friend's district, getting a large supply of his wheat from that section, and, while an honorable gentleman, has never been suspected of figuring the price paid for his wheat down to the nicety of the duty on the "seamless bags" in which he ships his flour.

Jubilant Democracy, intent upon fostering my friend's infant industry of free-trade speech-making, has ordered 200,000 copies of his speech for circulation among the farmers of the Northwest, as I learn from a free-trade Scandinavian paper published in Chicago.

As false reports have been industriously circulated as to the sentiment of the people of the Northwest on this great question, I too (although my time is very limited) will pause long enough to read a single letter, not from a millionaire mill-owner, for I count, unfortunately, no millionaires among my correspondents, but I shall take a man from the great body of my constituents, a laborer. My correspondent belongs to that sturdy race which, after creating a Wilhelm and a Bismarck, has under their leadership built up the strongest, most independent, and most patriotic nation of modern Europe, and at whose martial tread all Europe trembles. [Applause.] Not only is he a representative German, but a patriotic American, having risked his life in our late war to preserve an unbroken Union.

Here is his letter:

BUFFALO CITY, March 23, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I received several CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS, together with some seeds from United States Department of Agriculture, for which please accept my heartfelt thanks.

The speech of Hon. O. H. PLATT, "Is the President a Free-trader?" is a good one, and the Republicans in this vicinity endorse every word the Senator says in regard to it. The speech of Hon. CHARLES F. MANDERSON is a masterpiece, and also meets the approbation of the Republicans up here, and all the old soldiers of all parties. We want no fooling with the tariff; we want American industry and labor protected, especially all that can be produced in this country, and if we are getting too much money on hand, why, good Lord! I think we have use for it if we look at our coast defenses and our ships of war. I think we could spend more money for a good purpose than we have to spare at present. Then there are the old soldiers of the late war that the Government did not do justice to. Give them more liberal pensions, equalize the bounties, etc. The Government did well by the bondholders; why can it not do equally well by the men that made it possible that there is so much money on hand now? But let the Government do with the surplus money whatever it is a mind to, but for Heaven's sake do not tinker with the tariff. Protect the American workman from the pauper labor of the old country.

With my kindest regards and best wishes for your welfare, I remain sincerely yours,

JOS. N. SCHNEIDER,
Buffalo City, Buffalo County, Wis.

Hon. N. P. HAUGEN, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

[Applause.]

There is no "seamless bag" over the head of Mr. Schneider; no Minneapolis flour in his eyes. [Laughter and applause.]

In order to "protect," the wall must be high enough to retard the enemy's progress and defeat his attack, and I believe in raising it to that height wherever necessary to protect American labor in the mine, in the factory, or in the field. That is the very purpose of protection, and agreeing to that, as Republicans do agree, there is no opportunity to bandy words as to whether its baptismal name shall be "low tariff" or "high tariff," and I leave it to my friend to use any term his æsthetic taste may suggest. [Laughter.]

The term "free trade with incidental protection," is to me paradoxical. To the extent that a duty is protective it fails to furnish revenue, and to the extent that it furnishes revenue it fails to protect.

Every ton of steel rails produced in the United States takes the place of a ton which but for its production here would be imported. If our planters would supply our needs in the sugar line; our wool growers, woolen and cotton mills in the clothing line, and if our mines and furnaces would supply the necessary steel and iron, there would be a deficiency under the present rate of duties instead of a surplus. I know it is impossible to attain that goal at once, but with proper encouragement the tendency would be in that direction, and our income, except from articles like sugar, which has so far proved that the magic wand of protection can not infuse it with sufficient life-force, would decrease in proportion to the increased home production.

ARE OUR MANUFACTURERS OVERPROTECTED?

The fact that duty upon many imports of manufactures brings in a large income is an evidence either that they have not yet reached that stage of development when the duty ought, in justice to our home interests, to be lowered, or that the American manufacturer of those articles is not overprotected. I fail to see where his profits come in when the Englishman furnishes the goods, for there can be no profits without sales. The tenacity with which American salesmen hang to a customer or a market once secured does not suggest the abandonment of either to foreign competitors until the smallest margin of profit is eliminated. A market once lost is too difficult to recover. Our manufacturers are not guilty of the folly of keeping prices at such a figure as to drive their customers into the English market. Admitting their cupidity, they have never been thought guilty of such stupidity as that. There is plenty of capital seeking investment in this country, even at a low rate of interest, if assured against loss. If manufacturing is as profitable as Democrats say it is, why does not capital seek investment there?

Had I the wealth of some of my Democratic friends and believed as they talk on this subject of profits to the manufacturer, and was as anxious to turn an honest penny as I know them to be, I do not think I should allow such splendid opportunities to double my money pass. The fact undoubtedly is, that there is no such profit in manufacturing as represented. Figures are manipulated here to prove assertions which when examined have the lie stamped upon their very face.

LUMBER, VALUE, WAGES, ETC.

The following article throws light on the relative value of lumber in the Northwestern States, and as to whether the laborer profits by advanced prices, as is so frequently denied here. It is from the Northwestern Lumberman of March 24, 1888:

A majority of the arguments in favor of free trade or against it are neither solid nor convincing.

Something approaching sound sense on the tariff question might be looked for in the columns of a paper of the standing of the New York Evening Post. Such a paper should let alone the tricks of the pot-house politicians and confine itself to facts, or, if facts can not be obtained, then certainly to good logical arguments; but that paper, in an endeavor to make a point, discards both facts and logic. It recently said:

"The price of lumber has been rising in the United States as the forests have fallen beneath the woodman's ax. Have the wages of loggers and raftsmen risen in proportion? Of course not. Lumbermen's wages have been governed by the supply and demand of labor. The supply is as large as the working population of the country plus the immigration from Europe. The supply of white-pine lumber is restricted to a narrow belt fringing the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes, and the profits of the owners are secured to them by a tariff of $2 per thousand, which we must not disturb, forsooth, because Canadians are not taxed."

As bearing on what the New York paper calls the advance in the price of lumber, we have gathered the cargo prices of No. 2 common boards and strips, and joists and scantlings in the Chicago market for a term of sixteen years. The price of each for every year was obtained for May, soon after the opening of navigation; for August, when the season was about half over; and for December, immediately preceding the close of navigation. In the table following the range of prices is given. The New York "free-lumber" editorial writer is at liberty to understand that Chicago is the leading white-pine market of the Northwest; that it receives about a quarter of the output of the mills of the three white-pine producing States, and that therefore a similar range of prices would apply to other markets in this section.

Years.	No. 2 common boards and strips.	Joist and scantling.
1872	$16.00 to $17.00	$11.75 to $13.00
1873	13.00	9.50 to 10.00
1874	10.00 to 10.50	8.25 to 9.25
1875	9.50 to 11.00	8.25 to 8.50
1876	9.00 to 11.00	7.25 to 8.00
1877	9.00 to 9.50	7.00 to 7.37½
1878	9.00 to 10.12½	7.00 to 8.37½
1879	8.00 to 11.00	6.37½ to 9.00
1880	11.00 to 12.00	8.50 to 9.00
1881	11.00 to 14.00	10.25 to 12.00
1882	13.00 to 15.00	10.75 to 13.50
1883	11.50 to 12.75	9.50 to 9.75
1884	10.25 to 12.00	8.62½ to 9.25
1885	10.00 to 11.25	8.50 to 9.50
1886	11.00 to 11.50	9.25 to 10.00
1887	12.50 to 13.00	10.00 to 10.12½

If the editor who writes such absurd stuff as is quoted from the Evening Post can gain any consolation from the figures herewith printed, nobody will begrudge it. If he had been to the pains to have talked five minutes with any New York lumberman of experience he would have learned that lumber has not been "rising." That, however, we fear, would not have answered the purpose. It is reasonable to suppose that but comparatively few of the readers of the Evening Post are lumbermen or acquainted with the history of the lumber market. The great majority of its readers are ignorant on the subject; therefore the false statement is given to them with the expectation that it will be swallowed whole.

"Have the wages of loggers and raftsmen risen in proportion? Of course not." Well, of course they have, and in greater proportion. The figures composing the table below are taken from the books of one of the largest manufacturing companies in Michigan—a company that for nearly ten years has cut from 50,-

000,000 to 75,000,000 feet of lumber yearly, and may therefore be considered representative:

Years.	Sawyers and teamsters.	Foremen.
1872	$20.00 to $26.00	$45.00 to $50.00
1873	20.00 to 26.00	45.00 to 50.00
1874	20.00 to 26.00	45.00 to 50.00
1875	20.00 to 26.00	45.00 to 50.00
1876	18.00 to 24.00	45.00
1877	18.00 to 24.00	45.00
1878	14.00 to 20.00	35.00 to 40.00
1879	16.00 to 22.00	40.00
1880	16.00 to 22.00	40.00
1881	16.00 to 22.00	40.00 to 45.00
1882	18.00 to 24.00	40.00 to 45.00
1883	18.00 to 24.00	40.00 to 45.00
1884	18.00 to 24.00	40.00 to 45.00
1885	20.00 to 26.00	45.00 to 50.00
1886	22.00 to 30.00	50.00 to 60.00
1887	20.00 to 32.50	52.00 to 65.00

CANADIAN LAWS AS TO LUMBER.

In order to throw some further light on this question of lumber I desire in this connection to add that the spirit with which any step in the direction of free lumber is met in Canada is sufficient reason why the duty upon lumber should for the present be retained. Canada has a heavier import duty upon lumber than we, her duty being 25 per cent. ad valorem. But in addition to this she has put an export duty upon logs and shingle-bolts, which we admit free. I make the following extract from the Revised Statutes of Canada of 1886, volume 1, page 411:

EXPORT DUTIES.

816. Shingle-bolts, per cord of 128 cubic feet, $1.50.
817. Spruce logs, board measure, $1 per 1,000 feet.
818. Pine logs, board measure, $2 per 1,000 feet.

The governor in council is authorized to increase this export duty on pine logs to $3 per 1,000 feet. This is the kind of Canadian reciprocity we meet with when we put lumber on the free-list. Modern legislation, except that proposed by the Democratic free-trade party, is in the direction of self-reliance and independence of each country of the resources of any other, and Canadians legislate, and very properly, for Canada and not for the United States.

REDUCED INCOME NOT THE RESULT OF REDUCTION OF DUTY.

In 1883 the duty on wool was materially reduced. We had then 50,000,000 sheep. The shock given to wool-growing by the reduction of the duty in 1883 has resulted in reducing the number of sheep, according to the report of the Agricultural Department of January and February, 1888, to 43,544,755.

The importations of wool and woolens have increased more than enough to balance the lower duty, and we are receiving on those articles under the lower present duty more revenue than under the higher duty preceding 1883, showing that lowering the duty does not reduce the surplus, but is very likely to increase it, as it stimulates importation. The Mills bill puts raw wool—the farmers' product—on the free-list, depriving it of all protection. So far we would undoubtedly reduce our surplus income, if that was the only thing to be kept in view. But this bill also reduces, to a greater or less extent, the duty on manufactured woolens, and judging by our experience under the law of 1883, this will in all probability increase instead of diminish the revenue, thus defeating the declared object of the bill.

IMPORTS OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

Of farm products, other than wool, we imported during the year ending June 30, 1887, the following, amounting in all to $22,084,529 in value:

Barley	bushels...	10,355,594	$6,173,208
Corn	do.....	30,536	16,636
Oats	do.....	87,380	29,579
Oatmeal	pounds...	939,502	37,857
Rye	bushels...	18,469	10,720
Wheat	do.....	277,842	218,867
Flour	barrels...	1,013	3,302
All other			150,059
Total			6,640,228
Live animals, free			3,138,201
Live animals, dutiable			4,677,997
Meat products of all kinds			434,853
Butter			38,125
Cheese	pounds...	6,592,192	874,261
Condensed or preserved milk			459,000
Total			1,806,239
Beans and peas	bushels...	648,388	607,853
Potatoes	do.....	1,432,490	543,091
Pickles, etc			387,177
All other vegetables in natural state			516,319
All other vegetables in prepared state			295,911
Total			2,350,351
Tobacco imported			3,471,513

Most of these articles were imported from Canada to compete directly with our farmers in their own market. Without protection or with a lower duty a much larger volume of these products would undoubtedly have crossed our northern borders, and with sufficient protection, a much less. I would so increase the duty on these farm products as to give this market to our own agriculturists rather than to those who do nothing to support our schools, build our highways, sustain our General Government in war and peace, and feel no interest in maintaining and uplifting our standard of citizenship. If those who claim that the farmer receives no benefit from protection, which I do not admit, honestly desire to give it to him, let them, instead of taking away the protection the present law affords, extend it by increasing the duty on the above articles. Twenty-two millions of dollars is no small matter to the farmer within reach of Canadian competition, and the influence of these importations reaches beyond those narrow bounds. You can not improve the market of the New York farmer without sending a healthy thrill throughout the whole agricultural system of the country. Our market ought to belong to our own farmers, and I am in favor of giving it to them.

To show the keen interest the German farmer feels in the preservation of his home market, I read the following extract from a late report by Minister Pendleton. It also shows the keen appreciation the German peasant feels in the independence of the empire and its ability to be self-sustaining, and is interesting for that reason as well. It is from a petition of the "German Peasant Association" directed to Prince Bismarck, and contains 5,414 signatures from 616 localities. After asking for increased protective duties on agricultural products, it proceeds:

We trust that your highness will intervene, not only for our sakes, but for the sake of the empire, for your highness knows better than we that an empire which does not live on the products of its own land is always in a dangerous condition, because it is in an important manner dependent on foreign countries, and in times of war can easily be lost.

We therefore pray that your highness will take measures to shut the door against all foreign grain and meat-stuffs for the present, or to make the importation so difficult by reason of increased taxation that cultivation of grain and the raising of cattle may again be remunerative with us, or that at least we shall be relieved by the amount of taxes from the burden of taxation.

This would be useful not only to us peasants, but also to the inhabitants of the cities, for the wages of the inhabitants of the cities would rise, whilst bread and meat would probably be influenced as little in price as heretofore by the price of grain and provisions.

And this is the tendency in all countries. Market after market is closed against our farmers, and yet they are told that they must rely on the foreign market.

MILLS BILL OPPOSED TO INTEREST OF FARMER.

The Mills bill puts on the free-list beans, peas, vegetables, seeds, meats, game, poultry, flax and linseed-oil, and very probably potatoes, under the phrase "vegetables not specially enumerated." With custom-house officials whose political free-trade bias has led them, in violation of law, to undervalue imported goods in the past, the potato would undoubtedly escape the duty.

Each of these articles, taken separately, may seem unimportant, but agricultural imports form a respectable and quite surprising aggregate even under the present duty, as we have seen.

DIVISION OF BENEFITS UNDER PROTECTION.

Free-traders contend on the one hand that all the profits of manufacturing go to the employer and none to the laborer. In the next breath they propose to give the manufacturer cheaper raw material, so that he may be enabled to pay higher wages. It is strange how free-trade sophistry makes a philanthropist out of the same employer who under protection takes all the profits to himself. I have not reached the point where I can go to either extreme. It is fair, I think, to say that the employer and laborer are both benefited. The American laborer demands better wages, better food, and better shelter than his European rival, and he gets them. The community is benefited by helping those who need it most, and they are always the working classes. We have fewer dependents upon public charity according to our population than has any other civilized country in the world.

IMMIGRATION THE TRUE INDEX TO THE CONDITION OF LABOR.

It is urged with apparent sincerity upon this floor that the American laborer is not benefited by protection, and that his condition here is no better than that of the laborer of Europe. If such is the fact, the movement of population from Europe to this country can not be explained.

During the last eight years 4,377,940 immigrants have arrived in our ports. They have come here because they knew they could better their condition by so doing. The cry of the Democratic party that the protective tariff had ruined our industries and robbed the laborer of his hire they knew before leaving their native homes was false. Nineteen out of every twenty of them, it is safe to say, belong to the laboring class. They are the sober, intelligent, liberty-loving laborers of Europe. They are patient and economical, and take kindly and quickly to our institutions and customs. It is a rare exception that the transplanted laborer or peasant becomes dissatisfied with the change. That is reserved for those who belong to the so-called better classes and who cling to European class distinction. These latter I would advise to remain at home, for they form the grumblers and discontented croakers of our foreign-born population, unable to adapt themselves to our popular institutions and methods.

But let one hundred frugal peasants or laborers start from any portion of western or northern Europe and land them in the United States, and you will find that within three years they will have laid by, if wage-workers, a goodly sum with which to secure independent homes. Missives of love go back to dear ones left behind, telling them of the better outlook for the poor man, the laborer, the farmer, the artisan here than in the fatherland; how much better they are fed, clothed, and housed, and how much better they are treated by their employers—the latter not an unimportant matter. The ocean mails are full of these messages, frequently accompanied with the necessary bills of exchange to carry some friend or relative to the same haven of promise. Nothing to my mind more closely records the temper of our wage-working citizens than does the volume of immigration, and as a large percentage of our wage-workers are of foreign birth it is a fair indication of the state of feeling, satisfactory or unsatisfactory, of the laboring classes. The fact that last year more than half a million people were thus attracted to our shores is conclusive against the argument, so often repeated during this debate, that the laborer of this fair land does not have any share in our industrial prosperity.

These people know better before they leave their beloved though humble homes the true condition of the laborer in America than do the Representatives on this floor, for they get their information directly from the laborer and not from the employer, nor diluted through a labor bureau. They know the troubles and hopes and aspirations and inspirations of their brethren, as they are only known to persons of the same social conditions in life. No immigration bureau—and some States have such—no agent of land or transportation companies could induce these people to leave their homes were not the reports from friends gone before favorable. I call as witnesses on behalf of the Republican party and the protective policy it has so wisely inaugurated and fostered, and the industrial prosperity thereby created, these millions of foreign-born citizens, and with their united voice I impeach the Democratic slanders uttered in this Chamber that Americans are the oppressors of labor, and America the nursery of industrial despotism. [Applause.]

Being an "imported article" myself I claim the right to speak upon this subject. [Applause and laughter.] Having been a wage-worker upon the farm, in the mill, and in the pineries of my State, I am familiar with the habits of thought of these men and the treatment they expect and demand of their employers.

The farm hand of Wisconsin takes his meals at his employer's table, and should an effort be made to turn him off to shift for himself with a peck of meal, 5 pounds of bacon, and a quart of molasses per week, to be cooked by himself, as I understand is the customary way of providing the farm hand in many portions of the South, he would most indignantly protest. And he ought to protest.

Only a few days ago representatives of Southern States held a convention in Hot Springs, Ark., for the purpose of encouraging immigration into the South. Let me say to the people of the South: If you desire immigrants treat your employés like men of equal rights with yourselves, and no conventions will be needed to induce them to come. [Applause.] Honor labor and it will honor you. [Applause.] But until you do, all advertisement of your vast resources and invitations contained in formal resolutions will avail you nothing, for the first comers will be disappointed and immediately report the fact to their friends. In Europe the condition to which a laborer or peasant is born clings to him through life. It is about impossible for him to better his condition by a change, no matter how strenuous efforts he may make. He may have to receive assistance from friends to emigrate; but he comes to us with a fervent desire to better his condition and become the equal of his formor associates, and refuses to be relegated to the position of the slave—a worse condition than that from which he fled.

LABORERS' CONDITION AT THE NORTH.

The laborer in the Northern States at least is treated better than the laborer of Europe, and no Democratic manipulation of figures can disprove it, and statements to the contrary are as ridiculous as they are ignorant. He receives better pay with us than in Europe; his labor furnishes him with more comforts of life, talk as you will about the high prices which protection compels him to pay for his purchases. The little luxuries known to the American farmer and laborer are unknown to the same class in Europe. In Europe he would never dream of a carpet on his floors or pictures on his walls. And such a thing as being the proud possessor of an organ or a piano never enters his thoughts. I am proud of a country in which the laborer and farmer and mechanic can boast of the luxuries, even, that they are enabled to provide for their family, and I am unwilling to abandon a policy which has so far proved so much to their interest.

WHO PAYS THE DUTY?

On the question as to whether the importer or the consumer pays the duty the fact that many articles of the same quality sell at the same price in England and the United States shows that the consumer suffers nothing. But even if the price in some instances is somewhat enhanced the purchasing power of American labor so far exceeds the purchasing power of European labor that the advantage is largely in favor of the former.

Sir Charles Tupper, minister of finance of Canada, in a speech delivered in the Canadian house of commons on the 10th of last month on the fisheries treaty which he had been trying to negotiate with this country, congratulated Canada on the prospects of the passage of the Mills bill, and in referring to it used the following language:

Modified it may be, but I am inclined to think the amendments will be still more in the interest of Canada than as the bill stands to-day. We may congratulate ourselves upon securing the free admission of our lumber, upon which was paid during the last year no less than $1,315,450. On copper ore, made free by the Mills bill, we paid, or there was paid—to make it meet the views of the honorable gentlemen opposite more correctly—$66,945. On salt, $21,592 duty was paid. This is rendered free by the Mills bill. I am sorry to find, as I hoped would be the case from the first copy of the bill that came to me, that potatoes were not included amongst vegetables. I am sorry to find there is a doubt as to whether the term "vegetables not specially enumerated" will not exclude potatoes.

The statement of Sir Charles is that "we"—the Canadian importer—paid the duty, and not the American consumer. His Democratic friends here, from whom he hopes so much—for Canada—maintain just the reverse.

TRUSTS.

In the early part of this session several bills and resolutions were introduced to inquire into the causes and suggest a remedy for the abuses of combined capital monopolizing commerce and forcing upon the consumer unreasonable prices, and to inquire whether our customs duties were in any way responsible for this condition of affairs. If, as is claimed by the other side, the tariff is responsible for the trusts it is fair to presume that those committees, composed in every instance of a majority of Democrats, would have been only too anxious to have reported the fact, so that they might have used it in this debate.

A majority of the members on each of the committees having this subject under consideration belonging to the Democratic anti-protection wing of this House, it is justifiable and right to infer from their silence that they are unable to ascribe the formation of trusts to our protective system. That is repeatedly charged upon this floor, but the committees have not the hardihood to officially so declare. After industrious inquiry and patient investigation they remain silent. They can not fail to recognize the fact that the largest and most formidable trusts are not in protected articles at all, as will witness the Standard Oil Trust, the Anthracite Coal Trust, the Coffee Trust, etc. Here again is apparent the kindly feeling of our Democratic friends for the sugar industry of Louisiana. The Sugar Trust is one of the most abominable of all monopolistic efforts to rob the consumer by an enforced increase of prices. But the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] in his late reference to this subject in the Senate does not include it in his list of trusts; and my friend from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD], as I was naturally led to expect, in his enumeration of diabolical trusts conveniently forgets this Beelzebub of all trusts.

I have examined the records of other Democrats, and, with rare exceptions, I find that they cautiously tip-toe around the sleeping monster with finger to their lips, lest they might awaken him. [Applause.] They are silent on the sugar trust. Let the gentlemen having those matters in charge propose the remedy for this new evil in our industrial system and I promise them my support. But trusts are not unknown in other lands, and it seems to me far preferable to contend with them within the jurisdiction of our own legislation and courts than to be subject to the impositions of foreign trusts beyond our jurisdiction. The common-law maxim, "There is no wrong without a remedy," will not fail to provide the proper restraining force in regard to trusts. It is idle to lay all the ills that flesh is heir to to the tariff, as s so glibly done.

PROTECTION THE OUTGROWTH OF CIVILIZATION.

The drift of intelligent thought in all civilized countries is towards protection. The fact that wages in Germany and France are lower than in England is no argument against protection. Germany has not yet seen the close of her first decade under a protective policy, and France, within the same period, finding her protective duties too low to effect their purpose, increased them. These countries have therefore not yet had time to receive its beneficial results to their full extent. Official reports show that wages are better in Germany now than under free trade, that there are fewer men idle, and that the tax for the support of those dependent upon society—the poor-tax—has materially decreased.

The leading nations of Europe (except England) have all adopted the protective system of duties, and the smaller ones are fast following. Switzerland within the last few months, to the great chagrin of Mr. Boyd Winchester, consul-general, appointed by this administration to preach the gospel of free trade to the liberty-loving mountain dwellers of that country, and whose late report is my authority, has adopted a a highly protective tariff. Germany has lately increased her protective duties; so have Russia and several States of South America. With an extended suffrage, Scandinavia, which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] erroneously puts on the free-list, is fast getting into the protective ranks. Protection was the issue in last year's election in Sweden and carried by a majority so strong that the King felt obliged to reorganize his ministry upon the basis of a protective duty on imports.

And here let me say that at an international exposition held in Vienna about five years ago of school exhibits and methods of teaching and at which this country was represented, this same country of Sweden took the first medal. Intelligence and protection go hand in hand. [Applause.]

Norway has not fully recovered from the shock of her ministerial crisis of a few years ago, which resulted in the impeachment of the then ministry. But Mr. Johan Sverdrup, who led the progressive forces in that fight to a successful issue, and who is the present prime minister of Norway, is a decided protectionist, and it may reasonably be expected that in the near future she will follow the example of the sister kingdom. Of Denmark it is unnecessary to speak, as the present revolutionary ministry, in order to maintain itself against the attacks of the liberal wing of the legislative body, has resorted to repeated prorogations and prevented any financial legislation for years.

The following, from the pen of Emil Schalk, is a pertinent exposé of the relation of protection to our advanced civilization:

THE LOGIC OF PROTECTION—THE DISTINGUISHING FEATURE OF CIVILIZATION.

Protection in every form, in its fullest meaning, applied to every sphere of life, is the distinguishing feature of civilization. Without protection society and civilization can not exist; barbarism, savage life, the life of a brute, alone prevails. Protection is the slow-working agency which gradually lifts man to higher planes of civilization. It reduces the dangers and chances in the struggle for life. Society charges itself with guarding the individual against dangers and difficulties by which he may be beset.

In the natural state each individual has to fight hunger and thirst, the inclemencies of climate and weather, and his mortal enemies besides, who are ever plotting his destruction. It is by means of protection that the life of man differs from that of the animal; for protection is the result of man's highest intellect, of his faculties of reflection and forethought. We build houses to protect ourselves by day and night from the inclemencies of the weather. We make clothes to suit the season, now to shield us from the scorching rays of the sun, and then to protect us against the freezing winds of the north. We cultivate fields and erect storehouses; we raise cattle and collect provisions to ward off starvation; we create insurance companies against accident and fire; we create life insurance to protect the brood should the wage-earner die; we create savings-banks to prevent want in our old age, and thus through every phase of civilized life protection may be traced like the red threads in the ropes of the English navy.

Governments, laws, institutions, are but so many arrangements for the protection of the individual in his life, limbs, possessions, and in his right to enjoy life and happiness. Civil laws define his rights, and courts protect him in them. Criminal laws are enacted to shield society from the efforts of the wicked; police and courts are there to enforce the protection. Armies and navies serve no other purpose than to protect nations against other nations. But the protection which civilization to-day accords the individual goes far beyond that of life and limb and material possessions. Names, honor, thoughts, writings, inventions, business, even the name a man may choose to give his goods or merchandise are protected. And among civilized nations some go still further and accord to individuals protection in their occupations, their means of earning a living against the inroads made by individuals of other nations. These countries take to heart Shylock's words:

"You take my house when you do take the prop
That doth sustain my house; you take my life
When you do take the means whereby I live."

And just as this protection in the means of earning a living is but a natural and logical consequence in the advance of civilization, another link in the chain of protection which makes up civilized life, so is free trade the very reverse of protection and civilization. It is a return to the methods of barbaric life. It is the fight of each against all, of individuals against the species, and of entire organized species against the individual. It means want of forethought and reflection in the individual and in society as a whole.

HOPE FOR THE SOUTH.

With the civilizing influence which a freer discussion of public questions and fairer elections would bring to the South, may we not hope that she too will fall into line with the most enlightened thought of the age? If example is worth anything it points conclusively towards protection.

REPUBLICAN PROPOSITIONS.

It is proposed by the Republicans of this House to repeal the internal-revenue tax on alcohol used for medicinal purposes and in the arts, as well as that upon tobacco, except, I believe, cigars. These are purely "war taxes," and the income from these sources amounts to over $30,000,000 per year. I do not defend the use of tobacco. It may be a "luxury" to some, but it has become a "necessary" to very many. This tax is as heavy on the poor as on the rich.

Whether tobacco be a luxury or not matters little to the family. A man with the habit well fixed upon him would deny himself and family many a comfort and even necessary of life rather than to go without his tobacco. A saving to him in the cost of tobacco means more comforts for the family.

The repeal of these internal-revenue taxes and of the duty on sugar, and increasing the duty on farm products sufficiently to protect them against Canadian competition, would make a certain reduction of our our income of more than $80,000,000 per year. This would be sure and effective and go as far in the direction of reduction as our present income warrants. The excess of our income over our expenditures is variously estimated at from $60,000,000 to $100,000,000 per year. Gentlemen on the other side having this matter in charge are not fully agreed as to that. I am also in favor of placing on the free-list all other articles which there is no reasonable hope that we can suecessfully produce ourselves to the extent of our wants, and of generally readjusting the duty on the basis of the difference between the cost of production here and the cost of the same article of foreign manufacture laid down in our market. I would do this with a view to the protection of our own labor, treating it with that liberality its enlightened citizenship gives it a right to demand. I would treat it liberally, not stingily.

The Mills bill does not give reasonable hope of half of the reduction proposed by the Republicans. It is an insidious attack upon the industrial system of the country, and discriminates against the North; and I hope it will be defeated. I should protest just as earnestly did the East propose legislation which, to my mind, would work as injuriously upon my section of the country as will be the effect should this bill become a law.

We have embarked upon a prosperous voyage, and our strength lies in our union. Our position, covering largely the temperate zone of a vast continent, our boundless area of fertile lands, our inexhaustible mineral wealth, our cosmopolitan population composed of the enterprise and vigor of all the nations of Europe, and blending rapidly into harmonious homogeneity, all tend, with a proper direction of our energies, to make us the most intelligent, the most independent, the wealthiest, the happiest people upon earth. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, the issue presented by this bill has been often misstated in this debate. It is not that of protection or free trade. No one insists upon such a statement of the issue except some desperate Western Republican Representative who is forced by the party lash to betray his constituency in opposing a measure which will bring relief to his own people from the curse of unjust and oppressive taxation. This he does with a hope that he may find an excuse which will shield him from the wrath of those who sent him here. It is well known that there are no advocates of free trade at this time in Congress; even those who in theory believe free trade preferable to protection concede that the amount of the public debt and pensions render free trade at present impracticable. But the false arguments of such unfaithful Representatives will fail to deceive the country or their outraged constituents. A leading Republican newspaper of the Northwest, the Chicago Tribune, tersely states the issue, and gives timely warning to Western Congressmen that by such arguments they deceive none but themselves, as will be seen by the following extract from a leading editorial of that paper:

The real controversy is between those of all parties who want high taxes for the sake of plunder, and those of every party who will resist further plucking, and every Republican Congressman from the West should understand that this presents a local issue which is not to be indefinitely postponed or obscured in a partisan fog, but which must be met now and in accordance with the interests of his constituents.

I especially commend this clear statement of the issue by this great Republican organ to Republican members from the Northwest, and advise them to revise their speeches before distributing them where the Tribune circulates, by striking out the phrases which charge that this bill presents the issue of free trade against protection, and the charge that the President advocates free trade in his message. I give this friendly advice that their constituents may not arraign them for duplicity as well as subserviency to Eastern monopolists. The message of the President expressly refutes such a charge when he used in his message the following language:

Our progress towards a wise conclusion will not be improved by dwelling upon the theories of protection and free trade. This savors too much of bandying epithets. It is a condition which confronts us, not a theory. Relief from this condition may involve a slight reduction of the advantages which we award our home productions, but the entire withdrawal of such advantages should not be contemplated. The question of free trade is absolutely irrelevant; and the persistent claim made in certain quarters that all efforts to relieve the people from unjust and unnecessary taxation are schemes of so-called free-traders, is mischievous and far removed from any consideration for the public good.

Senator SHERMAN in 1867, when discussing the tariff, rebuked this reckless and demagogical use of the term "free trade" when he said:

In considering so complicated a subject as a tariff, nothing can be more deceptive than the application of such general phrases as a "protective tariff," "a revenue tariff," "a free-trade tariff." Every law imposing a duty on imported goods is necessarily a restraint on trade. It imposes a burden upon the purchase and sale of imported goods and tends to prevent every importation. The expression, "a free-trade tariff" involves an absurdity. * * *

The only issue raised by this bill is whether we shall reduce the high taxes created during the war, which are wholly unnecessary now, and which produce distress among the masses of the people, and, if so, upon what subjects of taxation the reduction shall be made? An examination of the bill will show that out of the two hundred and seventeen millions of tariff taxes collected last year it only proposes a reduction of less than fifty-four millions. If it becomes a law it will still leave tariff taxes aggregating one hundred and sixty-three millions. It will only reduce the present rate of tariff taxes from 47 to 36 per cent., being a reduction of only 11 per cent.

Now, sir, Senator SHERMAN, the probable Republican candidate for President this year, said in 1867 it was "simply an absurdity to talk about a free-trade tariff, and to talk about a protective tariff is unnecessary, because the wit of man could not possibly frame a tariff that would produce $140,000,000 in gold without amply protecting our domestic industry." If he is good authority on such a subject, and he is so held by the Republican party, this bill still leaves twenty-three million more on the tariff list, than, as stated by Senator SHERMAN will afford ample protection to our manufacturing interests.

Sir, this bill, in my judgment, does not go far enough; it does not go as far as the President in his message indicated it should go; nor as far as Senator SHERMAN has declared it might safely go; yet it does afford great relief to an overtaxed and distressed people, and therefore it shall have my cordial support. The principle upon which this revision is based is right; it is a conservative and judicious modification of the tariff upon a fair business basis; it does no injustice to any interest, and if adopted will prove to be beneficial to all. The protectionists should be thankful that a more radical measure is not demanded by the majority, and I warn them now that if this fair and reasonable proposition is rejected the people will send those here who will enact a far more radical measure.

In his annual message to Congress the President informed us that the present rate of taxation exacts from the people over one hundred million annually more than is needed to meet the necessary expenses of the Government, and it is ascertained that on the first day of July next we shall have over one hundred and sixty millions surplus in the Treasury. Last year we collected a tax of two hundred and seventeen millions from four hundred and sixty millions on dutiable imported goods from foreign countries, which is an average rate of taxation of 47 per cent. Think of it, sir! Forty-seven dollars of taxes on each $100 worth of the actual value of these imports. State taxes are thought to be high when they are 47 cents on each $100 worth of property at a low valuation, and yet the Government is demanding this enormous rate of taxation and collecting at least one-half more tariff taxes than we have use for.

And in the face of these facts, when the President and the Democratic party propose a moderate reduction of about one-fourth the amount collected from these articles, our effort is opposed—with one exception—by every Republican member of this House. The taxes we propose to reduce are collected from sugar, molasses, woolen and cotton goods, glass and glassware, manufactures of iron and steel, lumber, salt, and many other of the necessaries used by the people in their homes, on their farms, for wearing apparel and for food. The principles and policy advocated by the President, and which are ingrafted in this bill, are not novel; they are such as have received the sanction of every Democratic national convention held in the past; they are the teachings of the Democratic fathers, and are in accordance with the assurances he gave the people when he was elected. In proof of these assertions I will call attention to the expressions of Democratic leaders and Democratic platforms, which were incorporated in a speech that I made in this House in 1884 on the tariff bill then pending, and which I will attach as an appendix at the end of my remarks.

REPUBLICAN AUTHORITY FOR THE PRESIDENT'S RECOMMENDATIONS.

Several of the advocates of the protected monopolists have asserted in this debate that this movement for tariff reduction emanates from the South; that this bill is prepared solely by Southern men in the interest of Southern States; that it is inspired by those who were engaged in the rebellion. The gentleman from Kansas has gone to the ridiculous extreme of reading from the constitution of the defunct Confederate States in support of these intimations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it may be that there are some voters on the Kansas prairies simple minded enough to believe such absurd assertions. I will therefore present the views of some of the most influential and ablest of the Republican leaders, who, as it will be seen, have indorsed every principle and line of policy announced in the President's message and incorporated in this bill. This was done before either of them were written. They have already repeatedly received the most emphatic, unequivocal, and authoritative indorsement by representative bodies and representative officials and members of both the Democratic and Republican parties. The spirit of the document is concentrated in that one of its concluding paragraphs which declares that—

The simple and plain duty which we owe to the people is to reduce taxation to the necessary expenses of an economical operation of the Government and to restore to the business of the country the money which we hold in the Treasury through the perversion of governmental powers. These things can and should be done with safety to all our industries, without danger to the opportunity for remunerative labor which our workmen need, and with benefit to them and all our people, by cheapening their means of subsistence and increasing the measure of their comforts.

This is, as has been suggested, a lucid exposition of existing financial and economic conditions, and is a terse presentation of a practical remedy. It is a wise and just consideration for existing rights and is an earnest deprecation of any legislation inimical to the true interests of either labor or capital. Its temperate suggestions were entitled to receive, and in any era of disinterested patriotism and morality would have received prompt acceptance by both parties, whom it simply challenged to an honest fulfillment of their repeated promises.

The Democratic members respond to that challenge by undertaking with unanimity the accomplishment of tariff reform, to which the party has so often pledged itself in national conventions.

The message is the acid which has demonstrated the baseness of the coin of Republican pledges of tariff reform; and the Republican party responds to its challenge not by denying, but by deliberately repudiating the pledge contained in the platform of its last national convention and the formal messages, reports, and utterances of its own Presidents, Secretaries, and distinguished members. That party whose Presidential aspirants now sneer at the President's allusions to the dangers threatened by a vast and increasing surplus wrung from the people in superfluous taxes, in the platform of 1884 denounced the Democratic party (though for twenty-four years it had been out of power) for having "failed completely to relieve the people of the burden of unnecessary taxation by a wise reduction of the surplus." And then in its own behalf it added this solemn promise:

The Republican party pledges itself to correct the irregularities of the tariff and to reduce the surplus.

From that day to this with characteristic insincerity it has urged no correction of tariff irregularities and no reduction of the surplus, but has devoted all its energies to the defeat of tariff correction and to the squandering of the surplus.

For venturing to courteously invite them to a fulfillment of that pledge the President is hysterically denounced as a free-trader and the enemy of American industries by the absurdly inconsistent party, every one of whose elected Presidents since 1872 who ever sent a message to Congress, has at one time or another made official recommendations identical in spirit and almost identical in phraseology with those which are now denounced by monopoly-ridden zealots as little better than free-trade blasphemy.

In his annual message in 1873 President Grant said:

I would recommend a revision and codification of the tariff laws.

And renewing the discussion more at length in 1874, even when recommending a necessary increase of revenue, he said:

Those articles which enter into our manufactures and are not produced at home, it seems to me should be entered free. Those articles of manufacture which we produce a constituent part of, but do not produce the whole, that part which we do not produce should be entered free also. I will instance fine wool, dyes, etc. * * * There are many articles entering into home manufactures which we do not produce ourselves, the tariff upon which increases the cost of producing the manufactured articles.

President Arthur repeatedly recommended tariff-reform. His message in 1881 declared:

The tariff laws also need revision, but that a due regard may be paid to the conflicting interests of our citizens important changes should be made with caution.

President Arthur also recommended the Tariff Commission, the "abstract and brief chronicle" of which shows that, packed instrument of protected monopolists though it conceded the propriety of a reduction of 20 per cent. in tariff duties, then "paltered with us in a double sense" by submitting a schedule which justified Democratic criticism by producing no reduction, but increased taxation instead. In 1882 he deprecated a total abolition of excise taxes because it—would almost inevitably prove a serious if not an insurmountable obstacle to a thorough revision of the tariff and to any considerable reduction in import duties. * * * I recommend an enlargement of the free-list, * * * a simplification of the complex and inconsistent schedule of duties upon certain manufactures, particularly those of cotton, iron, and steel, and a substantial reduction of the duties upon those articles and upon sugar, molasses, silk, wool, and woolen goods.

In his final message in 1884 he had the temerity to indicate a yearning after the markets of the world in the following paragraph:

The healthful enlargement of our trade with Europe, Asia, and Africa should be sought by reducing tariff burdens on such of their wares as neither we nor the other American states are fitted to produce, and thus enabling ourselves to obtain in return a better market for our supplies of food, of raw materials, and of the manufactures in which we excel.

Even more notable is this identity of sentiment between President Cleveland and those eminent Republican fiscal officers, Lincoln's last Secretary of the Treasury, Hayes's only Secretary of the Treasury, and Arthur's two Secretaries of the Treasury.

In 1868 Secretary McCulloch, holding over from Lincoln's second Cabinet, declared:

The indications are decided that the more enlightened sentiment of the country demands that the tariff shall hereafter be a tariff for revenue and not for protection, and that the revenue to be derived from it shall be no larger than, in connection with those received from other sources, will be required for the economical administration of the Government, the maintenance of the public faith, and the gradual extinguishment of the public debt.

Mr. JOHN SHERMAN, whose versatility of opinion has inspired his friend and biographer, Judge Lawrence, to commend him on sympathetic grounds to the support of every variety of American voters, as being politically a sort of conjurer's inexhaustible bottle, with every variety of sentiment on tap, declared in 1868 that—

Every advance toward a free exchange of commodities is an advance in civilization; every obstacle to a free exchange is born of the same narrow, despotic spirit which planted castles upon the Rhine to plunder peaceful commerce; every obstruction to commerce is a tax upon consumption; every facility to a free exchange cheapens commodities, increases trade and production, and promotes civilization. (Report on International Monetary Standard, June 9, 1868, page 180.)

In 1867, when enormous revenues were required to meet current expenses and interest on the vast public debt, and when no surplus restricted the volume of circulating media, Mr. SHERMAN declared, as I have already stated, that—

The wit of man could not possibly frame a tariff that would produce $140,000,000 in gold without amply protecting our domestic industry.

Yet now legislation which would "frame a tariff that would produce" nearly $170,000,000 is stigmatized by Mr. SHERMAN as being "free trade."

In 1882 Secretary of the Treasury Folger's annual report said:

It is believed that the time has arrived when a reduction of the duties on nearly all the articles in our tariff is demanded and feasible.

In 1884 Mr. McCulloch, the last Republican Secretary of the Treasury, as "relief from the present burden of taxation, urgently and justly demanded," recommended:

First. That the existing duties upon raw materials which are to be used in manufactures should be removed.

Second. That the duties upon the articles used or consumed by those least able to bear the burden of taxation shall be reduced.

As lately as 1870 Senator ALLISON had this to say of the Democratic Walker tariff of 1846:

The tariff of 1846, although confessedly and professedly a tariff for revenue, was, so far as regards all the great interests of the country, as perfect a tariff as any that we have ever had.

He further said:

But I may be asked how this reduction shall be made. I think it should be made upon all leading articles, or nearly all, and for that purpose, when I can get an opportunity in the House, if no gentleman does before me, I shall move that the pending bill be recommitted to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report a reduction upon existing rates of duty equivalent to 20 per cent. upon the existing rates, or one-fifth reduction. Even this will not be a full equivalent for the removal of all the internal taxes upon manufactures.

Now, if Senator ALLISON thought that the tariff on import duties in 1870, when the rate was less than 47 per cent., could be safely and wisely reduced 20 per cent., is it unreasonable or dangerous to the manufacturing interests if the policy of the President should be adopted, as provided in this bill, which reduces the rate from its present amount of 47 per cent. only 11 per cent., which is 9 per cent. less than Senator ALLISON advocated?

When I first saw the assertion in the report of the Committee on Ways and Means that the abolition of the tax on wool and reduction on woolen goods would benefit the woolen manufacturer and not injure the wool-grower, I supposed that idea was original with that committee; but upon examination I find that it is likely they derived the idea from Senator ALLISON, and upon a further examination of the debates in past Congresses I find that Senator ALLISON might have obtained the same idea from Daniel Webster, who was the great advocate of protection in the closing years of his life, although he was originally a revenue reformer. A similar expression will be found in his speech on the tariff in 1824. Senator ALLISON used this language in speaking of the wool schedule in the tariff bill of 1870:

Such a reduction (on wool and woolens) would benefit the consumer and not injure either the wool-grower or wool-manufacturer.

Then he proceeds at length to explain why a reduction of the tax on wool and woolen goods will—as substantially asserted in the report of the Committee on Ways and Means—inure to the advantage of the wool-grower and the manufacturer of woolens. (See volume 81 of Congressional Globe of 1870, Appendix, page 194.)

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] vigorously assailed the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means with the charge that they had placed bituminous coal on the free-list. They both seemed to fear that this bill would destroy the bituminous coal interests of Pennsylvania and Maryland, and close a majority of the coal fields of this country. It is true the word coal can not be found on the free-list of this bill, but they have argued themselves into the belief that by the repeal of some provision of the revenue law the bill does by indirection accomplish that result.

It is strange, Mr. Chairman, that the Democratic members of this House, even if it were true, which it is not, had so placed bituminous coal on the free-list, should be charged with high crimes and misdemeanors by gentlemen on the other side, when the records of Congressional debates will show by such action they have simply stepped in the footprints of prominent Republicans now in the United States Senate.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman permit me a moment, as I happened to enter the door just as I heard my name mentioned?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. I had the honor of having put anthracite coal on the free-list, because it was always harped upon that I was advocating coal in the interest of Pennsylvania. I had it put on the free-list by my own motion and labor.

Now, I say that the bill known as the "Mills bill" does, in a roundabout way, but most effectually, put it there, because it perfectly repeals the duties on coal and iron ore, while it comes with a protestation that it has not repealed either.

Coal and iron ore are crude minerals unwrought, and the bill puts crude minerals unwrought on the free-list. It omits to put into the bill the provisions by which the duties are now imposed on coal and ore; and in its last section it provides that all matters conflicting—I forget the precise language used—with the provisions of the bill are hereby repealed. So that in three separate patches the bill makes effective work of the duties on coal and iron ore.

Now, the argument made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], when I insisted that this was the legitimate and only proper construction of the bill, was that "if it was so," they would put on such amendments as to make the construction unquestionable and in express terms, and I want them to do so and not stand pleading hereafter that the courts or the Departments have given an "unexpected" construction when they give the only one which can be given to the third clause, namely, that coal and iron ore being crude minerals the duty was repealed.

I do not care whether they repeal or retain it; I only wish they would say which they are going to do.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I was not present when the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLAN] discussed that subject, and therefore do not know what he said. I am informed, however, by those around me that he did state that if the construction put upon the bill in reference to bituminous coal by the gentleman from Pennsylvania was a proper one, he would be in favor, and the Committee on Ways and Means would be in favor, of so amending the bill as to leave coal where it is to-day.

Mr. KELLEY. Coal and iron ore?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And iron ore also.

Mr. KELLEY. I am glad I happened to come in as my name was mentioned.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to suggest that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] demonstrated that the bill was not liable to the objection suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. KELLEY. I thought I had demonstrated it was.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Maryland should dismiss the fears they have expressed with regard to the intentions of the Democratic party as to coal. But I want to say this: I do not understand why it is a crime for a Democrat to ask for free coal when the gentlemen who to-day give direction to and are the most potent among the leaders of the Republican party have demanded that all coals should go upon the free-list at a time when the rate of tariff taxation was less than it is to-day.

I have before me minutes which I have made from the record, which show that in 1871 General Garfield, the man for whom the gentleman from Pennsylvania voted for President and whom your party elected President, voted to put coal and salt on the free-list. So did Senator FRYE, of Maine. So did Senator HALE, of Maine. So did Senator DAWES, of Massachusetts, and Senators CULLOM, HAWLEY, ALLISON, and the late General Logan voted to put coal on the free list.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois pardon me a moment?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. And I remember that as a protectionist I stood within a few feet of where I am and denounced the men who wanted protection for everything their States produced and wanted free trade in everything that other States produced. So I do not dispute with you about that. But let me say a word about the dead Garfield.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will remind the gentleman that my time is limited.

Mr. KELLEY. Your time can be extended.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Very well; with that understanding I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KELLEY. I refused to vote for General Garfield as Speaker when he was the nominee of the caucus of my party on account of my lack of faith in his protection doctrines. But after the visiting statesmen, as they were called, of whom I was one and General Garfield was another, made our visit to New Orleans and visited Mr. Lawrence's sugar plantation and sugar factory I never doubted General Garfield's complete and thorough regeneration from all the sins of the Cobden doctrine.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let me ask the gentleman in what year that visit was made?

Mr. KELLEY. In 1876.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. At what time?

Mr. KELLEY. You know when we went down there.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think it was in November. I want the accurate dates.

Mr. KELLEY. It was in November. General Garfield went with the proprietor of the estate and some of the laboring people all over that sugar plantation, and in the afternoon we were dining. There were probably thirty people at the table, and when it came to be General Garfield's time to respond to a sentiment, he said:

I shall probably surprise some of the gentlemen who hear me. I know one who will be greatly surprised at what I am about to say; for I am prepared to avow myself an humble disciple of the leading advocate of the protective system in the American Congress.

And walking from his seat, at one end of the table, to mine, at the other, he grasped my hand and in that presence said, "Henceforth I am your humble disciple on questions of economy connected with the revenues of our Government; my abstract opinions have vanished before the material facts with which I have become acquainted here to-day. I am, with WILLIAM D. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, a protectionist henceforth."

Therefore, as a protectionist, I voted, for President, for the man I had refused to vote for as Speaker, when the caucus of my party had nominated him, because I believed him to be a free-trader. I want to say I do not regard it as a crime to repeal a duty; I only think it a matter of bad judgment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. At what time did General Garfield make that declaration which bound you to him so closely and affectionately?

Mr. KELLEY. In New Orleans.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In November, 1876?

Mr. KELLEY. I believe it was in November, 1876.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It does seem to me the gentleman from Pennsylvania has got his dates greatly mixed. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLEY. It may have been December. The public papers will fix the date. It was during the visit to New Orleans of what were called the visiting statesmen of both parties.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The memory of the gentleman from Pennsylvania must be treacherous.

Mr. KELLEY. No, sir; not on that point.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman states he voted against General Garfield when a candidate for the Speakership because he believed him to be a free-trader, and yet he says General Garfield changed his opinion on that question a year before he was nominated by the Republican caucus as candidate for Speaker, and a complete reconciliation had occurred between them.

The gentleman was at New Orleans, as I well remember, in the fall of 1876. General Garfield was put in nomination by the Republican caucus for Speaker in the fall of 1877, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] voted against him. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KELLEY. He had been a candidate for Speaker before that.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Why did you vote against him in 1877 when he was again nominated by the caucus for that position?

Mr. KELLEY. Because I preferred another for Speaker.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The man who opposed him was Mr. RANDALL. He was the Democratic caucus nominee and Garfield was the nominee of the Republican caucus, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania was a member.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. RANDALL was not a candidate before the caucus of my party.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I remember well that when we were debating the tariff bill of 1882 I arraigned the gentleman here as having abandoned his convictions and yielded obedience to the dictates of a caucus of the Republican party in regard to amendments on the then pending bill, and he admitted that he had yielded his convictions upon those important economic questions in obedience to the mandate of the caucus, and said he felt it to be his duty as a party man to obey the action of the caucus of his party; yet he now confesses that in 1877, a year after he was convinced that Garfield was no longer a free-trader, he refused to obey the action of a Republican caucus which commanded him to vote for Garfield as the caucus nominee of his party.

Mr. KELLEY. That may be as you will; but there are from twenty to thirty witnesses to establish the occurrence of the scene I have recited, among them gentlemen of both parties. Whatever may have been my deviations from party rectitude or party discipline, there still remains the fact, which can be established by many witnesses, that there was an avowal of an absolute conversion by James A. Garfield—an avowal made at a dinner party on the plantation of Mr. Lawrence, which plantation is now owned, I believe, by Governor Warmoth, who was present on the occasion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My friend has not yet made it clear to me what were his reasons for disregarding the action of the Republican caucus a year after that, when the same Garfield had been nominated by the caucus in which he participated.

Mr. KELLEY. What right have you to interrogate me as to my personal relations and personal reasons? [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side.] There are other questions than tariff in the world. There are sometimes personal questions. On all political questions I will answer you as fully and frankly as I can, but when you attempt to probe my personal convictions and feelings I tell you they are sacred.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have no desire to pursue this controversy with the gentleman further, Mr. Chairman, but——

Mr. KELLEY. I helped to elect Garfield in 1880, and, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] says, in common with my party I was satisfied with his letter of acceptance and with his inaugural address and message.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I of course accept the explanation made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania without impugning his sincerity at all; but if he did not vote against Garfield in 1877 because of a mistrust of his loyalty to the cause of protection, it does seem strange to me that he and his colleague, Mr. BAYNE, and several others of his Republican colleagues from Pennsylvania, refused to vote for Garfield at that time, and it is also very singular that the question was raised in Pennsylvania, and the loyalty of the gentleman and his colleagues to their party was impugned because they failed to vote for Garfield in 1877, and so strongly was the accusation made against their party fealty that one of them, Mr. Killinger, was compelled to publish a circular in his defense, in which he assigned as a reason for his action that the gentleman and Mr. BAYNE and himself and other Republicans of Pennsylvania had no faith in the sincerity of Garfield's loyalty to the doctrine of protection.

Mr. KELLEY. In 1877 the protest against making Garfield Speaker was——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But Garfield had made his confession and received his absolution from you a year before that. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KELLEY. The protest was because persons who assumed to control the Republican party announced that it had been determined that Garfield should be the candidate for Speaker before gentlemen had an opportunity to be heard in the caucus. There was the real question.

Now, sir, I am not speaking for myself; I am speaking for other people.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to consume my time in pursuing this controversy any further with the gentleman. I desire to say now that I understood from the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. WOODBURN] when he was on the floor the other day that it was denied that General Garfield ever was a member of the Cobden Club, and afterwards, when my colleague from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] was on the floor arraigning the Speaker of this House for being a member of the Cobden Club, I asked him the modest question whether the Speaker had joined the club before Garfield had joined it, and he answered me, or I understood him so to answer, that Garfield had never sought election to that club, had never accepted its election to membership, and had repudiated it. And yet, Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand a circular with which I know the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] must be familiar, because it was circulated through the State of Pennsylvania in 1877, in which General Garfield was charged with being a member of the free-trade Cobden Club, and which denied that he had ever repudiated his connection with it.

These declarations excited my curiosity. I was puzzled by the contrariety of opinion on that side of the House, and in order to satisfy my mind I wrote to Mr. David A. Wells, who was a personal and intimate friend of General Garfield, for a statement of the facts. I have received an answer from him which I hold in my hand. In this letter he explains fully General Garfield's connection with the Cobden Club, and I wish to show by it that the gentlemen who have been reflecting on Mr. CARLISLE and Mr. COX not only supported a Cobden Club member for Speaker of the House, but afterwards zealously supported his election to the Presidency of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KELLEY. I have never denied that Garfield was a member of the Cobden Club, nor that until 1876 his tendencies were all toward free trade.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Up to 1876?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes; and therein you have the cause of several of the coolnesses that occurred with some publicity between Mr. Garfield and myself when we were both members of this House; but that he avowed himself clearly, squarely, and broadly as a protectionist against all other faiths in connection with our system of revenue I can produce a score of witnesses to testify.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have been quite liberal in allowing the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to use my time, and I trust he will see that the House gives me a sufficient extension to cover the time which I have given him.

Mr. KELLEY. I trust the House will extend the gentleman's time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now ask that the letter of Mr. Wells be read by the Clerk.

The letter was read, as follows:

NORWICH, CONN., May 8, 1888.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your question concerning General Garfield's connection with the Cobden Club, I would say that he was elected a member of the club in 1869, at the same time and in company with Edward Atkinson, Ralph Waldo Emerson, E. P. Whipple, John Quincy Adams, and William Lloyd Garrison, of Massachusetts, and William C. Bryant, Henry Ward Beecher, and David Dudley Field, of New York; that he acknowledged the compliment and accepted the membership in a letter to the secretary of the club, and that his membership continued, without any revocation on his part, until the day of his death. And I will further add that it was not then the custom of the club, nor has it since been, to elect any person to their membership as an honorary recognition of their literary or political distinction, or without an assurance previously given, either directly or through friends, that the person nominated desired an election and accepted the principles of the club as expressed in the motto imprinted upon all its correspondence and publications, namely, "Free trade, peace, good-will among nations."

I also assert that President Garfield, of my own certain knowledge, was a believer in the principles of free trade down to a period as late as a year previous to his nomination for the Presidency, and that it was in no small part through intercourse and discussion with him in 1867 and 1868 that I abandoned my original belief in the doctrines of protection, and becoming a free-trader, subsequently (in 1870) accepted a membership in the Cobden Club.

In making these statements I prefer no accusation of disingenuousness or hypocrisy against General Garfield, and neither do I think him fairly open to a suspicion of such conduct. He probably accepted the definition of Canning, that true statesmanship consists in finding the line of safe change in public policy; and while accepting the principles of free trade and looking forward to the day when they will constitute the basis of commercial intercourse between all nations, he at the same time held that such a result in this country could be best and most speedily attained through gradual and tentative reforms, and that in the then temper of the American people the advocacy of radical measures was both inexpedient and useless.

I am, yours, most respectfully,

DAVID A. WELLS.

Hon. R. W. TOWNSHEND, M. C.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call special attention to the fact, which has now been conceded, that General Garfield was a member of the Cobden Club, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania bears testimony to the fact that General Garfield entertained free-trade opinions as late as 1876. I wish further to call attention to the testimony given by Mr. Wells——

Mr. CANNON. Will my colleague allow me——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman will be kind enough to wait until I get through with my statement on this point. I wish to call attention to the testimony given by Mr. Wells, that General Garfield never retracted his acceptance of his election to that club; and so far as we are able to judge to-day he died a member of the Cobden Free-Trade Club. Not a scintilla of evidence has been produced to the contrary. There have been some bald assertions that he repudiated any connection with that club; but in the absence of testimony justly entitled to credence I will still entertain the belief that General Garfield was a member of the club when he died, as testified by the letter of Mr. Wells. Now I yield to my colleague.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I think it makes but little difference if General Garfield, at one period of his life, entertained the opinions which gentlemen here undertake to impute to him. The views which different individuals entertain on questions of this kind are a matter of growth, experience, business expediency; and David A. Wells himself was at one time a protectionist. We know that General Garfield accepted the Republican nomination for the Presidency, and by that acceptance, as well as by speeches long before that nomination, he declared himself a sound protectionist. That his reaching of these conclusions was a matter of progress does not, I think, prove anything.

Take my own case. When I commenced my public life in this House and my investigation of the questions upon which I was called to vote, my leanings were substantially toward "revenue reform" from my colleague's standpoint. Through the years intervening until the present time, I have experienced on these questions a growth, until I presume I am now recognized as a pretty sound protectionist.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope my colleague will not take up my time by making a speech.

Mr. CANNON. And I expect to see my colleague [Mr. TOWNSHEND] forsake his present theories and gravitate toward protection.

Mr. REED. Oh, no! [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Several MEMBERS. That is expecting too much.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect ever to change my present convictions and abandon the position I now occupy on this tariff question so long as my conscience permits me to be a faithful representative of the agricultural interests of the West. Whenever I shall have reached that point when under the party lash I can be forced to betray the interests of my constituents to the monopolists of this country I may abandon my present position and join the company of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. With personally good feeling toward gentlemen who come here from the West, and without personally impugning their motives, I say that no member, whether he be sincere or not, who represents a Western agricultural district can under present circumstances, with such a tariff system as that now in existence, vote against measures for the reformation of the tariff without betraying the interest of his constituents.

Mr. KERR. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not complain so much of those Representatives who live in Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, and whose constitutents are being enriched out of the hard earnings of the farmers of the West; but, sir, I can not look upon the conduct of representatives of the agricultural districts of the West in favor of protection in any other light than a betrayal of the best interests of the people who sent them here.

Mr. KERR. Now may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. Will my colleague allow me——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not impute anything improper personally to these gentlemen; they may be deluded; but even if they are sincere in their advocacy of protection, I tell them now that they are sadly deluded, and deluded to such an extent as to obstruct what is for the best interests of the people who have placed them in this House.

Mr. KERR. Do you repudiate the pledge contained in your last national platform, that you would raise all your revenues by a tariff? Do you repudiate that now?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There is no such provision in the platform.

Mr. KERR. It is in your platform; and a gentleman on your own side—the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY], who spoke the other day—said that upon that platform there was no room for an internal-revenue system.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I deny that there is any such declaration in the platform.

Mr. KERR. The gentleman from Michigan read it, and made that statement, and he was a member of the platform committee.

Mr. CANNON. Will my colleague allow me a word? He has used pretty strong language when he accused his colleagues and friends here of betraying the interests of their coustituents.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. I concede to my colleague honesty of conviction and purpose, and I claim the same for myself. If he will allow me——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I was proceeding, when interrupted, to show that the record of proceedings of this House bear me out in the statement that the policy and principles recommended in the President's message have been previous to its preparation indorsed by prominent Republican leaders. I hold in my hand a memorandum of some references which I desire to submit as follows:

On January 31, 1870, my distinguished predecessor in Congress, Hon. S. S. Marshall, offered a resolution favoring a revenue tariff. A motion was made to lay it on the table but the present Senator ALLISON, and Senator CULLOM, of Illinois, refused to vote in the affirmative; they voted in the negative and thereby indirectly indorsed the doctrine of a revenue tariff.

On the 14th of March, 1870, Judge S. S. Marshall offered a resolution indorsing the principles of the Walker bill which those on the other side call a Democratic free-trade tariff, and on a motion to lay it on the table General Garfield and the present Senators ALLISON, HALE, and HAWLEY voted in the negative, thereby showing their sympathy with the Walker tariff bill.

On the 23d of February, 1870, Senator ALLISON, Banks of Massachusetts, CULLOM of Illinois, Senator DAWES of Massachusetts, Senator HAWLEY, and Senator Logan all voted in favor of free coal on the resolution offered by Mr. Ward of New York.

On June 6, 1870, on a resolution of Mr. Ward in favor of free coal, Senator ALLISON, General Banks, Senators CULLOM, DAWES, HALE, HAWLEY, and the late Senator Logan voted in the affirmative.

On April 30, 1872, on Judge Lyman Trumbull's amendment to place coal and salt on the free-list, General Garfield, Senators HAWLEY, HALE, and FRYE voted in the affirmative, and at the same session Senator HALE offered a resolution to place salt and coal on the free-list. In the House March 14, 1871, Senator EUGENE HALE moved to put salt on the free-list. HALE, FRYE, Garfield, and HAWLEY voted in the affirmative. At the same session, on Farnsworth's motion to repeal the duty on foreign coal, among the ayes were DAWES, FRYE, Garfield, HALE, HAWLEY, and Tyner.

In 1888 Mr. Blaine denounced any reduction of the tariff when its average rate of tax is over 47 per cent.; yet no longer ago than 1883, in his "Twenty Years in Congress," Mr. Blaine had this to say of the so-called Democratic free-trade or revenue tariff of 1846, when its average rate of tax was 23.2 per cent., or less than half as extortionate as that which now annually wrings from labor and puts into the Treasury more than $200,000,000 and then puts into the pockets of pampered and protected monopolies $550,000,000 more. Says Mr. Blaine:

> The tariff of 1846 yielded abundant revenue. Money became very abundant after the year 1849; large enterprises were undertaken, speculation was prevalent, and for a considerable period the prosperity of the country was genuine. The principles embodied in the tariff of 1846 seemed for the time to be so entirely vindicated and approved that resistance to it ceased not only among the people but among the protective economists, and even among the manufacturers to a large extent. So general was this acquiescence that in 1856 a protective tariff was not suggested or even hinted by any one of the three parties which presented Presidential candidates.

In 1857 nearly all the Republicans in Congress, including such men as Hamilton Fish, Charles Sumner, and Henry Wilson, voted for the bill which then reduced the duties even lower than was provided in the Walker tariff of 1846.

On that bill 18 New England votes were cast for the bill, and only 9 against it. (See Report 12, Senate, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, page 298.)

I cite the action of the gentlemen mentioned because when less radical action is recommended by President Cleveland and by the Committee on Ways and Means in the bill before us, they are denounced as guilty of disloyal tendencies, of yielding to the dictation of Southern sentiment, of advocating free trade, and a desire to destroy home manufacturing industries.

Of course the Republican Senators mentioned had a right to advocate Democratic views on the tariff and to change their former opinions.

Sir, why have so many of these eminent statesmen abandoned such strong convictions and denounce to-day what they so firmly, patriotically, and eloquently advocated a short time ago? It may be they sincerely changed their convictions or it may be because the party to which they belong is dominated by the shylocks of monopoly, who demanded that they should sacrifice allegiance to the country when in conflict with allegiance to party. Monopoly is indeed a cruel master. From the proofs that I have presented it will be seen that the President has not only followed the dictates of his conscience and the demands of the duty imposed upon him by his high office, but obeyed the teachings of the Democratic fathers and proven his loyalty to true Democratic principles.

Had he sat supinely in the White House, and ignored the evils which produce the distress now prevailing in the land, and the threatened direful disasters to the business and prosperity of the country, then might the party which placed him in power and the people of whose interests he is the guardian have accused him of dereliction of duty; but by his message he has done what common sense, common honesty, and humanity demand. He has done what the leaders and platforms of the Democratic party have demanded; he has advocated what Republican Presidents and statesmen have advocated at a recent period.

THE USE OF MONEY IN ELECTIONS.

From the reckless demagogues who advocate protection we often hear the assertion that British gold has been used to promote the cause of free trade in this country and to aid in the election of members of Congress in that interest.

Such false statements are really too contemptible to notice here. I do not believe that English statesmen desire free trade in this country. England's prosperity depends mainly on her supremacy upon the seas and the control of foreign markets. They see how effectually protection has annihilated our merchant marine and swept nearly the last vestige of it from the seas, and how effectually it bars the market of the world against us. The interest of England is benefited more by protection than by free trade in this country; but I have alluded to this false cry for the purpose of asserting that, whilst there is no proof of such use of British gold, we have evidence that those who have filled their coffers by this system of legalized robbery are guilty of using money to prevent the election of revenue-reform Democrats to Congress.

By the use of money it is believed they caused the majority of more than one Democratic member of this House to be reduced at the last election, and I have no doubt the defeat of some others can be traced to the use of money by the protective monopolists. This will probably be an easy year for the managers of the Republican party to raise a large campaign fund, for I have no doubt the monopolies and trusts, for whose interest that party in Congress and in State conventions is zealously working, will furnish a very liberal campaign fund to prevent the election of tariff reformers to the next Congress. They can well afford to do this, and no doubt will do so. Indeed, they have already opened the campaign by the distribution of documents among the farmers of the West, as will be seen from the following editorial in the Bulletin, the organ of the iron and steel association:

This is the exact number of tariff tracts published by the Industrial League, of Philadelphia, which were distributed from the office of the American Iron and Steel Association from the 1st of January last to the close of business on the 5th of March. On the 28th of February the president of the Industrial League, Mr. Joseph Wharton, paid to Allen, Lane & Scott, for printing tariff tracts, one bill which amounted to $2,638.36.

In a later issue it said:

657,487 TARIFF TRACTS.

From the 15th of January until the close of business on April 25, 1888, the American Iron and Steel Association distributed gratuitously 657,437 well-printed tariff tracts, published by the Industrial League, of Philadelphia.

We think that we know the exact influence which has caused the suspension of Mr. Philpot's free-trade newspaper, The Million, at Des Moines, Iowa. In 1886 the Industrial League, of Philadelphia, sent 72,556 protective-tariff tracts to Iowa, and down to the 1st of November in the present year it had sent 37,062 to the same State. These were distributed among the farmers and other voters of that State. The Million could not live under this steady fire of hard facts and common sense.

REPUBLICANS ADMIT SURPLUS MUST BE REDUCED.

It is conceded by prominent Republicans in this debate that the enormous surplus revenue flowing into the Treasury must be stopped by reduction of taxation. I quote, as follows, from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]:

That the accumulation of such a surplus must be averted there can be no question. A constantly-accruing and ever-increasing surplus not only invites to profligacy, but insures swift financial disaster. There can be, therefore, no conflict of opinion, but that there must be such a modification of our tax laws as will insure a reduction of revenue to the basis of probable governmental expenditure. But a reduction of the revenue is not the only, nor indeed the chief end to be attained. The method by which that reduction is to be accomplished has become the main point of controversy, and indeed the only point about which there is any serious conflict of opinion.

A Republican Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], in speaking of the President's message, said:

However much we may differ in respect of the methods of reduction, we doubtless will all agree that the annual revenue of the Government should be reduced. It is not wise nor just to collect more revenue than is needed for the proper purposes of the Government. We are doing this unwise and unjust thing. This ought not to continue. How can it be stopped? By amending the revenue laws.

Senator WILSON said further on, as follows:

We are collecting about $60,000,000 more revenue each year than the expenditures of the Government require. How are we to rid ourselves of this condition? Of course, by reducing the aggregate of taxation; and the President gave us a suggestion in his message of the proper line of policy to be pursued in effecting this reduction.

THE REAL ISSUE.

It is true, as the gentleman from Michigan has said, that the method by which that reduction is to be accomplished has become the main point of controversy. The President and the Democratic party demand that this reduction shall come from the thousands of articles of food, clothing, household goods, and things used in the workshops and on the farms. The potent Republican leaders demand that the reductions shall be confined to whisky and tobacco. The position of the two parties is clearly illustrated by their past and present course on this subject in Congress.

HISTORY OF PRESENT TARIFF SYSTEM.

Before proceeding further with what I have to say, let me briefly state that substantially the present system of Federal taxes was created about the beginning and during the war. When the Democratic party went out of power in 1861 the rate of tariff taxes was less than 20 per cent., which was so adjusted as to realize about $50,000,000 per annum. Shortly thereafter the Morrill tariff bill was adopted, and before the close of the war the rates of tariff duties were enormously increased. That war legislation, so far as it relates to custom duties, with some modification, has substantially remained in force ever since.

The reasons urged for the enormous increase of the tariff taxes were that the war rendered it necessary that taxes should be increased in order that sufficient revenue might be raised to purchase supplies for the Army and defray the general expenses of the war; and as an internal-revenue tax of 5 per cent. upon the gross products of manufactures had been laid in order to increase their profits, and as a compensation to the manufacturers for this tax, very heavy duties were imposed upon imports. At the time this system was adopted it was declared and promised by the Republican leaders, who had charge of the tariff legislation, that when the war should end and the special internal-revenue tax upon the manufactures that I have mentioned should be repealed, then the high rates of tariff duties on imports should be reduced.

Other internal-revenue taxes were laid also during the war, such as taxes on bank stock, bank checks, and bank deposits, and tax on incomes, on tobacco, alcoholic spirits, etc. The reasons for these high war taxes seemed plausible, and the people acquiesced; but the cunning agents of monopoly, shielding themselves behind these patriotic pretenses, so framed the law that it yielded $5 of private taxes to the manufacturing monopolies whilst it put only $1 of revenue in the Treasury. Thus not only were the people required to pay vast sums of public taxes to the support of the Government, but, through the medium of this cunningly devised scheme, were forced in a fivefold degree to enrich the manufacturing monopolists of Pennsylvania and New England, thus proving that there is much truth in the saying of Dr. Johnson that "the first refuge of scoundrels is in patriotism."

When the war ended, when peace had been declared, and the volunteers had been discharged and returned to their homes, no more money being required to furnish rations, equipments, arms, ammunition, and other supplies for the vast army of the Union volunteers, and the special tax on manufactures having been repealed, then the Democratic party demanded that the promises made when the high rates of tariff duties were laid should be kept, and that the heavy burden resting upon the people for the enrichment of the manufacturing monopolies should be reduced. Some Republicans like Senator ALLISON, General Garfield, and others of that party seconded the demand of the Democratic party in 1870.

It was conceded by the real managers of the Republican party that taxes could be safely reduced, but that taxes of this kind should not be disturbed; they said they were willing to take the internal-revenue taxes off of banks, incomes, etc., but were unwilling to any material extent to take off the tariff duties on imports. They said that whilst the war-tariff taxes were not then needed for governmental purposes, yet they desired to maintain them in order to foster and protect home manufactures; in other words, they proposed to leave the high taxes on the poor and to only relieve the wealthy and the corporations. When the Democratic party demanded free Bibles they refused, but gave free playing cards; when it demanded a reduction of taxes upon woolen blankets they gave a reduction of the taxes upon whisky; when it demanded a reduction of taxes upon the absolute necessities of the poor they freed bank checks and bank deposits from taxation.

The positions of the two parties on this question then became clearly defined. The Democratic party was shown to be the champion of popular rights and of the poor; and the Republican party was shown to be then, as now, the champion and protector of monopolies and capitalists. A great issue was then formed between the two great parties, which has continued to divide them ever since. This issue has to a considerable extent been obscured until very recently by the artful introduction of false issues by the leaders of the Republican party. They have revived and attempted to keep alive the dead issues which were settled by the war, and by appeals to passions and prejudices engendered by the war. It is with a view to deceive the people and to obscure the real issue that gentlemen on the other side, whenever a tariff bill has been brought up for discussion in this House, have endeavored to divert the public mind by picturing the horrors and sinfulness of African slavery, bloody-shirt arguments about the sentiments of the Southern people, and vilification of the purposes of the Democratic party. They have in this way diverted the attention of the masses of the Republican party from the injustice practiced on the people under the guise of protection of labor.

Whilst the public gaze has been kept on the South the monopolies have been filching from the pockets of the people their hard earnings. The Republican party having been converted into a supple agent of protected monopolies, they have furnished that party with much of its campaign fund and the specious arguments with which the people have been deluded.

CHANGE IN THE ORIGINAL CHARACTER OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

That party in its origin was a party of principle. Among those who breathed the breath of life into it were some of the noblest characters in the history of this country—brave and patriotic men. The names of Seward, Chase, Blair, Trumbull, Palmer, Greeley, Sumner, Curtin, and Wells will ever be honored.

But, sir, after slavery had been abolished and the Union had been maintained, and the great objects for which that party was created had been accomplished, it passed under the control of a spoils-hunting band, and it was prostituted to base purposes. When this became apparent the great men whose names I have mentioned abandoned it, and nearly every one of them became affiliated with the Democratic party. The Republican party in its present aspirations and policy is a buccaneer among political organizations; it has been sold by its leaders to the monopolists; like the soldiers of fortune of old, it has hired its sword for lucre; it has enlisted itself in the cause of monopolistic piracy.

I do not believe that the people can longer be deluded by the false issues under which this great question of tariff reform has been buried.

RESULTS OF DEMOCRATIC ADMINISTRATION.

Fortunately the Democratic party came into power three years ago, and after a fair trial the country has been convinced that all the predictions of evil made against it by its foes are false. The people can no longer be deceived by charges against its loyalty or its capacity for safe administration of the Government. They know full well that no rebel claim has been paid, that no negro has been re-enslaved, that no soldier has lost his just right to pension, that the business interests of the country have not been endangered, that the public moneys have not been squandered in extravagant appropriations, and that the purity, wisdom, and patriotism of the administration of Grover Cleveland has been equal to any that has existed in the past.

The people can no longer be misled by the lies and slanders of selfish demagogues; and now when the demand is made for relief from the high protective war taxes the people can not be deceived by bloody-shirt speeches over issues settled over twenty years ago. The bombast of Western Republican members in regard to the defunct Confederate constitution and the mournful dirges of the Pennsylvania politicians in regard to negro slavery will be unavailing in the face of the distress suffered by their constituents under the operation of this scheme of plunder. The West will no longer be deluded by her false and unfaithful representatives. The truth will be told on every stump in the coming campaign.

And the people will see as clearly as we see here, that this is not an issue between free trade and protection, but that it is an issue for a fair, just, and honest adjustment of the tariff taxes. They will see that the charges that the Democratic party is hostile to legitimate manufacturing interest, or that it is a free-trade party, are untrue. They full well know that the policy of our party is to continue to levy taxes on imports, and whilst it opposes protection for the sake of protection, and insists that no more taxes shall be taken from the people than are necessary for governmental purposes, it does agree that the tariff taxes shall be so adjusted as to afford encouragement to the legitimate manufacturing industries and labor. For the first time since the war the real position of parties on this question has been clearly seen by the masses.

THE OBJECT OF PROTECTION.

The object, and the only object, of protection, as claimed by its candid advocates, is to give prosperity to manufacturing industries and provide better wages for the laborer employed in these industries. This it does by laying such high taxes upon foreign imports as will restrain them from coming into competition with domestic productions.

PROTECTION OF LABOR.

One of the most glaring false pretenses of the Republican party is that it advocates protection as a benefit to labor.

High Republican authority as to the ability of American labor to compete with foreign labor and as to the ability of the United States to exclude foreign manufactures is afforded in the letter of Hon. W. M. Evarts, Secretary of State under Mr. Hayes, transmitting the consular reports on the state of labor in Europe to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, May 17, 1879 (Forty-sixth Congress, first session, House Executive Document No. 5, pages 36, 37, 38.)

Says Secretary Evarts:

The average American workman performs from one and one-half to twice as much work in a given time as the average European workman. This is so important a point in connection with our ability to compete with the cheap labor manufactures of Europe, and it seems at first thought so strange, that I will trouble you with somewhat lengthy quotations from the reports in support thereof. * * *

For the first time our manufactures are now assuming international proportions. At a time of universal depression we have met those nations which held a monopoly of the world's markets, met them in their strongholds, etc. * * *

Within the last fifteen years we have demonstrated our ability by the brilliant development of our own resources to exclude by honest competition foreign manufactures to a large extent from our shores.

In striking contrast with the present Republican fashion of sneering depreciation of the importance of foreign markets, Secretary Evarts continues:

The question which now peremptorily challenges all thinking minds is how to create a foreign demand for these manufactures which are left after supplying our home demands. We can not stand still, for the momentum of increase will soon become so great that it will push us outward anyway; to push us safely and profitably is of so much importance as to almost overtop all other public questions of the hour. This question appeals equally to the selfishness and patriotism of all citizens, but to the laborer it appeals with tenfold force, for without work he can not live, and unless we can extend the markets for our manufactures he can not expect steady work, and unless our manufactures can undersell foreign manufactures we can not enlarge our foreign markets.

But with this intelligent glimpse of the importance of the external universe and its value as an outlet to the accumulating surplus of American manufactures his vision suddenly narrows to the restricted area visible from the protectionist point of view, discovers that the true method of cheapening products so as to enable American manufactures to undersell in the markets of the world, consists not only in the obviously sensible and humane process of cheapening raw materials, but in the uniform protectionist process of cheapening labor. Quotha:

The first great truth to be learned by the manufacturers and workingmen is that the days of sudden fortunes and double wages are gone. We must realize the fact that ocean steam communication has annihilated distance and brought the nations face to face. This drawing together of the nations means equalization in trade, profits, wages, etc., the advantage being with those who soonest accept the situation. In the near future the workingman of New York can not expect twice or thrice the wages of his fellow-workman in Europe while all other things, food, rent, clothing, etc., are on an equality.

Under no consideration must we have strikes; under no consideration must our factories lie idle. If our manufacturers can not run their establishments profitably—and capital will no more remain permanently invested unprofitably than will labor work for nothing—and pay the prevailing wages, our working people must help them to make profit by consenting to a reduction of wages!

The assertion of Secretary Evarts that the double efficiency of the American workingman and the "individuality" and "inventive genius in mechanical appliances" of the American people have enabled us to a great extent to exclude foreign manufactures, and his suggestion of the "overtopping" importance to us of finding in the markets of the world an outlet for our surplus manufactures, are in absolute harmony with Democratic views; but his conclusion that the cheapening of our manufactured products shall be accomplished by a "reduction of wages," instead of by a reduction in the cost of raw materials, is anti-Democratic, though quite in accord with the sentiment which has prompted protected industries to import cheap foreign labor, instead of trying the experiment of importing free and therefore cheap raw materials.

Prosperity to American industries and American labor is to be won, not, as Secretary Evarts, one of the eminent champions of high protection, suggests, by "equalizing" the "wages" of American and foreign labor, but by equalizing the cost of the materials used by the American and foreign manufacturers.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER], who is so greatly distinguished for his accomplishments and eloquence, has furnished evidence which exposes the hollowness of the pretension that protection is desired for the benefit of labor. He said:

The gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW] this morning read an appeal from the people of California that Congress should not take the tax off lumber; because they were entitled to so much stumpage, $2 a thousand, and so much on the boards: and he said it would be the grossest act of injustice to those people, to the employés and to the men who owned the lumber, to take the tax off.

Now, I want to say that that is strikingly illustrated in a little production which I chanced to find the other day in a Philadelphia paper, and another in an Eastern Maryland paper. One of the gentlemen whose views are set forth here is talking on the subject of the tax on lumber, and I may remark in passing that no people in the country are more interested in that question than the people of Mississippi, because we have in that State the grandest pineries in the world. While those in Michigan and the other Northwestern States have been used up by manufacture and destroyed by prairie fires, we have in Mississippi pine forests almost inexhaustible in quantity and in a virgin state, yet we are not going to quarrel with the bill of the Committee on Ways and Means because it happens to touch upon that industry of our people. That, however, is the ground upon which the gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW] opposes the bill—that it would take off a portion of the tax on lumber.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. The people of Michigan are buying up those Mississippi timber lands.

Mr. HOOKER. I know it, but we have just stopped you by resolution. You have got enough of the public lands. [Laughter.]

Mr. KERR. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOOKER. I have not the time now. I have read the views of this gentleman who is named here as Mr. Blanchard, of Chicago.

"THE TARIFF IN A NUTSHELL.

"Mr. Blanchard, of Chicago, in a short speech a few days ago, said more to show up the evils of a high-tariff system than others have done in labored speeches and ponderous volumes. Mr. Blanchard is a refreshing sample of a protected operator who is willing to tell the truth and shame his demoniac majesty, and furnishes a beautiful illustration of the utter selfishness that governs the beneficiaries of a high protective tariff. He says: "I am high tariff on lumber, but low tariff on copper, iron, wool, cotton, leather, glass, etc. I will tell you why. I own timber lands and sell stumpage; besides, I operate largely myself, and this tariff puts money into my pocket. I get $2 per 1,000 feet for my stumpage, and $2 per 1,000 for my boards. I have just sold 5,000,000 feet of lumber. Now, $2 per 1,000 on 5,000,000 feet is just $10,000. That is the difference to me between high tariff and free lumber. I am high tariff on lumber, I am. The blessed tariff, they tell us, is all for the benefit of the American laborer. What do you suppose I did with the $10,000. Divide it among my workmen? Not a bit of it. I put it right into this calfskin wallet, I did." [Laughter.]

"Of all my workmen I am the only protected American laborer. Wages depend upon supply and demand, my friends, and not upon taxes." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

"When you see two men after one boss wages are low; when you see two bosses after one man wages are high; and that is the whole of it—the theory, principle, and practice."—From the Easton (Md.) Ledger.

I read now an abstract from the Philadelphia Telegraph, entitled—

"THE TRUTH ON THE QUININE TARIFF.

"To those who think that whatever is is right, and therefore should not be disturbed, and that the tariff is a thing existent and therefore not to be altered in any manner whatsoever, we heartily commend the history of the duty on quinine, which six years ago was virtually prohibitory. It will be remembered that a hard fight had to be fought to secure the repeal of the duty upon this important medicinal agent. At the time of the repeal of the duty there were five firms manufacturing quinine in this country. Three of them were in this city, and all declared through the columns of the Evening Telegraph, either by their own letters or in interviews with reporters, that if the bill of repeal passed they would be compelled to discontinue the manufacture of quinine. The price of the article was then $3.50 per ounce, or $2.95 less than when the duty was on.

"Neither of the five great firms which previously manufactured quinine has since discontinued its manufacture, and all are, it is fairly to be assumed, making satisfactory profits from its manufacture under the reduced price. The making of quinine in this country six years ago was a monopoly, from which individual fortunes represented by millions of dollars were realized. It is but just to say, however, that there has been a large increase in the growth in the cinchona bark from which the medicine is made, and the added supply of raw material has helped to lessen the price of the product.

"There are other great monopolies to-day in the country which could and should be destroyed by the reduction of the excessive duties on their manufactures. The worst of them all is the sugar trust, a monopoly which oppresses every consumer in the land. The quinine experiment should be tried upon it."

The following table, prepared by Mr. Henry J. Philpot, of Des Moines, Iowa, will illustrate the hypocrisy of the claim that the war tariff must be kept up to benefit labor. Its effect in reality is to give the lion's share to trusts and iniquitous monopolists. This tariff system is building up in this country a powerful, unscrupulous plutocracy.

Name of trust.	Protected by duties averaging, per cent.—	Adjusted to guaranty a bonus in each $100 of product amounting to—	Their whole expense for labor in $100 worth of product being—
Salt trust	50	$33	$25
Earthenware trust	56	36	40
Bessemer-steel trust	84	46	9
Plow-steel trust	45	33	29

Other laboring men as well as farmers have discovered that the Democratic party is the workingman's best friend, and that through the success of that party lies the roadway to relief. The local papers of the past few days contain evidence of this, as will be seen by reference to the following paragraph:

WORKINGMEN AIDED BY DEMOCRATS.

The Federation of Labor held an open meeting at Hilton Hall last night, at which addresses were made by E. W. Oyster and Paul T. Bowen. Mr. Oyster made the first address, and in it reviewed the history of labor legislation in this country. He showed conclusively that all the bills passed by Congress which were oppressive to the workingmen had been passed by the votes of Republican members, while the slight relief that the workingmen had since obtained by legislation was due to the efforts of the Democrats.

The same tariff that plunders all other consumers also plunders the laborers in the factories which are so highly protected.

EFFECT OF PROTECTION ON THE FARMER.

I do not concede that protection is of any real benefit to any class of laborers; but if this claim is admitted to its fullest extent, no matter how great may be the benefits to the manufacturer and the laborer employed by them, the intelligent students of political economy who are not biased by partisan prejudices will confess that protection confers no benefit upon the grain-growers, the provision-producers, and farmers generally, but, on the other hand, that policy does increase the cost of all that he buys upon which tariff taxes are laid. Now, when we remember that tariff taxes are laid upon about four thousand articles, including nearly everything that the farmer buys, that is used on his farm, or in his house, or he has on his back, and that the rate of this taxation is 47 per cent., it will be seen that they are very heavily oppressed by that system of taxation, and that those who are engaged in agricultural pursuits, if no good reason can be furnished for its retention, are entitled to insist that the policy shall be abandoned.

I regard the claim that the farmer is benefited by protection as the most untenable of all the propositions advocated by protectionists, and that it is a most audacious misrepresentation and can only be used for the purpose of deceiving them and inveigling them to vote the Republican ticket. My friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] is too good a man to be charged with willful misrepresentation, but I must insist that he is sadly deluded when he urged that the farmer was benefited and protected by the tariff taxes on wheat, corn, vegetables, and other farm products. As proof of his error I will call attention to what a Senator from his own State, who I understand to be his first choice as a candidate by the Republican party for President next fall, has said upon this very point. When discussing the tariff bill then pending, on March 24, 1870, Senator ALLISON said in this Hall:

The agricultural interest, it will be seen, is much the largest interest in its aggregate product as well as in the number of persons employed. I believe no one will claim that this large interest is directly protected. It is true that under customs laws there is a small duty upon wheat, barley, oats, and other agricultural products, but it does not afford any protection to the great wheat and grain-producing regions of the country. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Wilson], in discussing this question yesterday stated that the cost of wheat in New England is about 85 cents per bushel, while in Illinois, Iowa, and Wisconsin the price is about 65 cents per bushel. The Canadian wheat is the only wheat that comes in competition with our own. Canada being nearer New England than the wheat-growing States more than makes up the duty in the reduced cost of transportation.

What is true of wheat is equally true of other grains. Therefore the farmer has practically no protection at all, and whatever benefit he derives is from what the home market furnishes for home products. Unfortunately for the farmer, the market price of wheat is fixed by the price which the surplus will bring abroad, or the price of wheat in London or Liverpool. At that market, where the surplus is sold, and which fixes the value of the whole crop, he comes in competition with the grain produced in the Crimea, in Hungary, and in the region of the Baltic, from fields cultivated by what is known, in comparison to our own, as pauper labor.

But I am told we must so legislate as to furnish a home market for all our agricultural products, and this can only be done by high tariff. Any one examining the subject will see that our agricultural products increase more rapidly than our population, so that if we do not export these products in their natural condition, we must do so by converting them into manufactured articles, and export these articles. But this can not be done under a high tariff, for all nations will buy manufactured products where they are the cheapest, and the nation selling the cheapest will control the market. This rule excludes our highly-taxed manufactures made from highly-taxed materials from the markets of the world, although we have natural advantages possessed by no other nation.

So fully has Senator ALLISON answered his follower on this floor that it is unnecessary for me to dwell longer upon this point, and I would not do so were it not for the fact that a number of other gentlemen representing Western constituents, have advanced the same views as my friend from Iowa.

THE TARIFF A BURDEN AND OF NO BENEFIT TO THE FARMER.

An examination of the facts will demonstrate that the tariff in every sense is a burden, and not a benefit to the farmer. In the first place let us ascertain whether it brings him any good by laying a tariff upon his products. There is a tax upon corn of 10 per cent.; now, if you will examine the statistics of 1885, you will find that we exported from this country and sold in foreign markets, nearly fifty-three million of bushels of corn, and yet only forty-five hundred bushels were imported into the country.

Where is the man so stupid as to suppose that any rate of tax upon corn can advance its price in this country one mill? We are the corn producers of the world. We have no need to import corn, for the reason that we raise more than we can use and are compelled to seek a foreign market for the surplus which is not needed by our own people; and the price obtained for that surplus in foreign markets fixes its value here. The amount of corn that we exported probably realized $25,000,000. The corn that we imported did not cost us but little over $2,000. But they have insisted that wheat is protected also, and there is a tax on wheat of 20 per cent.

Now let us see what the statistics of 1885 show with regard to wheat; we exported in that year 132,851,835 bushels of wheat, being over one-fourth of our whole crop, and we imported only 212,311 bushels, which, as all know, was imported by the mills on the Canadian border, in order that they might have the profits of grinding it into flour mainly for exportation to the markets of the world. In addition to the wheat exportation of that year, we sent abroad $52,000,000 worth of wheat flour. I have no statistics showing what amount of flour—if any—was imported into this country, but I doubt if any considerable quantity was imported, for we make the best flour and sell it at the lowest price of any country on the globe. I will not pursue these statistics any further. It can not truthfully be claimed that protection advances the price of farm products, because their prices are regulated by what they will bring in foreign markets; and if wheat and corn were placed upon the free-list, without any tariff taxes whatever upon them, they would not be affected to the extent of one mill in their market value.

This will be more clearly seen by examining the New York market reports and comparing the prices of grain in that market during the period when the so-called free-trade Walker tariff was in operation from 1850 to 1860 with the prices realized in that market under the present tariff during the past ten years. I read from Spofford's American Almanac for 1888.

My colleague [Mr. CANNON] has called attention to a time in Illinois and Iowa before the war when the crop was very abundant and the facilities for cheap transportation would not enable the farmer to get his surplus to the New York market. Under these circumstances corn was no doubt for a short time sold for 10 cents a bushel. This would have occurred again in Illinois and Iowa at times during the past few years if the facilities for transportation had not enabled the farmer to market his surplus corn in the foreign markets at very low freight rates. That low price has, at one time at least, prevailed not far from that gentleman's home since the war.

A CONTRAST OF THE EFFECT OF PROTECTION IN THE EAST AND THE WEST.

As an evidence of the benefits of the tariff to the manufacturing classes and of its evil effects upon the farmers it is well for us to contrast the condition of these two classes. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEN], who represents one of the largest manufacturing districts in the United States, has given us a graphic description of the prosperity and happy condition of those employed in the factories in Massachusetts, which I will quote below. He said:

If I desired to inflict tables of figures upon you, I could show you conclusively that under this system our working people are better paid and live almost as cheaply as in other countries even as it is, while the immense advantage they derive in their dress, their habits of life, the education of their children, their little homes, their accumulated savings in our banks all over the land, tells a story of richness, happiness, contentment which figures would not begin to express.

* * * * * * *

I wish I could take this body of men to the heights opposite the city of Lowell, Mass., where, with one glance of the eye sweeping up and down the stream, would be literally seen miles of cotton-mills, perhaps the finest in the world, equipped with the most ingenious labor-saving machinery known to this wonder-working age, and filled from basement to roof with a thinking, throbbing army of intelligent and skillful men and women.

* * * * * * *

Standing upon this spot in the early evening as the sun goes down, you would see first from one and then another of the thousands of windows the lights flashing out; twinkling and flashing as they are reflected from the bosom of the flowing river, they rival in brilliancy the stars of an October night. Listen, and the bells ring out their peal, the gates fly open, and from them issue thousands of working men and women, well clothed, well fed, well housed, pleasant to look upon, happy and contented, moving quietly to their own homes in many cases—the ideal laboring wage-earners of a New England manufacturing city.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has confined his description to the condition of the working classes; he has not told us of the immense wealth which has been accumulated by the owners of the factories in which these people work; he has not called attention to the palatial mansions in which they live, the luxuries which their families enjoy, and the immense incomes they receive, which guard them against care and anxiety for the wants of this world. My friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] seemed desirous of rivaling the gentleman from Massachusetts in describing the condition of the farmers of the West. One would imagine from what he said that the farmer is to-day very prosperous, that his home is filled with luxuries, and that he enjoys a life of ease and pleasure, as will be seen by the following remarks that I quote. He said, speaking of the present condition of Western farmers:

The "log cabin" has disappeared. Comfortable homes, a good carpeted room, a spring wagon, a barn, a buggy or carriage for the trip to church or the town, a country paper, and often a good daily, books, plenty to eat and wear; these are the fruits of protection that the farmer enjoys to-day. This is the rule in the great Northwest, and pinching poverty is the exception.

Sir, I am sorry that I am unable to confirm the truthfulness of the description which he has given of the Western farmer; I have lived among them for thirty years; I was born on a farm and spent the early years of my life there, and most of all that I have in this world is invested in farming lands and real estate in one of the most fertile and prosperous agricultural States in this Union; and I therefore feel that I have a right to claim that I know as much of the condition of the Western farmer as my friend from Iowa.

First, I will say, that whilst I know the life of a farmer is more independent, and better calculated to make good men, and good women, than those reared in any other station, better soldiers are found on the farm in time of war, and better citizens are found there in time of peace. It is a nursery for the most upright, biggest brained, broadest minded, and the largest souled people in the world. Anarchists are not reared on the farm, socialism and communism do not exist there, more Christianity, honesty, and patriotism are found upon he farm than anywhere else.

In truth, the agricultural classes constitute our bulwark against infidelity and social disorder. Agriculture is the basis of all wealth, private and public. For these reasons I feel that it should be the purpose of legislation and of the administration of the Government to foster and encourage agriculture, and as far as practicable lighten its burdens. I must say, however, there is more hard work and privation on the farm than will be found among those who are engaged in any other occupation. The farmer works more hours per day, is exposed more frequently in bad weather, and gets less pay for his labor than any other class of workingmen.

There is now much distress and hard times among the agricultural classes of this country. High and unjust taxation and the low prices obtainable for crops have proved disastrous to the farmers. So far as the Western farmers are concerned, I must confess that many of them are in debt, as will be seen from a statement of the mortgages which exist upon the farms of the West. They pay larger rates of interest, more, perhaps, than those engaged in any other class of business. The following is a statement of the amount of the mortgages which exist to-day against the farms in the States that are named in the following list, published in the Binder, a farmers' organ, at Marion, Ill., in my Republican colleague's [Mr. THOMAS'S] district.

MORTGAGES ON OUR FARMS.

The amount represented by the faces of the farm mortgages in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, and Missouri are:

In Ohio	$701,000,000
In Indiana	398,000,000
In Illinois	620,000,000
In Wisconsin	250,000,000
In Michigan	350,000,000
In Minnesota	175,000,000
In Iowa	351,000,000
In Nebraska	140,000,000
In Kansas	203,000,000
In Missouri	237,000,000
Total farm mortgages in these States	3,422,000,000

The actual value of the farms lying in the ten States is to-day about $13,000,000,000. In this valuation due allowance has been made for the enormous volume of emigration which has poured into Kansas, Nebraska, and Minnesota, and into the northern portions of Michigan and Wisconsin since 1880.

Mr. J. Burrows, the President of the National Farmers' Alliance, writes in the Farmers' Voice of the 11th ultimo:

I regret as much as any man living the poverty and dependence of farmers which exist at this day to an alarming extent, though denied by some.

Why does this distress exist among the farmers of the West? Of course failure of crops and insects have had much to do with it, but far less than the onerous, unfair, and dishonest taxes which are laid upon them, not only for governmental purposes, but for the purpose of furnishing bounties to other favored classes in this country. It is because an average tax of 50 per cent. is levied upon all the cotton goods that they buy in order that wealth and prosperity may exist among the owners and employés of the cotton mills in the district of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEN], and an average of 47 per cent. is collected from them on all the necessaries and comforts they buy in order to furnish bounty-money to those engaged in manufacturing industries. It is because they are impoverished in order that other classes may be enriched; because they are preyed upon by the manufacturing monopolies, and by the infamous trusts or dishonest combines which have been recently formed.

Let me call attention to some of the many taxes that are laid upon the farmer in order to benefit the manufacturing classes. It must be recollected that the amount of taxes collected by the Treasury on the articles mentioned represents only one-fifth of the amount which goes into the pockets of the manufacturers through the legerdemain of our protective tariff system, for where one dollar goes into the Treasury under this system, four dollars go into the pocket of the manufacturer. The following is a list of some articles the farmer uses:

It is out of the sweat and privations of the farmer of the West that the vast fortunes enjoyed by many of the millionaires of the East have been created. The Vanderbilts and the Goulds, in the transportation of his products to market and his supplies for his home, have accumulated hundreds of millions of dollars, and the protective manufacturers who have levied contributions on his clothing and food and tools and articles of nearly every description that he uses have enriched themselves to the extent of thousands of millions of dollars. And now, when his friends come and ask for a reasonable and fair reduction of this enormous burden upon him, they are denounced, vilified, and slandered by the subsidized agents and press of the great monopolies.

Sir, I admire the candor, if I can not admire the unjust doctrine of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEN] when he says, speaking of the benefit of protection to his district:

> Every man looks upon legislative matters more or less prejudiced by his own surroundings and environment. For that reason I come to this question with a deeper interest, perhaps, than to any other measure presented or likely to be presented at this session of Congress.
> I see the fortunes of my own people in this measure, and my interest is natural and intense. [Applause.]
> Mr. Chairman, I suppose if Massachusetts was to divide to-day upon the question of protection or free trade, the number of people in favor of protection would outnumber its opponents by a vast majority not easily computed in figures, and I am sure in my own Congressional district such a division would result in a majority of more than 10,000 in favor of the champion of the protective side of the argument, and I dare say that even such an estimate would fall below the actual figures.
> This question of a tariff is the one great topic of conversation to-day among the people in all the industrial sections of the country. These men know their own interests as only experts can, and they are watching the course of their Representatives upon this issue.
> I have tried to express the feelings of my own people upon this question, and I should be remiss in my duty to them if I failed in any degree to do my utmost to preserve for them, and by this I mean for the whole country, the continuance of a policy of legislative protection under which they have prospered, and which, if we can judge anything from past experience, offers such bright promise in the future.

There is a conflict between the interest of the people he represents and the interest of the farmers represented by gentlemen from the West. I wish the Republican Representatives from the West were as true to the local interest they represent as the Republican members from the East are faithful to their constituents. If Republican districts in the West were faithfully represented on this floor we would strike down the infamous features of the tariff which are a curse to them, and they might again bask in the sunshine of prosperity which beams so beneficently upon protected classes in the Eastern States.

Some of the advocates of the protectionist sneer at the efforts of farmers and other friends to secure reform in our tariff system, and belittle the interest which they have in it. Now let us see whether the farmer is not affected, and has a right to inquire into the operations of our tariff system. From the statistics that we are able to obtain it is believed that out of the sixty million of population of the United States nine million of them are farmers, who, with those connected with them, constitute over thirty million, or more than one-half of the entire population. They own five million of farms worth $11,000,000,000; the products of their farms amount to three billion, and they own over two billion and five hundred million worth of live-stock; their implements of husbandry amount to $600,000,000, and their improvements and fences to one hundred and fifty million.

These figures would indicate that he is very deeply interested in this subject and that he is entitled to have his interest considered as well as other classes when a bill like this is under consideration. As we have seen, protection is of no advantage to him; he is the victim of protection; he is injured by it. Consider for a moment the arguments used by the friends of protection on this floor. They say that unless the high rates of duty now existing are maintained some of the flourishing factories in this country will be forced to close and their business perish because protection forces people not interested in these factories to buy goods from them at a higher price than they can obtain them from foreigners.

These factories, they say, can not prosper, if, for instance—as this bill proposes to do—we reduce the tariff from 54 per cent. to 15 per cent. on the bagging in which the farmer sends his wheat to the Liverpool and other markets, domestic and foreign. That the factories engaged in making bagging in this country may fail because the farmer or his agent might exchange some of his wheat at Liverpool for bags which he can buy for far less money than he can in this country. Now, in order to maintain the prosperity of the home bagging factories they demand that we shall prevent the farmer from so doing by forcing him to pay 54 per cent. tariff duty on the bags when they come into this country; or, in other words, on each $100 worth of bags that he may buy in Liverpool, or exchange his wheat for, it is necessary to make him pay a penalty of $54 for doing so.

In this way, although he is forced to sell his wheat in the cheapest market of the world, you compel him to buy his supplies at home, in one of the dearest markets of the world. By this method you deny him the right to purchase his bagging and other supplies from his own customers, and compel him to purchase them from some folks in this country who manufacture the bagging and supplies, and who will add nearly all the tax which is laid upon the supplies to the other profits they make in manufacturing them. This is called protection to the American bagging manufacturer. Of course, it can be plainly seen that what is prosperity and advantage to the American bagging factory is an injury and disadvantage to the farming classes.

Now, if the farmer should say this is not right; that he is forced to sell his surplus wheat at Liverpool in a free-trade market, because he can not sell it at home for as much as he can obtain there, and if he shall insist that he ought to be permitted to buy his supplies where he can obtain them the cheapest without paying such a heavy penalty, and that it is an outrage and dishonest to compel him to contribute so much of his wheat money to enrich and protect the American bagging manufacturer—I say, if the farmer should make complaints like these, and is a resident of the district of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS], the gentleman for whom he probably voted as a candidate for Congress, would call him a free-trader and insist that he was disloyal; he would be told by that gentleman, "You have no need for a foreign market; the domestic market is good enough for you, and you should content yourself with such prices as your products will bring in the home market."

Such a farmer would be told by his Representative that notwithstanding he is compelled to compete with the half-starved and half-naked farm laborers of India, whose wages are only 6 cents a day, yet it is right and it is to his advantage that he should be forced to contribute a large portion of his wheat money to the owners of our manufacturing establishments and the workmen engaged therein in order that they may be prosperous.

THE FATE OF A SYSTEM SUPPORTED BY THEFT AND LYING.

Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the time is past when the intelligent farming class of this country can be deceived by such fallacy and absurd arguments as are used by the advocates of protection. They will say by their votes next fall that a business that can not be maintained without theft or lying ought to perish; and that when they see that we mean to reduce the bounties that they pay to the bagging factories from 54 down to 15 per cent., and on an average that we propose to reduce the tariff taxes on all the necessaries and comforts of life from 47 to 36 per cent., they will say by their votes at the polls, the Democratic party is right, and that the incidental protection afforded by the tariff rates provided in this bill is sufficient to give encouragement to all legitimate enterprises and afford fair wages to the workmen employed in them.

The operation of the high taxes which are laid upon the agricultural classes of this country, without any returning benefits to them, have at last induced a very large portion of them to organize in associations for their own protection. The Farmers' Alliance is one of them; the Wheel Association in the Southwest is another of them, and in my own State an organization known as the Farmers' Mutual Benefit Association has been formed. All of these associations denounce the principle of protection, and have declared it to be their determination to oppose the encroachment of all forms of monopoly. The Farmers' Mutual Benefit Association, to which I have alluded, has adopted as its creed or platform principles and doctrines which have been in the main advocated by the Democratic party from its foundation to this day.

Among them is opposition to protective tariff, opposition to the national-bank monopoly, a forfeiture of the land grants which have unjustly robbed the American citizen of his heritage in the public domain. The records of Congress will show that the Democratic party has consistently and bravely battled for all these reforms. When we came into power three years ago we found that nearly 200,000,000 acres had been given away by the Republican party to the railroad corporations of the country; in fact, we found that nearly all the fertile lands on which homes could be made had been stolen by the railroad corporations through the agency of their lobbyists in and outside of the halls of Congress.

Among the first achievements of the Democratic Administration and the Democratic majority in the lower House of Congress was to restore many millions of acres of these lands back to the ownership of the people, and we shall not cease to labor in that direction until we have forfeited every acre of the land to which the railroads have not already acquired such a title as we will by legislation have no power to disturb.

In regard to the national-bank monopoly I feel that the day is not far off when its end will be at hand. It is not a Democratic institution, and, in my judgment, we should without delay pass a bill which will take its circulation from it and substitute in lieu thereof Treasury notes. I am unable to conceive why the Treasury note, which costs the Government nothing but the paper and ink that is used in printing it, does not furnish as safe a circulating medium as a national-bank note, which has been so expensive to the people. That monopoly, however, if not ended by legislation, will before very long be ended by the payment or retirement of the public debt. I know that the friends of the national-bank monopoly, led by a Republican Senator [Mr. FARWELL] from my own State, are proposing measures to continue the existence of the national-bank monopoly by fixing as a basis for it other securities than those of Government bonds. But I have no apprehension that they will succeed in their efforts as long as we have a Democratic President in the White House. I have introduced a bill for the purpose of substituting Treasury notes for national-bank circulation which I hope may have favorable action before this Congress adjourns.

The protective tariff creates monopolies and trusts; it makes tramps of men and paupers of women; it breeds discontent among the working classes and causes strikes and derangement of business. It is well that the farmers have been aroused and are organizing to protect themselves from the evils of this dishonest and ungodly system.

OUR ADVANTAGE IN CONTROLLING FOREIGN MARKETS.

In connection with what has been said by the protectionist against the extension of our foreign market, I desire to say that a foreign market is of more importance and ought to bring more wealth to this country than to any other on the globe. Our situation is better than any other and we can more effectually control the trade of the world. China, Japan, and the islands of the Pacific Ocean front our western shore. Fronting our eastern shore are Europe and the islands of the Atlantic. The southern countries, rich in natural resources, are on the coast-line with us.

Lying between the two great oceans, occupying the midway ground on the lines of transportation of the commerce of the world, we have power to control the trade between the peoples of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. It must pass either through our hands or must disadvantageously pass around us. Our people are the most enterprising, our farmers and mechanics are the most skilful in the world. We should have no fears of competition with any people on the globe. We certainly possess advantages doubly greater than any other nation; our flag should be found above the decks of our ships laden with commerce in every port, in every sea. The statistics of the world should show that there is a larger tonnage of American register bearing the products of our farms and workshops than can be shown by any other nation in the world.

And, sir, it would be so if it were not for the narrow policy of protection which has erected a Chinese wall around our land and closed our ports against the riches of the world's commerce—the fell spirit of the policy of New England which, whilst it has enriched that section, has impoverished all others in the country and blasted the American merchant marine In 1858, under a revenue tariff, the prosperity of our merchant marine was one of the proudest boasts of the American citizen. Over 73 per cent. of our exports and imports were carried in American vessels.

Since the Republican party came into power under the baleful influence of the protectionist of the East, they enacted our oppressive tariff system, and our shipping has gradually grown less and less, until last year less than 14 per cent. of our imports and exports were carried on American vessels. Our tariff system may have been a blessing to New England and Pennsylvania, but it has also been a blessing to Old England. It has made her the mistress of the seas. Our western port of San Francisco is in comparison with the distance to England at the door of China, and yet England monopolizes the trade with China. Out of the nearly three hundred millions of foreign commerce year before last with China we had but twenty millions of it. We are on the coast-line of southern countries, and yet out of about seven hundred millions of commerce there, England has three times as much of it as the United States.

Sir, but one thing is needed to enable us to take the scepter of the seas from England, to make our country the master of the trade of the world—it is to abolish the protective tariff and the substitution of a revenue tariff, with such incidental protection as it will justly afford.

I beg leave to quote the following from my remarks on this subject in my speech of May, 1884:

AGRICULTURE OUR DEPENDENCE FOR NATIONAL WEALTH.

We are now sending but very few manufactured articles abroad. If it were not for our farm products, which constitute 77 per cent. of our products, the balance of trade would be against us and we would soon become pauperized, notwithstanding we have every natural advantage for manufacturing over any nation on earth.

* * * * * * *

WHY ENGLAND OUTSTRIPS US IN TRADE.

We have all the raw materials in inexhaustible abundance within our own borders, the best and most intelligent workmen in the world in our midst, yet the little storm-beaten island of England, 3,000 miles away, has outstripped us in all the markets of the world in the sale of manufactured articles. She undersells us everywhere. She sends her ships to our ports. She buys cotton of our planters, transports it back to her shores, manufactures the raw material into articles of commerce, then comes right to our door and undersells us in Mexico, Central America, and South America; yea, even passes contemptuously beyond us to the other great ocean and wrests from us the trade of the Pacific. Why is it so? Is it because the Englishman is more enterprising or energetic than the American? All the world knows that is not true. It is because she has established friendly commercial relations with the world; she has cast down all her barriers of protection and opened her market to the products of every country.

REMEDY FOR OVERPRODUCTION—MARKET FOR OUR PRODUCTS.

Seeing the stagnation in our own trade and the danger of overproduction upon us, I turned my thoughts as a legislator some time ago to the question of devising a policy for extending our markets abroad. My attention was directed, of course, to the rich countries that lie south of us, Mexico, Central America, and South America. It seemed to me that with such an advantage of position and juxtaposition we could control that grand market.

We have now one railroad in operation and are building other lines which will penetrate to the very heart of the ancient dominion of the Montezumas. The Boston merchant may ship his goods by rail without breaking bulk to the City of Mexico, exchange them if he will for the rich products of that land which are so much needed in this country; whereas the English merchant must brave the perils of the sea for 3,000 miles, then reship his goods by rail at Vera Cruz. Our communication with Central and South America is not as close and easy as that with Mexico, but it is still far better than the communication with Europe.

The similarity of our political institutions naturally produces a greater desire on the part of those countries for trade with us than with the monarchies of the Old World. The products of the southern countries, in the main being different from our own, are just such as are needed by us, while our agricultural and mechanical products are equally as much needed by those countries. This makes it of mutual advantage for trade with us. Having the facility for supplying them with all they need, I have no doubt we ought to and can control that market to the exclusion of all other countries. An examination of the official statistics will show that the annual foreign commerce of these countries amounts in the aggregate of exports and imports to $653,701,000. They will further show that England imported into those countries $88,520,000; France imported $82,771,000, and that the share of the United States amounted to only $36,044,000; that even Germany's exports to those countries outstripped ours.

Now, why has England taken from us this trade which is within our reach? The answer is easy. It is because commerce with England is free, while that with the United States is shackled and hampered by our accursed tariff system.

AMERICAN CUSTOMS UNION.

In order that we might reform this blight on our commerce and secure that market for the surplus of our own workshops and farms I introduced in January last a joint resolution of which the following is a copy:

"Whereas the establishment of free commercial intercourse among the nations now existing upon the continent of America will promote the friendly political relations, internal commerce and industry, and secure a more extensive market for the surplus products of each of said nations: Therefore,

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to invite the co-operation of the governments of the American nations in securing the establishment of a commercial league by and between the said nations, to be known as the Customs Union of America, the arrangement of a common basis of import duties from other countries than those which may compose said league, and that the commercial intercourse among the people of all the American States may be freed from the payment of any customs or other dues whatever; and that a common system of weights and measures may be also established for the purpose of facilitating such intercourse."

It will be seen that this joint resolution looks to the establishment of a customs union with a common basis of duties as against all other countries and the establishment of free trade among the nations on this continent. Such a proposition is no doubt acceptable to protected manufacturers as well as to the advocates of free trade in this country, for while it establishes the same freedom of trade with these countries that now exists among our own States, great advantage would flow to our manufacturers in having an exclusive market protected against competition from all other countries. Our own manufacturers surely can have no fear of competition with manufacturers in the southern countries, for they have no manufacturing establishments of any consequence located there.

If that market could thus be secured then the danger of overproduction would pass away, and every mechanic and farm laborer who is idle to-day would find constant and remunerative employment. Thus would the marvelous resources of this continent be developed and the busy hum of prosperity be heard on every hilltop and in every valley of our land. This joint resolution, if adopted, would accomplish for the American nation what the customs union or Zollverein of Germany has accomplished for the prosperity and trade of the people of Germany.

I reintroduced the same proposition in the present Congress in the shape of a bill, with some elaboration and providing an appropriation of $100,000 to carry the same into effect, and I am happy to say it has been adopted with some modification by both Houses of Congress, and only waits the President's signature to make it a law. It will be a grand consummation if we shall witness, as we shall during the next year, a zollverein congress including representatives from all the republics of this continent and the Empire of Brazil, establishing free trade among the nations of the western hemisphere, and I shall be always gratified that I am the originator of this very important proposition.

Now, in conclusion, let me say the line of demarkation between the two great national parties is clearly defined in this bill. Those who are not in favor of the policy announced in the President's message are in danger of finding themselves in the camp of the enemy. It is the only vital political issue before the country, and, as I have shown, the President stands where Jefferson, Madison, Jackson, Polk, Douglas, and other great leaders of the Democratic party stood. He stands upon the principles announced in every national platform of the party. If there should be any one in our council who is inclined to disagree with us upon this issue, I commend to his consideration the patriotic course of George M. Dallas, then Vice-President, who was a Pennsylvanian. His State then, as now, regarded protection as of paramount importance to its local interests. But, sir, he was not a mere local politician, looking for a seat in Congress; he was a statesman of broad views; the range of his vision extended beyond State lines and embraced the whole country. When he found that the voice of the majority of his party was in favor of the Walker tariff bill of 1846, he surrendered his local prejudices and local considerations, and gave his vote to his party and his country. The bill for which he voted reduced the tariff rates to the basis of 22 per cent. By his act on that occasion he set an example worthy of imitation of all the Democrats similarly situated to-day, when we have a bill under consideration that does not bring the tariff down to a lower rate than 36 per cent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have seen that the sole issue presented by this bill is whether we shall reduce the taxes on the necessaries of life—on food, raiment, and shelter—or whether we shall make the reduction only upon whisky and tobacco. Whether we shall aid in giving more comfort, prosperity, and happiness to the poor man's home, or despoil it by increasing the temptation for drunkenness, poverty, and woe. On one side stands the Democratic party under the leadership of the President, all those who would avoid calamitous financial disaster by reduction of the surplus, and all who are opposed to monopolies and trusts and the greed of capital. On that side lies the interest of nineteen-twentieths of the laboring men of America. Humanity, justice, and common honesty are there.

On the other side of this great issue are arrayed the Republican party under the leadership of one who has been repudiated by the people at the polls. On that side will be found the great monopolies and trusts, who with their ill-gotten wealth will no doubt furnish large sums of money in order to perpetuate their grasps upon the earnings of the people. With them stand the lovers of free whisky.

On this great vital issue the Democratic party is content to go to the country and abide its fate at the polls. With such an invincible leader, with such a glorious cause, we can not fail. Every true Democrat will rally around the standard of his party; they will bury personal animosities, will form into line of battle, will face the enemies of the rights of the people, and will strike and spare not. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

[Extracts from speech delivered by R. W. TOWNSHEND on May 6, 1884.]

RECORD OF DEMOCRATIC PARTY ON TARIFF.

I will now present the record of the Democratic party on this great question as made by the declaration of its founders and the enunciation of its principles in its national and State platforms.

In the beginning of our Government when our fathers had just emerged from the despotism of England's rule, which prevented the establishment of manufactures in the colonies, a justification existed, if any could ever exist, for laying duties with a view to protection. We had then no manufacturing interest of consequence. The antipathies to England were very great, and, together with the great necessity of building up our home manufactories, which were in reality in their infancy, the fathers had strong temptation to advocate protection.

MADISON'S VIEWS.

But, sir, in the first Congress that assembled under the Constitution, in 1789, Mr. Madison, who has been quoted by some gentlemen as favoring the doctrine of protection, defined his position, which is decidedly antagonistic to every principle of the heresy of modern protection. It is as follows:

"In the first place, I own myself the friend to a very free system of commerce, and hold it as a truth that commercial shackles are generally unjust, oppressive, and impolitic. It is also a truth that if industry and labor are left to take their own course they will generally be directed to those objects which are the most productive, and this in a more certain and direct manner than the wisdom of the most enlightened legislature could point out. Nor do I think the national interest is more promoted by such restrictions than that the interest of individuals would be promoted by legislative interference directing the particular application of its industry.

"For example, we should find no advantage in saying that every man should be obliged to furnish himself, by his own labor, with those accommodations which depend on the mechanic arts, instead of employing his neighbor who could do it for him on better terms. It would be of no advantage to the shoemaker to make his own clothes to save the expense of the tailor's bill, nor of the tailor to make his own shoes to save the expense of procuring them from the shoemaker. It would be better policy to suffer each of them to employ his talents in his own way. The case is the same between the exercise of the arts and agriculture—between the city and the country, and between city and town—each capable of making particular articles in abundance to supply the other; thus all are benefited by exchange, and the less this exchange is cramped by Government the greater are the proportions of benefit to each. The same argument holds good between nation and nation, and between parts of the same nation."

Who can doubt if Madison was sitting with us to-day he would not denounce the present system of protection and vote to reduce our protective duties?

JEFFERSON'S VIEWS.

The farthest verge in the direction of protection to which Mr. Jefferson ever went, and this was in the infancy of our manufacturing industry, was when he said:

"Agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation are the most thriving when left most free to individual enterprise. Protection from casual embarrassments, however, may sometimes be reasonably interposed."

Jefferson wrote to Mr. Giles in 1825:

"Under the power to regulate commerce they"—

The Federalists—

"assume indefinitely that also over agriculture and manufactures, and call it regulation to take the earnings of one of these branches of industry, and that, too, the most depressed, and put them into the pockets of the other, the most flourishing of all."

JACKSON'S OPPOSITION TO PROTECION.

Now let us see how Andrew Jackson stood on this question. In his eighth message, at a time like the present when a large surplus existed in the Treasury, that apostle of Democracy declared:

"The influence of an accumulating surplus upon the legislation of the General Government and the States, its effects upon the credit system of the country, producing dangerous extensions and ruinous contractions, fluctuations in the price of property, rash speculations, idleness, extravagance, and a deterioration of morals, have taught us the important lesson that any transcient mischief which may attend the reduction of our revenue to the wants of the Government is to be borne in preference to an overflowing Treasury."

Again he said:

"The safest and simplest mode of obviating all the difficulties which have been mentioned is to collect only revenue enough to meet the wants of the Government, and let the people keep the balance of their property in their hands to be used for their own profit."

In his farewell address (1837) the Sage of the Hermitage, as his parting advice, said:

"The taxes which it"—

The United States—

"lays upon commerce—being concealed from the real payer in the price of the article, they do not so readily attract the attention of the people as smaller sums demanded from them directly by the tax-gatherer. But the tax imposed on goods enhances by so much the price of the commodity to the consumer, and as many of these duties are imposed on articles of necessity which are daily used by the great body of the people, the money raised by these imports is drawn from their pockets."

POLK OPPOSED TO PROTECTION.

Mr. Polk is sometimes charged with being a protectionist. Read his declarations and see how shamefully he has been slandered.

"[Polk's first annual message, December 2, 1845.]

"The attention of Congress is invited to the importance of making suitable modifications and reductions of the rates of duty imposed by our present tariff laws. The object of imposing duties on imports should be to raise revenue to pay the necessary expenses of Government. Congress may undoubtedly, in the exercise of a sound discretion, discriminate in arranging the rates of duty on different articles, but the discriminations should be within the revenue standard, and be made with the view to raise money for the support of Government."

PRESIDENT PIERCE OPPOSED TO PROTECTION.

I will now ask the attention of the House while I read an extract from President Pierce's annual message, December 4, 1854:

"I therefore renew my recommendation for a reduction of the duties on imports. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury presents a series of tables showing the operation of the revenue system for several successive years; and as the general principle of reduction of duties with a view to revenue and not protection may now be regarded as the settled policy of the country, I trust that little difficulty will be encountered in settling the details of a measure to that effect."

My time is too limited for further quotations from Democratic leaders. I will now invite your attention to the creed of the party, to its articles of faith as found in its national and State platforms.

DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL PLATFORMS ON THE TARIFF.

The first declaration of principles which can be called a platform for the party was that of a Congressional caucus, which was known as Republican at that day as distinguishing it from Federalist, adopted at Philadelphia, on which Jefferson was first elected to the Presidency. It declared for—

"6. Free commerce with all nations, political connection with none, and little or no diplomatic establishments."

The next Democratic platform was that of 1838, adopted by our first national convention for nominating candidates for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency. It was the platform on which Van Buren was elected. It declared—

"Hostility to any and all monopolies by legislation, because they are violations of the equal rights of the people.

"The true foundation of republican government is the equal rights of every citizen in his person and property and its management."

The next Democratic platform was that of 1840, adopted by the Presidential convention at Baltimore, which contains these resolutions:

"4. Resolved, That justice and sound policy forbid the Federal Government to foster one branch of industry to the detriment of another, or to cherish the interests of one portion to the injury of another portion of our common country.

"5. Resolved, That it is the duty of every branch of the Government to enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs, and that no more revenue ought to be raised than is required to defray the necessary expenses of the Government."

The Democratic convention of 1844 reaffirmed the fourth and fifth resolutions of the convention of 1840.

The Democratic national convention of 1848—

"Resolved, That the fruits of the great political triumph of 1844 have fulfilled the hopes of the Democracy of the Union in the noble impulse given to the cause of free trade by the repeal of the tariff of 1842 and the creation of the more equal, honest, and protective tariff of 1846, and that in our opinion it would be a fatal error to weaken the bands of a political organization by which these great reforms have been achieved and risk them in the hands of their known adversaries, with whatever delusive appeals they may solicit our surrender of that vigilance which is the only safegard of liberty."

The Democratic convention of 1852—

"Resolved, That it is the duty of every branch of the Government to enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs, and that no more revenue ought to be raised than is required to defray the necessary expenses of the Government and for the gradual but certain extinction of the public debt.

"Resolved, And to sustain and advance among them constitutional liberty by continuing to resist all monopolies and exclusive legislation for the benefit of the few at the expense of the many."

In 1856 the Democratic national convention—

"Resolved, That justice and sound policy forbid the Federal Government to foster one branch of industry to the detriment of another, or to cherish the interests of one portion of our common country."

It also repeated verbatim the first resolution quoted above of the convention of 1852, and then it—

"Resolved finally, The time has come for the people of the United States to declare themselves in favor of free seas and progressive free trade throughout the world."

In 1860 both the Douglas and Breckinridge platforms reaffimed the resolutions of 1856, quoted above.

In 1872 the Democratic convention (so called) at Baltimore—which was, in fact, a Greeley, and not a Democratic convention at all—did not adopt any Democratic resolutions, but indorsed the platform of the Liberal Republican convention held at Cincinnati, which contained the following curious declaration, making the tariff a "local issue:" * * * "We remit the discussion of the subject [protection and free trade] to the people in their Congressional districts and the decision of Congress thereon, wholly free from executive interference or dictation."

This is the only hiatus in the chain of assertions by the Democratic party of the doctrine of a tariff for revenue only. It resulted in the shameful defeat of a candidate supported by the party in defiance alike of principle and of policy.

In 1876 the Democratic convention spoke with no uncertain voice:

"We denounce the present tariff, levied upon nearly four thousand articles, as a masterpiece of injustice, inequality, and false pretense. It yields a dwindling not a yearly rising revenue. It has impoverished many industries to subsidize a few. It prohibits imports that might purchase the products of American labor. It has degraded American commerce from the first to an inferior rank on the high seas. It has cut down the sales of American manufactures at home and abroad and depleted the returns of American agriculture—an industry followed by half our people. It costs the people five times more than it produces to the Treasury, obstructs the processes of production, and wastes the fruits of labor. It promotes fraud, fosters smuggling, enriches dishonest officials, and bankrupts honest merchants. We demand that all custom-house taxation shall be only for revenue."

In the Democratic platform of 1880 the old doctrine was tersely reproclaimed.

"Home rule, honest money, consisting of gold, silver, and paper convertible on demand; the strict maintenance of the public faith, State and national, and a tariff for revenue only."

DEMOCRATIC STATE PLATFORMS.

Now read the platforms of the Democratic conventions in the States, and I call the special attention of certain Democrats in some of those States who have not only departed from the faith of the fathers on this great question but also from the authoritative declarations of the national Democratic conventions and of the conventions of their own States. We will begin with Maine.

Maine.—1869: "We reaffirm our adherence to the doctrine of free trade." 1870: "Free trade is the right of the people." 1875: Tariff for revenue.

New Hampshire.—1876: "We favor a tariff for revenue only." 1878: Simple revenue.

Vermont.—1876: "A tariff for the purpose of revenue only."

Massachusetts.—1870: "Except so far as the legitimate wants of the Government may require, free trade is the true policy of the country." 1871: "We demand a tariff for revenue only." 1877: St. Louis platform. 1884: Reaffirms Cincinnati platform 1880. * * * "Believing that the present enormous surplus in the national revenues is demoralizing and dangerous; that it should be cut down without further delay, not by increasing public expenditures, but by lessening the burden of taxation; that the burden should be removed from the necessaries of life and not from whisky and tobacco, and that the policy of taxing imports, not for the purpose of raising revenue but of obstructing trade, is unsound and must ultimately be abandoned."

Connecticut.—1870: "A tariff for purposes of revenue only." 1871: Denounces the Republican party "because it has failed to reform the abuses of the tariff, permitting still the principle of protection and favoritism to override the idea of revenue." 1874: Declared it was "opposed to unjust and unequal systems of taxation, which tend to favor one class at the expense of other classes of the people," * * * and to all monopolies, which operate to the benefit of privileged persons and classes. 1876: "The tariff law should be adjusted for the purpose of revenue only." 1884: Call for Democratic convention, issued by Connecticut State central committee, April 2, 1884, "who are opposed to the processes of ring combinations and the continuance of a war tariff in time of peace, by which the people are plundered, are cordially invited to act with the Democratic organization in the selection of delegates and the election to follow."

Rhode Island.—1876: "Tariff for revenue." 1878: Saint Louis platform of 1876.

New York.—1871: "Government should lay no tax on imports except for revenue purposes." 1874: "Federal taxation for revenue only." 1876: "We are in favor of a tariff for revenue only." 1877: "A tariff for revenue only." 1880: "A tariff for revenue only."

New Jersey.—1871: "Taxation upon luxuries and the abolishment of taxes upon the necessaries of life." 1875: "Tariff for revenue." 1876: "Tariff for revenue." 1877: Saint Louis platform of 1876.

Delaware.—1876: "Tariff to raise revenue and not to favor special classes."

Maryland.—1873: "Revenue alone." 1875: "Only a sufficient revenue for general uses." 1877: Saint Louis platform of 1876.

South Carolina.—1876: Saint Louis platform of 1876.

West Virginia.—1880: Indorsed Cincinnati platform of 1880.

Ohio.—1869: "A tariff based upon revenue principles alone, upon the closest possible approximation to free trade." 1870: "No candidate for Congress nor for any other office is worthy of support who is not in favor of a low revenue tariff which closely approximates to free trade." 1871: "We are in favor of a strictly revenue tariff." 1875: "A tariff for the sole purpose of raising revenue." 1876: "We are in favor of a tariff for revenue only." 1877: "A tariff for revenue only."

Indiana.—1870: "We are in favor of a tariff for revenue only."

Illinois.—1871: "Taxes should be levied solely for the support of Government." 1878: "Revenue only." 1880: "No tariff for protection."

Michigan.—1874: "We demand a tariff for revenue only." 1882: "Aggressive revenue reform in the direction of free trade."

Iowa.—1877: "A tariff for revenue only." 1878: "A tariff for revenue only." 1883: "A tariff for revenue only." 1884: St. Louis platform of 1876 and Cincinnati platform of 1880.

Minnesota.—1874: "A tariff for revenue only." 1876: "A tariff for revenue only." 1883: "Revenue only."

Wisconsin.—1871: "A tariff for revenue only." 1876: "A tariff for revenue only."

Kansas.—1878: "A tariff for revenue only."

Nebraska.—1874: "A tariff for revenue only." 1878: "Perfect commercial freedom, wherein we may sell where we can sell the highest and buy where we can buy the lowest."

Nevada.—1878: "A tariff for revenue only."

Oregon.—1872: "We are in favor of a tariff to raise money only for the necessary expenses of the Federal Government." 1882: "A strict revenue standard."

California.—1876: "A tariff for revenue only."

Colorado.—1878: "Opposition to all monopolies and class legislation."

Missouri.—1874: "A tariff for revenue only." 1878: "A tariff for revenue only."

Kentucky.—1876: "A tariff for revenue only."

Louisiana.—1876: St. Louis platform of 1876.

Arkansas.—1878: "Revenue alone."

Alabama.—1880: Denounces a protective tariff. Favors a "simple revenue tariff."

Tennessee.—1870: "No candidate is worthy of support who is not in favor of a low revenue tariff which closely approximates free trade." 1874: "Solely with a view to collection of the necessary revenue."

Texas.—1882: "A tariff for revenue only."

The following proceedings occurred during Mr. TOWNSHEND'S speech:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has expired.

Mr. McKINLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] be allowed to conclude his question.

Mr. HOOKER. And that the gentleman from Illinois on this side [Mr. TOWNSHEND] be allowed time to reply.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McKINLEY]?

Mr. McKINLEY. That the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] be allowed to conclude his question, and that his colleague [Mr. TOWNSHEND] be allowed ample opportunity to reply.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I beg my friend from Ohio to remember that I yielded to the interruptions of my friend from Pennsylvania with the understanding that my time should be extended. As a considerable part of my hour has been occupied by these interruptions, I now ask that my time be extended until I finish the discussion of other points I desired to present.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I will yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN], who is next to be recognized, states that he will yield five minutes of his time to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Five minutes, Mr. Chairman!

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. Is the gentleman from Maine to speak to-day?

The CHAIRMAN. He is next to be recognized.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. If he yields a portion of his time, I make no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine yields five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, Mr. Chairman, that is not fair to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Before I accept the courtesy of the gentleman from Maine, I desire to ask fair play of the House. I yielded to interruptions under a promise of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that my time should be extended. If I had anticipated that this courtesy would be denied me, I would not have consented to yield the length of time I have yielded to these different gentlemen to inject their speeches into mine.

Now, I say, sir, in view of the liberality we have heretofore extended to members on both sides of this House, I am entitled to just as much time as I have lost by the interruptions by gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. REED. Gentlemen on this side do not object, but the objection comes from the gentleman's own side.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It makes no difference from whom the objection comes. I yielded out of a spirit of courtesy to interruptions, and I am fairly entitled to as much time in addition to what has been allotted to me as was consumed by the interruptions.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman from Illinois be allowed to proceed with his remarks without limit as to time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McKINLEY].

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. I regret very much to object, but my friend from Illinois unnecessarily yielded to others, and in that way his time was consumed.

Mr. CANNON. I move that my colleague's time be extended for fifteen minutes.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. I object.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will I be permitted to occupy but two seconds of time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] has yielded ten minutes of his time to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I thank the gentleman from Maine for his courtesy; but I will occupy only two seconds of time in saying that no one shall hereafter speak longer than one hour during this debate, I do not care where the request comes from, and I do not care who has made the objection.

Mr. BAYNE. Our side does not object to the gentleman proceeding until his speech is concluded.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. That is not fair on the part of my colleague.

Mr. HOOKER. I do not care whether it is fair or not; I shall object.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not care whether the objection came from this side of the House or not, I shall hereafter object to all extensions of time, and I will adhere to it.

Mr. SPINOLA. The gentleman from Illinois ought to be permitted to conclude his speech. It is only fair to him that it should be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], who is to speak to-day, and is entitled to the floor during the afternoon, asks by unanimous consent to yield fifteen minutes of his time to the gentleman from Illinois. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Now will my friend permit me?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have but fifteen minutes and shall need it all.

Mr. CANNON. I think it is only just you should give me a minute after what you have said.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have said that I imputed no improper personal motive to any gentleman on that side, but that on the contrary it was a misapprehension of duty rather than a refusal to perform what they conceived to be their duty.

Mr. CANNON. Then the whole thing is a mere difference of opinion, according to the gentleman——

Mr. MCKINLEY. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will now withdraw his remark that he would object to everybody asking for an extension of time hereafter.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will accept the kindness extended to me by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] with thanks, and will withdraw the remark I made about objecting hereafter to extension of time to others.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] will proceed in the fifteen minutes yielded to him by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Has not a member entitled to an hour the right to yield any portion of that hour if he pleases without asking unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. He has the right to yield when he has been recognized, but not before. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN], who is entitled to the floor next, has the right to yield, as time is an important element in the matter.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Before proceeding with my remarks I desire to yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I only want to say that when I meet my colleague [Mr. TOWNSHEND] personally, man to man, he and I get along very well together. When I listen to him in his speeches on this floor, however, and sometimes interrupt him in the House, it occurs to me his habit and his highest ambition is not to discuss a question upon the broad ground of principle and public policy, but to delve back into the past and try to establish his cause by showing that somebody who disagrees with him now agreed with his views at some former time. Why, Mr. Chairman, Saul of Tarsus was a Jew, brought up at the feet of Gammaliel; but he was stricken down and became a Christian.

Now, even John C. Calhoun, the great apostle of the gentleman's views, in early life and in the American Congress, was an avowed protectionist, but afterwards a free-trader, because he thought he foresaw that it was necessary if he would champion and maintain the cause of slave labor in his section that he should be in favor of that policy. But that proves nothing. It is no argument to apply here. A child or a youth, a boy in his early manhood, a college-bred young man, may easily believe one thing, but from the broad standpoint of experience may believe and recognize another which is antagonistic to the first.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, to live long enough, respecting my friend as I do, to serve long enough in this or some other Congress with him——

Mr. PERKINS. How long will that be?

Mr. CANNON (continuing). To see him wake up and discuss these questions upon the broad ground of principle, as he is so competent to do——

A MEMBER. Is that a joke?

Mr. CANNON. If he could only get his mind out of the rut of denunciation, which means nothing. I say I hope to live long enough to see this change.

Mr. STEELE. How long do you hope to live? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. REED. Oh, that is only Illinois politeness. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Now, right upon that point, and I believe I have a little of my time remaining——

Mr. MILLIKEN. I will yield you more time. I would rather you should make my speech than make it myself.

Mr. CANNON. I will not take more than a minute.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Go on.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman said I misrepresented my constituents, my farming constituency, in the interest of Massachusetts and the bloated bondholders and manufacturers of the East. Let us see what there is in the gentleman's statement.

Sir, Illinois to-day, born to the Union in 1818, has more wealth and property than Massachusetts has at the close of her more than two hundred and fiftieth anniversary. Illinois to-day, with her magnificent, progressive Chicago and her hundred growing young cities, springing like giants into prosperity and population, is of equal importance or greater importance in its manufacturing interests than Massachusetts. And some of these days the Rip Van Winkle sleep that overspreads the business interests of the district which my friend now represents in Southern Illinois will be broken, and the sound of the hammer and the hum of the spindle will be heard, to the joy of his farmer constituents, and then I know the gentleman will be converted. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to inflict myself upon the House during the entire hour granted to me under the rule, because I find my voice in such condition that I doubt my ability to do so even had I the inclination. I purpose to give a portion of my time to my old friend from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], who represents a district filled with industries, where both natives and foreigners are at work, both classes living side by side in comfort and prosperity under the present tariff, none of whom who have come to that district from foreign communities being now desirious of leaving it and going back to better their condition, as we must suppose would be the case were there any soundness in the arguments of gentlemen upon the other side.

Now, my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] who has just taken his seat, seemed to be greatly troubled about a leader who he said had been repudiated by the people. It is very wonderful that a gentleman in a foreign land, troubling nobody, pursuing his own business, taking no part in American politics except to be interested, as every patriotic American should be, in the magnificent progress of our country, should be such a source of anxiety as he seems to be to some of our friends on the other side of the House.

He says he was repudiated by the people, but the statement is not true. He was repudiated by certain Democratic methods which prevented, in certain sections of this country, the people from speaking their voice through their ballots and having those ballots returned truly and counted in the election. And I say to the gentleman to-day neither he nor his party dare to accept the honest verdict of the people of this country. Ay, if he knew that the honest verdict throughout the land was to be accepted he would have no more hope of the election of his candidate than he would hope to climb to the heavens on a rainbow, or to go to heaven himself, holding the political tenets he holds to-day. [Laughter.] Intimidating voters, committing frauds at the ballot-boxes, making false counts and false returns, and resorting to every kind of iniquity to put their candidates into office has become as much a part of the methods of the Democracy as holding conventions and voting at the polls. Many of their brightest lights and most effective workers are in penitentiaries for their assaults upon the franchise, but altogether too many of them are still running at large.

So much in reply to the gentleman; and now I will turn to the subject before the House.

During the debate upon this question most everything has been discussed that has entered into the imagination of man. Gentlemen on the other side of the House have talked of the crushing weight of Federal taxation, as if some taxation were not absolutely necessary to sustain the Government; as if they expect to run the Government without it, and relieve the people of that burden. Of course they expect nothing of the kind.

They have declaimed against the maintenance of a surplus, which has accumulated during a Democratic administration, and harangue like men denouncing to the people somebody who designs to rob them.

Now this is all absurd nonsense, or something worse. No member of this House is so stupid or bigoted, I believe, as to think that any party or person desires to make the necessary evil of taxation more than necessarily burdensome, and I know no one who does not agree that the surplus should be disposed of by a reduction of the revenues of the Government.

HOW SHALL THE REVENUES BE REDUCED?

But how shall the revenue be reduced is the question? It does not follow that I am opposed to the reduction of the revenue of the Government and distributing the surplus among the people because I do not favor the Mills bill.

I may think I have proposed a better method of doing it. Indeed, I think I have in a bill which I introduced early in this session of Congress, and which has been smothered in the Committee on Ways and Means, the Democratic majority of which brought forth, after much secret labor, the Mills bill now before us. There are two ways of reducing the public revenue. One is to so do it as not to disturb the business nor injure the industries of the country. The other is to make the new tariff bill an instrument for the destruction of property and a disaster to American workingmen. Mr. MILLS and a great majority of his party in this House have chosen the latter method. In this I can not stand with him.

A FRIEND TO EVERY LEGITIMATE INDUSTRY.

I am a friend to every legitimate industry in this country, wherever located. I would no more ruin by vicious and partial legislation the rice-grower of South Carolina than the lumberman of Maine. Both should be tendered the friendly hand and neither receive a smiting blow from the General Government. And I would give aid, strength, and dignity to labor in Texas as readily as in New England. I would help it in both and injure it in neither. Legislation inimical to industrial investments and labor in America is not necessary to effect a reduction of our revenues, nor for any other commendable purpose.

THE MILLS BILL WORSE THAN THE TWO MORRISON BILLS.

But the Mills bill, worse than its two predecessors in the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses, is formed upon a different theory. The two Morrison bills were fair in one respect at least, that they reduced the duties in all parts of the country alike. They surrendered the profits of our industries and the wages of our workmen to the foreigner, as this bill does, but they treated all to the same dose of poison.

The Mills bill, however, seeks to reduce our revenues not only by surrendering the vantage ground which Americans occupy in the fields of labor and industry, but it selects certain sections of the country for particularly severe punishment.

HOW THE MILLS BILL AFFECTS MAINE.

Look at my own State, Maine, for instance. That is neither a Democratic nor a doubtful State; and the Mills bill aims a fatal blow at almost all its great industries. Maine has $10,000,000 invested in lumber. In its forests, on its rivers, in its mills, and upon its vessels, carrying its lumber to the markets of the world, thousands of its people are employed, and immense sums are paid for labor. Yet the Mills bill would consign this industry to New Brunswick. Our great stone industry, nearly as large, capable of indefinite expansion—for the raw material is exhaustless—an industry in the cost of whose products 95 per cent. is for labor, it relegates to the same foreign province.

It coolly directs our wool-growers to slaughter their flocks and go out of business, and let those parts of their land which is adapted to nothing but sheep grazing lie idle. It informs our starch-makers, our cattle-raisers, our growers of potatoes and vegetables that they must sell their products as cheaply as their poorly paid Canadian neighbors, who live with small comforts and no luxuries, or be driven out of the markets of their own country. And the Democratic party which, under the inspiration of the Cobden Club, the Parsee merchant, and British influences, has labored and brought forth this bill, have taken measures to bind us in truculent, unjust, and dishonorable bonds to Canada unless we shall place fish on the free-list; and the same British-American combination are endeavoring to repeal the wise laws enacted by our forefathers, which protect the last vestige of our ship-yards and make it possible to create an American marine and provide sailors to man an American navy.

Now what do you gentlemen leave to Maine after making sure the destruction of her lumber, stone, wool, potatoes, and starch industries; her fisheries and her ship-yards?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. We have left you your potatoes. We have not put them on the free-list.

Mr. MILLIKEN. You have put "vegetables" on the free-list, and the dictionary defines the potato as a vegetable.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Oh, you have been looking up definitions.

Mr. MILLIKEN. And I don't believe you would have left us our potatoes if Massachusetts had not wanted to get them.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. No doubt we are glad to have free trade with Maine, it being largely to our advantage; but your Republican colleague [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] proposes to have free trade with Canada.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Well, I do not agree with Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I have always known, though, that it was to the advantage of Massachusetts that she has had free relations with Maine.

Mr. JACKSON. This bill gives the Canadians free trade with us, but we must pay to get into Canada.

Mr. MILLIKEN. It gives most everybody free trade with us. Now, Mr. Chairman, I repeat the question: What does this bill leave Maine? You answer: Her manufactories, do you? No; you so curtail the duties upon such goods as they produce that her mills will have to stop, her workshops will be shut, and her immense water-power already occupied will run to waste and the enterprises now seeking to further utilize it will be arrested.

WHAT ADVANTAGES ARE TO BE REAPED BY SACRIFICING OUR INDUSTRIES?

And what advantages are to be reaped for the sacrifice of these great industries not only in Maine but in all the northern tier of States? Shall we get cheaper lumber, or wool, or fish, or ships? Do not gentlemen realize that when we shall have destroyed our own industries, besides the effect upon the market of taking out of it our immense products, the foreigner will enter it, having a monopoly of it? Will he then sell to us cheaper than our own people competing with him and competing with each other sell to us now? No; he will do as he has always done under similar circumstances. He will charge us all he can get, not what he can afford to sell for, and the house-builder, the ship-buyer, and the consumer of our wool and starch will each send his money out of the country and pay a higher price for these articles than he now pays to his own countrymen who produce them from our own raw material and by the labor of our own workmen.

THE MILLS BILL ATTACKS NORTHERN AND REPUBLICAN INDUSTRIES.

But why does this wonderful child of foreign and native parentage, the Mills bill, attack so savagely these particular industries? Why does it leave rice to pay 113 per cent. duty and sugar more than 75 per cent.? Do our people need sugar and rice less than they need monumental stone, wood-pulp, and fish? Why are the latter, which pay very low duties, put on the free-list, and the former left protected by almost the highest duties in the schedule?

Indeed, the committee have gone so far as to repudiate their free raw material professions by leaving coal and iron ore well protected. Why have they done this? Sugar is a product of Louisiana and Texas, rice of South Carolina and Georgia, and the bituminous coal fields and iron mines of West Virginia, Alabama, and other Southern States, scarcely opened, are, in the committee's view, sadly in need of protection to insure their development. The anthracite coal of Pennsylvania is already on the free-list.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I hope my friend from Maine will allow me to say that my heart has been greatly cheered this morning by the explanation of the "father of the House," the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], that under the Mills bill coal and iron ore are both put on the free-list, and I object to the gentleman from Maine taking the words out of the mouth of the man who gives tone to the tariff discussion on his side of the House.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I desire to say to my friend from Massachusetts that I was not here when the "father of the House" made that statement, so that, as between him and me, my statement is original. But I am greatly gratified to know that the heart of my friend from Massachusetts is cheered.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not know which "father of the House" the gentleman from Massachusetts refers to; but one of the fathers of this bill, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], assured the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL] that neither iron nor coal were placed by it on the free-list, on which assurance the gentleman from Virginia said he was in favor of the bill.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I rely upon the "father of the House" on this side [referring to the Republican side, on which Mr. RUSSELL was sitting]. He has explained the matter thoroughly this morning; and I have been much comforted thereby. I trust the bill will pass without any further amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. I desire to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I am not the descendant in the most remote degree of the father or the grandfather of this House, and that I do not accept any responsibility for what the "father of this House" says. Perhaps I do not know to whom the gentleman from Massachusetts refers; but I know I have no paternity within these walls.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I refer to the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], who occupied the floor here during the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND].

Mr. REED. And the only one who did occupy it during that proceeding. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. I was not present to hear the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and therefore can not discuss it with the gentleman from Massachusetts, for before expressing an opinion upon it I should prefer to hear it from the gentleman himself rather than accept the gentleman's version of it, however honestly rendered.

THE BILL SECTIONAL AND POLITICAL.

The bill is sectional and political. It was not framed to reduce the surplus and equalize the duties upon imports, nor as a just measure of relief to the people, but to favor Democratic States and make votes in doubtful districts; and that is the reason why, when examined as a measure of revenue reform, it appears to be so complete a monstrosity.

FREE RAW MATERIAL.

But the proposition of free raw material which the President makes, which is in every Democratic speech made in this House, and which is a continual song in the mouth of the free-trader, is about as absurd as any part of the free-trade argument. What is raw material? Nothing that has been made valuable by human labor; nothing that has been wrought or developed by the skill or muscle of man. But free-traders make their classification to suit themselves. Some place raw material at one stage of manufacture and some at another, and when an article has been wrought to the condition next to the last degree of perfection, so that they would not protect any workman except him whose labor has been applied to the last process of production, most of our free-traders cease to call it raw material.

It requires the wool-grower, the carder, the weaver, the spinner, the transporter, and the tailor to make a suit of clothes. When the suit is finished the free-trader talks of wool as the raw material in it; and yet in its production no one has done more work than the wool-grower. Why should not he, as well as his colaborers in producing that suit of clothes, be protected?

The construction of a building requires the work of the brickmaker, the bricklayer, the lime-quarryman, the lime-burner, the lime-cask maker, the transporter, the mortar-maker and hod-carrier, the lumberman, and mechanic. Our free-trade Democratic friends call bricks and lime the raw material; and yet while 90 per cent. of the cost of the building is for labor, more than 95 per cent. of the cost of bricks and lime is in the labor which has brought them out from the clay-bank and the quarry.

And why should not they who did the first work in the constructing of this building be as well protected as he who did the last work, or the work at any intervening stage of its construction? This free-raw-material proposition of the free-trader is a deceptive one. It is an attack upon protection which gentlemen on the other side think will be the more effective because it is plausible and taking. There is no really raw material upon which any duty exists.

I desire to append here the following speech and resolutions of Hon. A. S. Hewitt, now Democratic mayor of New York City, made at a workingman's meeting some time ago:

[Extract from Mr. Hewitt's speech.]

Protection to American manufacturers, but protection to labor and laborers. The value of every manufacture is made up entirely of the wages paid to produce it. Coal and iron in the mines cost nothing. They are the free gift of God. But they are excavated by the pick and shovel of the workman; by him they are wheeled, carted, boated to market; by the workman they are carried to the mill; by the workman the furnace is heated and charged; by him the iron is puddled, rolled, put up for market, carried thither, and sold. It is labor, labor, labor that constitutes every addition to the value of the article, and it is the man who bestows that labor who should enjoy all the fruits thereof. It should not be divided, as in Europe, and the great part given to a king or a lord, but the whole of it belongs to and should be enjoyed by the men who make it.

Mr. Hewitt continued that he was not a Whig, but a Democrat; still he went for protection now, and should support General Taylor because he would sign a bill to protect American labor. He did not ask for any unreasonable duty. He only asked for a duty equal to the difference between American labor and English labor, so that American rolling-mills might employ their workmen at American wages instead of stopping work.

The following is from the series of resolutions which Mr. Hewitt offered:

"Resolved, That this meeting, composed of men who depend for their livelihood upon the labor of their own hands, hold the following facts and principles to be undeniably true, namely:

"That natural wealth is the fruit of individual labor.

"That, therefore, is the best government and the best policy which secures to the hand that earns it the largest possible return for its labor.

"That the superiority of free institutions and economical government is proved by the fact that in the United States the average wages of labor are from three to four times as large as under the monarchical governments of Europe.

"That while foreign labor is paid at this price it would be worse than insanity to adopt any policy by which the wages of our own labor should be reduced to the same level, because it would be throwing away all the advantages secured to us by a free and economical government.

"That if the whole productive industry of the country were employed in producing the articles which we sell abroad, which are mainly breadstuffs and provisions, cotton, rice, and tobacco, we should produce a much larger quantity than we could sell; foreign markets would soon be glutted with these articles; the price of them would fall; the labor that produced them would, as a matter of course, receive less remuneration than it now does; the only stopping point in the decline of wages would be the starving point, and the inevitable result would be that we should be forced to give equal labor for equal labor, instead of one day's labor for four, as we have been doing for many years.

"That, therefore, if we would keep up the price of labor we can not employ the whole productive labor of the country in raising such articles as we export; and the farmers, of all men in the community, are most interested in employing in some other way that amount of labor which, if devoted to agriculture, would produce a glut and a consequent fall in prices in the foreign markets; and that the only way in which such surplus labor can be employed is in producing certain manufactured articles, which can be bought cheaper in foreign countries, not because it takes less labor there to produce them, but because that labor is paid at a less price.

"That hence arises the necessity for a tariff which, properly devised, is merely a system whereby the price of labor, which naturally results under a free and economical government, is prevented from being reduced to the pauper level of labor which just as naturally results under governments where the first fruits of labor, instead of being secured to the hand that earns them, are filched away in order to maintain the costly splendor of thrones and the idle extravagance of an enervated aristocracy.

"That as the tariff should be designed to guard the interests of labor, no matter how employed, but most immediately the farmers' interests, justice to the whole community requires that duties should be imposed only upon such articles as can be produced here with the same amount of human labor as in foreign countries; in other words, upon such articles for the production of which our natural advantages are at least equal to those possessed by foreign nations.

"That the amount of duty imposed upon such articles should be the exact difference between the amount of the wages of labor paid for their production here and the amount required for their production abroad. That the operation of a tariff which does not impose sufficient duty to cover this difference in the price of labor must necessarily reduce the price of such labor, or force it into agricultural pursuits, whereby those who are consumers of breadstuffs become producers, resulting speedily in the accumulation of a large surplus and a consequent fall in prices; in other words, a fall in the price of the labor which produces them, and in the average wages throughout the country in every department of industry."

Mr. Speaker, I commend this speech and resolutions, from so high Democratic authority as Mr. Hewitt, to the thoughtful and prayerful consideration of the free-trade Democracy to-day.

THE PRINCIPAL ATTACK OF THE DEMOCRACY IS UPON WOOL.

But why the wolfish craving to get at the throat of the American sheep which appears in the Mills bill? Why are all the Democratic dogs set upon him? Why the desire to destroy him? He certainly has been regarded as an inoffensive, non-combative creature; and yet our free-trade friends appear to think him worthy of their steel. What has he done to so call down their vindictive wrath upon him?

Let us see what he has done. His numbers have increased until in 1883 50,000,000 of sheep could be counted in our American flocks. He has improved in quality until now he furnishes fine food for the people and the finest fleeces upon the globe, amounting to 350,000,000 of pounds annually, and worth more than $75,000,000. The American sheep sold for mutton amount each year to nearly 15,000,000, for which the farmer and sheep-raiser receive more than $30,000,000. There are 700,000 people engaged in wool-growing. They employ 500,000 people in that industry. These men and their families, who depend upon sheep-raising for their living, number at least 4,000,000 persons; and the sheep are often pastured upon poor, rough, and hilly lands, which is fit for nothing else, and they do more to restore to fertility old and worn-out lands than any other domestic animals.

In 1883 the duty on wool was reduced, and the result was the loss of 6,000,000 of sheep from our American flocks. Now the plan of the Mills bill is to entirely repeal the duty of from 10 to 12 cents per pound on wool. Will that not entirely destroy American sheep-raising? And for whose benefit? The farmer? No; he wishes to continue to produce wool and mutton at a fair profit. The people? No; they want the wool to wear and the mutton to eat. Who, then? Why, the foreign sheep-raiser in South America and English colonies, who will rush his cheap wool into our markets until he has caused the slaughter of our flocks, and then, having stopped this great annual American supply of 350,000,000 pounds of wool and 15,000,000 of sheep, and having complete control of our markets, he will make us pay more for wool and mutton than we pay now. So we shall have destroyed a great industry of immense benefit to our people, driven 1,200,000 people out of employment to crowd other avocations, only to pay higher prices for our blankets and clothing.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Do I understand the gentleman to say that there are 1,200,000 people supported by wool-growing in this country?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I mean to say there are 700,000 wool-growers and that they employ 500,000 men.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I understood the gentleman to say that there were something like 1,200,000 people supported by this industry.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Well, 7 and 5 make 12—at least in the arithmetic of protectionists, perhaps not in the arithmetic of free trade.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I wish to remind the gentleman that the whole product of wool in this country is only a little more than $70,000,000; so that these persons supported by wool-growing would need a much higher rate of protection in order to enable them to live. The gentleman's calculation would allow them something like $70 a year each.

Mr. MILLIKEN. We believe they do need a higher rate of protection. We believe that the reduction made in 1883 in the rate of duty upon wool was wrong; we desire to put the duty back where it was.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. One of the glaring absurdities of the wool argument on the gentleman's side of the House is the assumption that 2,000,000 or more of people are making a living upon $70,000,000 of product, which would give them about $35 or $40 a year each to live upon.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But the wool product is double what the gentleman says it is.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. How many sheep are there in the country?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am speaking of the amount in dollars and cents; your statement gives only about one-half of the real amount.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. It has been stated that there are 44,000,000 sheep in this country; and does the gentleman mean to say that the wool product is at the rate of $2 per sheep?

Mr. GROSVENOR. More than that.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Well, I have sheep and I do not find the wool product to be at any such rate.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Your sheep, I presume, are a poor breed.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I have simply to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that his statements are incorrect; and besides, in other parts of the country people live more cheaply than they do in the sublimated parts of the State of Massachusetts, such as the gentleman inhabits.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. If they live on $35 a year each, I pity them.

Mr. MILLIKEN. They do nothing of the kind. The wool product, as I have already stated, is $75,000,000, while the product of sheep sold is annually $30,000,000. Besides, many of them are farmers and engaged in other avocations.

Now what avocations need or desire these one million two hundred thousand men. Does the farmer who complains of low prices for his products, the coal and iron miner who says his ranks are crowded, and that he gets poor wages and can not work on full time, the workers in factories and shops, at the forges, and on railroads—do these or men of any other employment wish this accretion to their numbers and the consequent lower prices for wages which would surely follow?

PROTECTED INDUSTRIES.

Gentlemen talk of the protected industries, and the President says that but 2½ millions of our seventeen millions of laborers enjoy the fruits of protection; that is, they are engaged in protected industries. What a narrow and absurd view of the subject. The protection and maintenance of one industry helps all other industries. It not only increases the market for their products, but every avocation discontinued must send out its employés to compete with workingmen in other avocations, or into idleness and poverty. Hence every industry is interested that every other industry should live and flourish.

Mr. DIBBLE. Will the gentleman permit a question? Does he not know that the President in his message says also that, though there is only a small proportion of the labor of the country employed in protected industries, that portion is entitled to protection as much as if it embraced every laborer?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I agree with the President upon that; and if he were as sound on everything else he would be a good Republican.

Why, suppose our manufacturing should cease to exist, as the Mills bill provides, where would the millions of men employed in it go? Some other avocations would have to be crowded with them or support them in the poor-houses of the country. And yet this debate has developed the fact that our manufactories are the chief objects of attack in this bill. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] arraigned the six New England States and New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey for having advanced under protection beyond the other States.

If this be true, it has come from the fact that these nine States have availed themselves of the advantage which a protective revenue system has given to the whole country alike; that they have used their advantages like good and faithful servants, while the complaining States have, like the sluggish servant, hidden their talents, that is, their opportunities, in the ground; and it is equally true that these American manufactories have furnished to our people goods at a price 30 per cent. lower than they formerly got them from foreign manufactories. A denial of this, and the claim that these American manufactories have flourished by making goods cost more to the consumer than was paid to English manufacturers during the days of low duties, is a denial of the patent facts of history; but our Democratic friends say they have unduly prospered under protection, and the system must, therefore, be abolished.

THE FREE-TRADE DEMOCRACY SAY NEW ENGLAND IS GETTING TOO RICH.

Yes, they say we are getting too rich, and that our manufactures are giving too good markets to our farmers, who are getting too profitable returns for their products; that our farm lands are becoming too valuable; that our workingmen are receiving too great wages; that our manufactories are building up too many beautiful and thrifty towns; too many comfortable and cozy homes; erecting too many public schoolhouses for poor and rich alike; affording too many opportunities for industrious hands and busy brains to convert the fertility of our soil, the power of our rivers, the treasures of our forests, and all our manifold resources into that which gives comfort and joy to mankind; and that all this thrift and happiness must be blasted by the smiting hand of free trade because, forsooth, the laggard, the slumberer, and the scoffer have not entered into their enjoyment.

What an indictment against protection to say that it has given so great thrift and conferred so many blessings upon the States which have made use of its advantages; and what a reason for introducing that policy of free trade which would stop our mills, close our factories, drive our fishermen from the ocean, and paralyze all our industries.

Oh, yes; you proclaim that you would rob New England of her prosperity; that the Mills bill is designed for that, because you say the hands of her busy toilers under the benign shield of protection have made her streams to hum with turning spindles, her quarries to resound with thousands of workmen's hammers, and flocks and herds to fatten upon her hillsides.

Would you not be more patriotic and humane should you decide to avail yourselves of the same advantages which are offered to you as to us and build up industries and gather wealth thereby, and so raise yourselves to our level of prosperity, rather than attempt, as you do in this bill, to transport our advantages across the waters to the foreigner and let him fatten by reducing us to your own professedly poor condition? Your policy is even worse than that of the dog in the manger; for he sought to drive the cattle from the food he could not eat, while you envy us the advantages which are held out to you as well as to us, and which you may use, but will not make the exertion to do so.

But you are going to have them. They will be forced upon you. This un-American, pro-British bill will not become a law. There is too much patriotism in Congress and among the people to so disgracefully and stupidly surrender our birthright to the emissaries of foreign powers. The rich resources of the South are beginning to be known; and assured and stimulated by protection, she will soon see hives of industry all about within her borders, and the miner and the farmer, and the lumberman, will anathematize him who does not support the American rather than the British revenue system in America.

She will soon realize that "it is a condition and not a theory that confronts her," and she will throw overboard her old free-trade theory to adequately meet her condition.

THE ADVANTAGES OF PROTECTION GO TO LABOR.

But some of our friends on the other side reiterate the stale old cry that the advantages of protection go to the manufacturer and not to the employé. Do these gentlemen know how many employés have become employers? But the savings-banks in the manufacturing States, with their enormous deposits and many depositors, make answer to the statement. And, moreover, the fact that so many people from the Old World come to these nine manufacturing States to find employment, while none go back to better their condition, shows where the workingman finds his best chance in the world.

LABOR STRIKES.

Oh, but you have labor strikes in the nine manufacturing States, say our free-trade friends. Yes, and in some others. Why have not you had such strikes? Do you know? I will tell you. It is because your laborers have been so oppressed that they have not had the power and self-reliance to strike. They have not had among them sufficient money to sustain a strike. They suffer wrongs that the Northern laboring men would not endure for a month. They are peaceable laborers; peaceable as dead men. They do not even protest against being robbed of the primary rights of an American citizen—the right under the Constitution to exercise the electoral franchise and receive the benefit of a fair result of their ballots.

More than forty members of Congress hold their seats against the wishes of a majority of voters in those several States and districts, because these peaceable laboring men are too much crowded down and crushed to claim and secure their rights guarantied to them in the organic law of their country. It requires some power, courage, and hope to strike for justice. Strikes prove always an unsatisfactory condition of affairs, but not the worst condition, nor even necessarily a worse condition than that next preceding it. Why have there not been so many strikes in the past? Why did they not occur during the dark oppressive ages of Europe? Why did not the slaves strike for freedom? Because the heel of oppression was too heavy, and the oppressed too weak to assert their rights. It is because the workingmen in our Northern States, nourished by protective laws, have become strong in intelligence and money to sustain themselves, and, as a consequence, in will and purpose, that they stand up, the unbent images of God, their faces as high as their employers', and demand their rights.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] says that it is not the laboring man but the protected industries which are being paralyzed by protection. And so it goes. Gentlemen have to administer all kinds of nostrums to their free-trade patient to keep him alive and give him character. The gentleman from Missouri, where the power of the labor organizations have been felt, affirms that protection enriches the manufacturer and gives nothing to labor; while the gentleman from Massachusetts, where great manufacturing establishments exist, declares that it is the protected industries that are paralyzed by being protected.

BOTH CAPITAL AND LABOR REQUIRE PROTECTION.

Now, the fact is that both capital and labor in America want that control of the American market which protection gives. They can not afford to share its profits with all the world, nor be entirely robbed of them by the free admission into this country of the products of poorly paid labor. Let them—I mean both the employer and the employé—have the benefit of this market, the best market on the globe; let its profits be assured to them and not given away to the foreigner, and they will settle between themselves what shall be the share of each. The first point to be gained—and protection alone can secure this—is to give them the shilling which the American market affords, rather than the sixpence which they will get if the products of cheap European labor come in freely to compete with them; and then they will take the shilling rather than the sixpence and make their own division of it.

LABOR WILL GET ITS SHARE UNDER PROTECTION.

And labor will not fail to get its share. As I have before intimated, the laboring organizations in America have become strong. Protection has given them the advantage to make them so, and they are all the time growing stronger. Capital and corporations may establish trusts and make their combinations, but for the first time in the world's history, and in our country, almost alone, labor is combining with the strength which comes with intelligence and thrift; and it will have, because it has the power to command it, a just portion of the combined profits of capital and labor. He who doubts this doubts the advancing intelligence of the people, and is blind to the signs of the times.

But if there are no profits the laborer's share, as well as that of the employer, will be nothing; or, if the profit be small and scant, as it is in those countries whose pauper-made goods our Democratic friends would admit freely to our market to compete with the products of our own labor, then the share of each must be scant and small as it is there. The free admission of the products of European labor to our markets will subject American workingmen to the same price for their toil as European laborers obtain. All must fare alike where all have equal admission to the same board, and equal prices for the toil of American and European workingmen must result in like conditions of life.

The comfortable homes of which so many of our workingmen may boast, the children at school instead of in the workshop, the decent clothing, the respectable position of their wives and families, and the manly independence and self-assertion of the American workingman can not exist with the scanty pittance which is paid to labor abroad. And worst of all would be the idleness and consequent poverty, misery, and crime which could not but follow the glutting of our markets with cheap foreign goods, and the consequent expulsion from them of American productions.

THE FARMER.

And where would this leave the farmer, him to whom, together with the laboring man, every demagogue appeals, in a way that is an insult to his intelligence? Now, I desire to promote by every rational and honest means the prosperity of the farmer and workingman. First, because I have been both, and know how to sympathize with them; and, secondly, because I regard the farmers as the great conservative element of our people, and because the workingman is he whose strong arms and sturdy will turn our crude resources into materials for the comfort and happiness of mankind. But the professional farmer and laborer, he who with hands as soft as a kitten's ear, never having done a day's manual labor in his life, and who knows not enough about farming to set a hen, who goes about giving us theories upon labor and shouting his love of the workingman and farmer from the house-top, is not a character that inspires my confidence or commands my respect.

OUR HOME MARKET.

The farmer wants the best market for his produce and the workingman wants the same for his toil. They have it now at home; but whatever gives away the American market to the foreigner, as free trade proposes to do, is inimical to both farmer and toiler, and to every producer of whatever pursuit in the land.

Yes, our home market is the best in the world; the best for the farmer, because he sells in it to those whose earnings enable them to pay him the most for his products; the best for the laborer, because he works for those whose profits enable them to pay him the most for his toil; the best for the manufacturer, because he therein sells his goods to a more thrifty nation of consumers than can anywhere else be found. This home market with all its unrivaled advantages the Democratic free-traders propose to open and share with all the producers upon the globe who choose to come to it to sell their pauper-made goods. And will they not come to it? Ay, they are looking through and over our fence of protection to it as eagerly as hungry flocks and herds ever looked from barren pasture lands into fields of rich blue-grass and clover.

The protectionists say that these rich fields are our own; that their fertile acres are for our own people, those who live under our flag, fight our battles, pay our taxes, develop our resources, enhance our industries, and contribute to the greatness and glory of our country. We say to the honest and industrious foreigner, "You may come in through the gate and enjoy with us, but you shall not reach over or through and gather our substance while you remain on the other side of the fence, and are neither with us nor of us nor for us."

The Democratic free-trader says, on the other hand, it costs something in the way of taxes to keep up this fence, and while we are all benefited by the enjoyment of our great advantages we are not all benefited alike. Some who are more industrious than others get more than an equal share of these blessings; therefore we will throw down the fence and let all the world reach in and despoil our fair fields of prosperity.

OUR CARRYING TRADE.

And gentlemen who have for years refused to vote even the smallest subsidies to our shipping have the temerity to say that protection has demolished our carrying trade. Somebody the other day quoted James Russell Lowell upon this subject. That gentleman is not good authority in New England. He began life pretty well, but, as George Francis Train once said of Lord Brougham, "He has been a sort of cucumber politician—best when he was green." He has become so galvanized with the notions of Old England that New England can hardly recognize that he is one of her sons, and is beginning to be sorry for the fact that he is.

It is not the tariff that has affected our carrying trade unfavorably. Its decline began in 1855, long before the present tariff was instituted. Afterwards, from 1861 to 1865, our ships were swept off the ocean by Democratic cruisers of English build, and Democratic hostility to protective legislation for our foreign carrying trade has completed its ruin. Our domestic carrying trade, which has had the benefit of protection, is in a fairly flourishing condition. But even that our free-trade Democracy wish to surrender to the foreigner.

NOW, WHO ASKS THAT THIS RUIN BE WROUGHT?

Gentlemen tell us that a great cry comes up from the people for it. And whom do they call the people? Why, certain free-trade newspapers, members of the Cobden Club, college doctrinaires, and Democratic politicians. But what of the Knights of Labor? Have they been at the doors of the Capitol urging the passage of the Mills bill, that great work of the greatest committee of the House? No. On the contrary, their protests against it have been many and loud. What of the merchants, and workingmen, and farmers, and all men who earn their bread in the sweat of their faces? Where are their petitions? In the petition-boxes, presenting a picture of the disaster which they believe this bill will work.

A few men anxious to surrender our markets as they are to give up our ship-yards, our fisheries, and our manufactories to foreign possession, and a few British-inspired newspapers, and a flood of circulars from the Cobden Club, make a great noise, and it is called the voice of the people. They will hear the voice of the people, the real, living, actual people of this country, if this bill shall pass, when the workingman, deprived of labor, or shorn in the rate of his wages; when the farmer, seeing the departure of his home market; when the manufacturer, looking upon his untenanted mills; when the merchant, realizing in diminished returns for his goods, the pinching poverty of his customers, shall let their ballots speak at the polls.

Their petitions are here now. They have come up from the workingmen in almost every industry in the country, but they have been unheeded by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, and they are not such workingmen as Henry George; not the theoretical workingmen; not they who swell up and cry out, "Look at me; big Injun workingman; workingmen's great friend and advocate," but practical workmen who put their hands to labor, who do work and not talk it simply, and who know from the best of all teachers, hard experience, what the workingman's interest is. And they do know it better than any free-trade theorist or college doctrinaire can tell them. They have, many of them, known enough to come to this protected land of plenty, and those who knew not before are fast learning what it is that gives them houses here whereas they had none in the lands they came from, what gives them comfort and education for their children here while they had none there. They know it is not the free-trade Democracy which, while with loud speech pretending to be the laboring man's friend, has for generations held him down under the heel of absolute despotism in one section of the country and deluded him with specious promises and pretensions in the other, but that great Republican party which broke the shackles of bound and fettered labor in the South and now maintains a wall of protection to it all over the country; which has never bought and sold the man and woman who toil in any land, and will not consent that they shall be prostrated and swept down by a deluge of cheap products of pauper labor from Europe now.

That party which gave to the poor people of the country the homestead law; to the freedman schools and the ballot, and has fought always, as now, to give high wages and the means of intelligence to those who toil and to their children, that is the party which has been the friend in fact, and not simply in speech, of the workingman, which recognizes labor as the magician that, with the wand of toil, touches our country's resources and summons them forth in forms of usefulness and beauty; which sees in the thrift of the laborer the prosperity and progress of the people, and which has treated him with respect, never despising nor oppressing him at any period of our history in any section of our land.

WHO SUPPORT THIS BILL?

Who are the supporters of this bill? The men who a few years since did not believe in the Republic and do not believe in protecting its industries now; they who wrote in a new constitution of a new Confederacy which they attempted to set up within the domain of the Union these words: "Nor shall any duties or taxes on importations from foreign nations be laid to promote or foster any branch of industry." These men dominate the Democracy to-day as they did prior to the war. They were then and are now recognized in England and here as free-traders; they are now, as then, the American pets of the British free-trade aristocracy. They and their Northern followers constitute the present Democratic party, and they support this bill for the destruction of American industries as they did the measures taken for the destruction of the American Union twenty-five years ago; and I confidently predict that their present project will fail as completely and fortunately for the country as did their former one.

Let it be admitted, if you please, that they were honest in their undertaking then, but the conflict which it precipitated was none the less terrible for that; and their success, had they been victorious, would have produced consequences no less disastrous. If they be honest in their present purpose they are no less deluded now than then; they no less fail to comprehend the right and wrong of the situation; and their success, could they achieve it, would bring ruin hardly less complete to the nation.

Secession and free trade were born of the same parentage and reared in the same school. The one has had its day and died, smothered in the blood it caused to flow and amid the throes of a civil war which it created. God forbid that such a calamity shall be in store for us as that the other shall ever have its day in this country. If it shall have it, then it will meet with a like defeat; but what patriotic man does not deplore the wrecks it must necessarily make in the mean time?

A BETTER WAY TO REDUCE THE REVENUES.

There is a better way than that proposed in the Mills bill to reduce the revenues and prevent the continual accumulation of a surplus in the Treasury. We are now paying duties amounting to $58,000,000 annually upon imported sugar. I introduced early in the session a bill to repeal this sugar duty, and to pay a bounty equal to the present rate of duty upon sugar raised in the country. The bounty would amount to not more than $6,000,000; so that $52,000,000 of taxes would be saved to the people and the surplus reduced to that extent. This would destroy no American industry. It would leave sugar protected just as it is now and be sure to reduce the surplus, something that the Mills bill will not do, because it is very certain to increase the revenues by increasing importations as much as it curtails them by its free-list.

But you fear the word "bounty." Then, let us reduce the sugar duty to $8,000,000 per year, and let that sum, or so much of it as may be necessary, be paid to the American sugar-planters to equal the rate of duty now upon the sugar they produce. This will be as much a duty as if we collected the $58,000,000 which we now do. It will remedy all the trouble about the surplus and harm no one. Indeed, it will do more to stimulate experiments in making sugar from sorghum and beets as well as from cane than a duty as now imposed. The sugar interest of France, Germany, and Italy has been developed by direct bounties, and several States of our country have resorted to this method with good results and no harm done to any one. This policy would more than anything else quicken the efforts of our people to invent new processes of manufacture as well as to try new materials for the production of sugar.

And this plan would not be sectional in its effects. Sugar is consumed equally in all parts of our country. It is an article of prime necessity in every State and town in the land, and it equally affects all classes. The use of sugar is confined to neither poor nor rich, nor workman nor employer. It is the largest food charge in every family, and there is no article of consumption the cheapening of whose cost would be so generally and sensibly felt. The reduction of the duty would be very large, the present tariff being 76 per cent., and therefore be a greater saving to the people than could be made upon anything else. Indeed, it would carry more comfort to more American homes than any change in our revenue laws which can be made.

IT WOULD BE IN THE LINE OF PROTECTION.

And this plan also would be entirely in line with the protective principle. The industry is to be protected. It is not proposed to protect it by a high duty, because the prime object of a protective duty, namely, the growth and expansion of the industry protected, and the competition arising therefrom, can not, at present at least, be secured in the case of sugar. The sugar-growing territory of our country is limited, and we produce no more sugar now than we did thirty years ago. The bounty will stimulate the experimenter and inventor, and when he shall have found the process of producing an unlimited amount of sugar in our country at a fair cost, the duty may be repealed if it shall then be found to be desirable to have it done. The repeal of the sugar duty and protection of the sugar industry at the same time, in the manner which I have stated, is American in its policy. It does not sacrifice any industry to the foreigner, nor any one industry to any other industry or interest in our country.

OUR POWER TO PROTECT LABOR.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] when he argues that "we have no power to protect labor," mistakes the plan and purpose of protectionists. We do not seek to protect one product of our own country against another, but all of them that require and deserve it from foreign competition. And this has proved successful beyond measure. It has raised the price of labor; has given us a splendid home market for our products, diversified our industries and made us as independent industrially as we are politically; it has stimulated the creation of new industries, caused competition among our own people, and reduced prices to the consumer below what he heretofore has paid for goods from abroad; it has developed our resources and given labor to our workmen and brought to us a prosperity never before realized by any people among the nations of the earth.

Under protection we have recovered from the destructive ravages of a great war; have paid thousands of millions of indebtedness and interest on the same; covered our land with thriving towns, fertile farms, and great cities; and quadrupled our national wealth. Under this policy ours has become a land to which every enterprising mind looks; to which every strong arm and bold heart endeavors to come; to which hundreds of thousands do come every year; and from which none go away to find better returns for investment and labor elsewhere.

FREE TRADE OR PROTECTION THE ISSUE.

But to conclude, let me say that the issue is now fairly and clearly made between the great parties of the country, the Democratic free-trader and the Republican protectionist, and I am glad it is so. We see no more such dodging of this question on the part of our Democratic friends, as they have hitherto attempted with such success as their skill obtained by long experience in that art entitled them to. The President's message, the Mills bill, and the tariff debate in this House have done one good if no other. They have disclosed to the country that the Democratic policy is free trade and nothing short of that; and if the present bill goes not quite to that length, its advocates do; that is sustained upon free-trade ground and no other, and that the Democratic party only awaits a convenient opportunity to come out of its already broken shell into as fully fledged a champion of free trade, pure and simple, as the most ardent of its leaders or the most radical English member of the Cobden Club, to which it has contributed so many adherents in this country, could desire.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] in his recent very eloquent speech puts himself in that attitude; the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] says he is ready for it, and every argument yet made for the passage of the Mills bill is an argument for free trade.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] made, to be sure, a speech with much good protection doctrine in it, especially as applied to rice. Had he applied his logic to lumber, wool, building stone, and the great Northern industries, it would have been a first-class high-tariff speech worthy of the best protectionist in the land.

NO RIGHT TO PROTECT LABOR.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER], as I have already stated, says that we have no right to protect labor. Well, I should say it is not very well protected in his State. It has there no rights which white men feel bound to respect, and no representative in Congress because it is trodden under the despotic heel of those who do not believe in protecting the workingman in the independent and dignified position which he holds in the North, and which the Republican party of protection intends he shall continue to hold. The question, then, is simply whether we shall so reduce the revenues as not to harm American industries and prostrate American labor in the interest of foreign capital; or shall we refuse to save to Americans the fruits of American advantage?

The Democratic party propose to surrender to the foreigner our farms, our manufactures, our fisheries, our ship-yards, our carrying trade, our lumber, and the opportunities of our workmen to sell their toil at a fair price. We propose to maintain the standard of American wages for American workmen, the American price of products for American farmers, and diversify our industries, as we have been doing, building towns and cities, and pushing forward the prosperity of the country under the encouragement of protective duties. On this issue we are to go to the people. I have too much confidence in their intelligence to doubt the result.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate for the country and for the proper consideration of the tariff that this bill had its birth in secret and its cradle in a partisan caucus. A revision of the tariff more than any other measure affects the vastly extended industries of the country, both labor and capital, in all their ramifications. No universal changes should be made in the system without giving a hearing to the interests affected and receiving their explanation of the practical results of such legislation. This was done at the last revision of the tariff, and the changes made therefore produced no shock or disaster to business.

I only enter into this debate as a business man, and with a view to represent fairly the varied interests of my district. I know that I voice the opinion of a majority of business men when I say that a tariff bill, originated as a party measure, discussed as a party measure, and enforced by a party caucus, can not win the confidence of the people of this country.

This bill is generally believed, in its taxing provisions, to have been the work of an alien-born resident of the United States, himself engaged in no productive industry or labor whatever, a mere representative of middlemen interested in the importation of foreign goods.

It is further understood that the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means adopted his propositions with only the modifications necessary to get sufficient Democratic support to pass the bill. But whatever its origin or manner of completion, it is nothing else than a bill to increase the quantity of foreign goods imported and used in this country. This also means a less amount of American goods manufactured and used here. This, in turn, means less capital employed here in industry, fewer laborers finding employment, more money sent abroad in payment for imported goods, less money accumulated at home, and a serious check to American enterprise and development. For agriculture it also means fewer mouths to feed or less wage-money to buy with and diminished home consumption; less money for wool and death to the sheep.

The bill has already had the effect of diminishing by one-half the number of operatives employed in one of the largest carpet manufactories in the State of New York. They could not proceed in the accumulation of stock while threatened by their own Congress with ruin for the benefit of their English competitors. Other industries of the country are for the like reasons hedging against the apprehended invasion of foreign goods.

There is another reason, Mr. Chairman, why our people in all the great industrial States feel alarmed from the presence of this bill in the House. Its chief advocates do not come from the industrial districts, from the regions where coal and iron, wool and cotton are converted to the uses of man, and where capital, invention, and enterprise have given great development to national wealth, where industry and diversified employment sustain millions of men.

They have not visited the great workshops of the United States. Their ears do not know the meaning of the roar of the furnace, the clang of the trip-hammer, the hum of the spindle; their eyes have not seen the early morning march of the tin-bucket brigade; as they go to earn the daily wage which gives them daily bread and makes them honored and respected laborers instead of wandering tramps.

We feel, therefore, that their judgment upon a tariff measure without practical knowledge of our national industries and of the vast and inseparable interdependence of one industry upon another for its life and support, is unsafe and untrustworthy. The reason put forward for this attack upon our industries is the necessity of preventing the accumulation of a surplus revenue. There are three ways to diminish this revenue.

One is the total abolition of the duties on a given article; another the reduction of the duty on articles of which we consume only a fixed amount; and a third is the laying of a duty so high as to prohibit importation. The authors of this bill have not pursued any of these methods except in some minor articles. They have reduced the rates on articles of unlimited consumption. They call this a reduction of the revenue. Yet it is known and admitted that this bill will lead to increased importation, and therefore it is pure assumption to say that on these classes of goods there will be a reduction of revenue. In proportion as they destroy our domestic production these importations will increase. On the other hand, we maintain that the necessary reductions should be effected by the total abolition or of a part of the internal revenue and by a reduction on such imported articles as sugar, of which the annual consumption is a fixed quantity and chiefly supplied from abroad. This will facilitate instead of disturb or destroy our home industries, and will effect a precise and known reduction of our revenue.

These results appear to me so plain that this whole anti-protection movement can not be considered so much an attempt to reduce the revenues as to force Representatives on this floor to sacrifice the interests of their own constituents in order to give an indorsement to the President's free-trade message. In other words, they are promoting the interests of the Democratic candidate for the Presidency by an attack on the labor and industries of this country in favor of foreign manufacturers and traders.

Mr. Chairman, the United States are greater consumers of the products of labor than any other nation on the globe. It is therefore the best market on the globe. They not only consume more, but they pay better. Europe would rather get control of this market than of any other entire continent, save her own. By our American system of protection we have built up this market and now largely control it. This bill is the first step to give it up to England, from which we rescued it in 1789, when our Constitution established the Union and a sovereign Congress with power to encourage and protect home industries. It is our control of this market which has built up our vast industries and given employment not only to our native laborers but to vast numbers who have come to us from abroad. Thev have indeed come to us in such numbers that many can not find employment to-day.

What will you do with the surplus labor? Every bale or ton of additional goods imported in competition with our own means a bale or ton less manufactured by our own labor. We can not pay for the same thing wages to the American laborer and to the English laborer; one or the other must give way and go hungry. I wish both might be fed, but as long as only one can eat it is our duty to see that Americans earn the wages and eat the bread. Nor can you buy this additional bale or ton without paying for it. That means that you are sending money out of the country instead of spending it in the country. This signifies not only less home capital to use, but less home capital to tax. In fact it is a question simply whether we shall enrich a foreign country and people or enrich our own.

A patriot can not long hesitate where his duty lies. It is an admitted duty of every government, so far as legislation can do it, to provide a system which shall maintain all classes of its population in employment and in the means of comfortable living. I find in this proposed legislation the first step in the contrary direction, and my people would not justify me in giving such a measure my support.

The American system of fostering and protecting home industries is in direct contrast and antagonism with the English system of a tariff for revenue only. The struggle between them has been going on for twenty-five years and more. The former system has prevailed here for a quarter of a century, and with results which have caused the wonder and won the admiration of the civilized world. The census portrays the result better than I can do it. The revenue tariff only has prevailed during that period in England and Ireland. The result there is also known to the world. Has it proved a benefit to Ireland? Let her people, escaping by the million to this and other shores, answer for her. What do Englishmen say for themselves? They certainly are competent witnesses in their own affairs. For years they have been bewailing the losses and ruin which have come to their agriculture, both in reduced productions and reduced prices. The depression in manufactures and trade have become so public and serious that a parliamentary commission was recently appointed to inquire into its causes. That commission in its report declares that the industrial crisis in England has continued since 1875, which was the year when the remarkable prosperity of the United States became evident after the passage of the act for the resumption of specie payments. This commission gave as the reason for the depression the low profits of manufacturers.

An English writer, from whom I shall quote further presently, commenting on the commission's report, says:

> That low profits mean reduced wages of labor or the employment of a les number of laborers and less consumption by the worker.
> Low profits for the Lancashire and Birmingham manufacturers mean narrowed circumstances in this country.
> For many decades we have not seen such a cheapness of wheat and manufactured goods as we see now, and yet we are suffering from a crisis.

I call the attention of the Democratic lovers of the English system to this notable admission. You are struggling, you say, for cheaper goods and cheaper means of living in this country. They have had both in England, the country whose policy you would imitate, and yet their crisis and their sufferings have come upon them and continue to-day.

It ought to open your eyes, for it shows that cheapness does not mean procperity; it proves how much better it is to buy what you want, even dearly, and have the money to pay for it, than it is to be able to buy cheaply and have no money to pay for it. This last is the condition of England to-day, and upon their own testimony.

At the very time the Committee on Ways and Means were reporting this bill in aid of English manufacturers, and for the introduction of the English system into this country, Prince Kropotkin, an economic writer and reformer of England, published an article in the Nineteenth Century Magazine upon the industrial condition of England. His article is entitled "The Breakdown of our Industrial System." The very title should induce the President and his adherents in this House to call a halt in their crusade against the American system, which protects our own industries and our own labor. While you are urging us to abandon these interests in favor of the British system of a tariff for revenue only, this writer addresses his article to Englishmen, showing them how their system has already broken down. He says workmen have become—> mere flesh-and-bone parts of some immense machinery.

Even the agricultural laborer will become—

> A tramp who will never again see the field he has harvested once in his life.

He demands a reform which shall improve the condition of the laborer—

> Where each aggregation of individuals large enough to dispose of a certain variety of natural resources—it may be a nation, or rather a region—produces and itself consumes its own agricultural and manufactured produce.

You will observe that in this manner he describes exactly the object which the American system has so largely promoted in this country. He adds, speaking of England, that—

> The present industrial system already bears in itself the germs of its proper ruin.

And affirms that—

> Each nation must be her own agriculturist and manufacturer.

The same article reviews the industrial condition of different nations of the world, and when he turns from England to Belgium, another revenue-tariff country, he simply says:

> The immense factories at Verviers are silent; the Belgian weavers are misery-stricken.

While carefully avoiding any recommendation of the protective system, he shows the industrial condition of different countries entering into competition with England, and speaks particularly of the growing industries of Germany, Austria, Italy, Russia, and Spain, all of which countries have protective tariffs. He then adds:

> Finally, a terrible competitor to all European manufacturing countries has grown up of late in the United States. * * * Manufactures must grow in the States; and they are growing at such a speed—an American speed—that in a very few years the now neutral markets will be invaded by American goods.

While this alien but far-sighted English writer sees that our system has already prepared the way for invading the neutral markets of the world, our Democrats are telling us that we must change that system and suffer adversity instead of prosperity before we can compete in foreign markets. This is strange logic, that we must be embarrassed at home and our home system broken down by the politicians before we can prosper abroad. No better explanation can be given of the law and method of our American prosperity than the following statement which he gives as to the general law of development:

> As soon as any industry has taken firm root it calls into existence hundreds of other trades, and as soon as the first steps have been made and the first obstacles have been overcome the growth of industries goes on at an accelerated rate.

In that sentence is written the industrial history of the United States.

I need not go farther for testimony touching the break-down of that English system for the introduction of which into our country this bill is the opening wedge. Every business man of our commercial cities knows that the condition of England is that described by the Parliamentary commission, and so vividly stated by Prince Kropotkin.

It is true, and it is natural, that the President's message and this bill should be hailed by Englishmen as the dawn of a better day for them, but will it be the dawn of a better day for our country? It betokens for the United States, in my judgment, rather the gloom of a threatening night. It will open a wider market for British goods, but by just so much it narrows the market for American products; by so much as it gives employment to British labor it takes employment from American labor; it abandons the elements of our existing prosperity and introduces the elements of English adversity; for industrial upbuilding it substitutes industrial break-down. [Great applause.]

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to those present that their perfect attention will not embarrass me in the least [laughter], nor will occasional demonstrations of approval of what I have to say be objected to. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I am not here to lecture on manners, but I will take this occasion to say that I do not think it good form for gentlemen to be sitting around reading, writing, and talking when a gentleman is trying to instruct them. Mr. Chairman, I approach the discussion of this question, on which so much has been said in this House within the last few weeks, with much of embarrassment anddiffidence. But, sir, there are some views in connection with the pending matter that I desire to present.

I have listened with great interest to the discussion that has been had up to the present. I trust we are nearing the end of this great debate. I have endeavored to give a fair and impartial hearing to what has been said. I was told early in this discussion, and have been told all through it by the opponents of tariff reform, that we of the South came here bound and hampered by prejudice, and I was anxious to be enlightened, and if the logic of the question was contrary to the views I entertain I was anxious to be righted.

I have heard from some gentlemen opposing the bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means some as good arguments as can be made in behalf of a bad cause.

I have heard a great many as poor and illogical arguments as could be made in any cause. Many of the arguments against this bill remind me of the discussion between Mr. Baps and Mr. Toots and Sir Barnet Skettles, given by Dickens in Dombey and Son. Mr. Baps solemnly and seriously propounded the question to Mr. Toots: "What are you going to do with your raw materials when they come into your ports in return for your drain of gold?" Mr. Toots, to whom the question seemed perplexing, replied that he'd cook 'em. [Laughter and applause.]

But Mr. Baps did not seem to think this would do, and when he met Sir Barnet Skettles he propounded the same interrogatory to him. Sir Barnet had much to say upon the question and said it, but it did not appear to solve the question, for Mr. Baps retorted, "Yes, but suppose Russia stepped in with her tallows," which struck Sir Barnet almost dumb, for he could only shake his head after that and say, "Why, you must fall back on your cottons." [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the solution of this great question, and of many questions that have been presented here by gentlemen who have spoken against the Mills bill, is about as satisfactory as this discussion between the gentlemen to whom I have referred.

Mr. Chairman, what is the condition with which we are confronted? An overflowing Treasury, an overtaxed people. It is not my purpose, sir, to speak of the surplus or of its corrupting, corroding, and debauching influence. The Government amply and liberally, if not extravagantly, provided for in all its departments—the legislative, executive, and judicial, the military, the naval, the Indians, the Agricultural and the State Departments—all with all the money they need; with a Pension Bureau as large as a department of the Government, distributing eighty-odd million dollars annually for pensions, and yet we will have in the Treasury by the close of this fiscal year more than $150,000,000 for which the Government has no use. Withdrawn from the avenues of commerce and trade, it lies here to excite the cupidity of jobbers and corruptionists, and is a constant temptation to extravagant legislative schemes.

Mr. Chairman, the great question with governments in the past has been how to raise the necessary revenues; the question of taxation has been one that has engaged the attention of statesmen in all ages of the world, and has often produced revolution and drenched nations with blood. What then, sir, would you suppose would be the greatest pleasure of the representative of a free people confronted by the condition which we have before us? It seems to me that it would be the reduction of taxation and the lightening of the burdens of the people. Mr. Chairman, when I embarked in politics and statesmanship I looked forward with more pleasure to the accomplishment of some such good as this for my constituency than to any personal triumphs. What is the trouble here? It seems to be to devise ways and means to prevent taking the burdens of taxation off the people, instead of how to reduce taxation. I had always understood that taxation was an evil to be borne because it was necessary, and that unnecessary taxation was something of which every representative of a free people would be glad to rid them; but sir, it seems I am mistaken, and what are the arguments against the reduction of taxation? What interest is it that stands here to thwart every proposition to reduce the revenues to the actual needs of the Government?

It is the immense capital engaged in manufacturing. The manufacturers of America—the richest and most powerful in the world—are here through their representatives and their agents with their bureaus and their literature, resisting every effort to reduce taxation to the needs of the Government. I have listened for some definite proposition from the opponents of the bill reported here by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee as to what we should do to avert the disasters that the present condition threatens. They tell us the tariff should be revised, but they say it should be by its friends, and they are its friends. Now, Mr. Chairman, they must excuse me if I decline to wait on them to do it; we want it done this century, and I trust and believe they will not be intrusted with power in that time. I would as soon think of sending to the jail to get a jury to try the criminal docket as to depend on the defenders of the present system to reform the tariff and reduce taxes.

Besides, sir, what proposition do they present? No two of them are agreed. One says he would reduce taxation by repealing the internal revenue; another says he opposes taking the tax off of whisky; another says he would take it off of sugar; but the father of the protective system [Mr. KELLEY], who gave us to understand to-day, in relating the conversion of Garfield to the theory of protection, that protectionists regarded themselves as followers or disciples of himself, insists that it would be a crime to take the duty off of sugar. Others take the position that taxation should not be reduced at all, and that the proper thing to do is to increase expenditures, and various schemes are proposed for spending the surplus. Some of them insist that much of it might be paid out in pensions. It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that eighty-odd millions of dollars annually for pensions ought to satisfy the most enthusiastic friend of the soldier.

I am aware that we of the South are accused and probably suspected of being influenced by improper motives in our opposition to increasing this amount; but I appeal to you gentlemen of the North to consider that this money is collected from all parts of the country and distributed almost exclusively in one section. You can see how essential it is to us that some limitation should be put to this tax that goes out from us, but never returns. There are other suggestions for increased expenditures, but, sir, I have heard no complaint from the masses of the people in this country that we are not spending enough. I have heard no demand from them for increased expenditures. On the other hand, they think as I do, that the expenditures might and should be curtailed.

Others say that the Government should devote this surplus, as it is now doing, to the purchase of Government bonds. This is, I grant, the best we can do with the surplus after we have it; but the question is, is it good statesmanship to tax the people who are paying themselves 8 and 10 per cent. interest on money to raise money for the Government to anticipate its debts and purchase at enormous premiums, as it is now doing, its bonds that are drawing only 4 or 4½ per cent.? The Government is now having to pay more than 26 per cent. premium in order to take up its 4½ per cent. bonds, and within the last few weeks has paid out nearly $4,000,000 in premiums on the purchase of bonds.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said, I have been anxious to be informed about this matter and to know just exactly what the truth of the matter was. I have listened, as I said awhile ago, to gentlemen over there; and how do they begin the discussion of this question? How do they propose to go about enlightening me as to what I should do? I am told that coming from the section I do, coming from the section the majority of the Ways and Means Committee do, bound hand and foot by the ideas engendered, as they tell us, by slavery, more than thirty years ago, that we have no business to be tampering with this question.

I have practiced law some, Mr. Chairman. I always found that when the lawyer had a very bad case on the merits his scheme was to befog and becloud the issue, and to side-track the jury. I have known some lawyers, shysters, who had one particular branch of the law in which they thought they were perfect, and every case they ever had they attempted to run in that line. For instance, I know a shyster who won a case once on the doctrine of estoppel; he never had a case since but he attempted to draw it into estoppel. I know an old gentleman in Mississippi who won a case on a demurrer. He was not a lawyer. But he was sued again after that, and he wrote to his lawyer, "Please send me a couple more of those demurrers" [laughter]; "these fellows have sued me in two more cases." His great idea was that a demurrer was the thing that knocked every case out of court.

You have all heard of the doctor who threw all his patients into fits because he said he was sheol on fits. [Laughter.] Now the gentlemen who opened this debate on that side, the two first, and a great many smaller lights who have followed, have put this into a question of slavery. They had won a case on slavery, and they think if they can throw the tariff into slavery they will be all right, for they were sheol on slavery. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, the father of the protective system [Mr. KELLEY], told us here on this floor how he fought slavery, and then he associates every effort to reform the tariff with slavery. Slavery is his demurrer. Slavery is his estoppel. I have no doubt in his day and in the days of slavery he was a power. It was the same with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS].

And then my neighbor and good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE], one of the disciples of the old father, the other day in the heat of debate got into this slavery business. I do not blame him much for that because I do not think there was any malice in it; I think it was a case of emotional insanity. [Laughter.] When the gentleman was descanting on the beauties of protection in Allegheny County, and he was asked by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] about the strike in the Edgar Thomson Steel Works, where the Pinkerton detectives were keeping out the laboring men, the gentleman flew off, and insisted on talking about slavery in the South. There was no malice aforethought in that. If he had committed murder under those circumstances he would have been acquitted on the ground of emotional insanity, for if anything drives a Pennsylvanian insane when talking about protection it is to speak to him about strikes and Pinkerton detectives. [Laughter and applause.]

And I now desire to give some attention to the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. FORAN, et tu Brute! [Laughter.] He too read the South a lecture, and told us much about ourselves that we did not know—another instance in which I had to go from home to get news. I wonder where he learned all he knows about the South! [Laughter on the Democratic side.] I will tell him now, and I believe it is true, that if he knows no more about the doctrines of protection and free trade than he knows about the South he ought never to speak on those subjects.

Mr. FORAN. I learned something about the South in 1864. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Oh, yes; that is your estoppel; that is your demurrer. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORAN. Well, it was an estoppel, sure enough.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Yes, the gentleman learned something about the South in 1864. He says that he is a Democrat, but that the Republicans are the fathers of this high protective tariff which he extolled so highly, and which he says has made better men and more of them than any other system.

Mr. Chairman, if he has found a perfect system of government which makes better men and more of them than any other system, and which, he says, is doing the country so much good, and if he clings to the prejudices of 1864, with which so many other gentlemen in the Republican party seem to be afflicted, in the name of common sense how does he get to be a Democrat? [Laughter.] It seems to me that he would cast his lot with that party which inaugurated the system he admires so much, and which he tells us has made better men and more of them than any other system, and that tries to keep itself alive on the prejudices engendered in 1864 which he seems to desire to keep alive.

But, Mr. Chairman, let us see what he says about the South, and then we will look at what he says about himself:

> The fact is, the South, because of the curse of slave labor, found herself at a disadvantage, as compared with the North, in diversified industrial pursuits Slave labor was adapted to only one industry, agriculture, and that being the case it was of course to the advantage of the South, at least for the time being, to purchase those manufactured goods she needed in the cheapest market she could obtain, while she sold her staple products in the highest market she could obtain. It will therefore be seen that the free-trade sentiment in this country was the outgrowth of peculiar conditions and peculiar environment, and perhaps nowhere in the history of the world is the tenacity of prejudice more strongly exemplified than in the fact that this sentiment continues a quarter of a century after the conditions and environment which gave it birth have passed away and no longer exist. Many gentlemen upon this floor can not help being free-traders. They were born so. It is rather the result of congenital causes than conviction based upon research and investigation.

And again, speaking of the bill under discussion, he says:

> It came from gentlemen whose knowledge of the great labor problem was derived from tableaux and object lessons. Ring up the curtain, behold the lights of other days, free-trade days; at the front of the stage an uncovered pine table, upon which is a lighted tallow candle, and farther back, in the shade, is a black man couchant and a white man and a rawhide rampant.
> I do not say these things in bitterness; I only refer to them to show how very difficult it is to break away from the prejudices that are born with us, or to break through the environment of conditions that have influenced most of our lives. One of the greatest evils the curse of slavery brought upon our kinsmen of the South was the creation of a caste, because it has outlived all the other evils which flowed from this Pandora box. There is no despotism so cruel and harsh as the despotism of caste. It is supersensitive to any intrusion into its fancied realm, and anything whose tendency is to ennoble and elevate human dignity and independence always encounters its fiercest hostility.

Mr. Chairman, we are very much obliged to the gentleman from Ohio for the assurance that he says these things about us out of a spirit of loving-kindness. If he had been bitter in this talk it would really have hurt our feelings [laughter], but his kindness of heart when he undertakes to lecture us really overcomes us.

That is the picture the gentleman gives us of the South. These are the things he attributes to us. Let us now hear him speak of himself. He has told us what sort of people these Southerners are. Now, let us hear him tell about himself:

> I believe in Democracy, but there is no Democracy in this bill. I know of but one guide by which to shape my official as well as my private conduct, and that is the light which comes from my inner, moral consciousness—by this light my convictions of right and duty are formed; and if the time should ever come when party or any other kind of prejudice becomes stronger than my judgment, and I find that the courage of my convictions is departing from me, I will be ready to exclaim with Brutus in honest candor and sincerity—
> Be ready, gods, with all your thunderbolts
> Dash me to pieces.

Well, Mr. Chairman, as the old darkey said about me one time in Mississippi, when he was following me in a speech, "the gentleman recommends himself so much higher than anybody else can recommend him it aint necessary for me to say anything more about him." [Laughter.] But I want to call the gentleman's attention to the lesson taught by a teacher who is recognized as good authority in the benighted South. He will find it in about the eleventh verse of the eighteenth chapter of Luke, where he may read:

> The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself, God, I thank Thee, that I am not as other men.

Mr. FORAN. Is it the Pharisee that is occupying the floor now?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. No, sir; the Pharisee is the man who erects such a high standard for himself as the gentleman from Ohio does, and discounts so much the honest convictions and judgments of other people. Let me remind the gentleman that that pharisaical performance was not commended by the teacher to whom I have referred.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] demonstrated the other day, if anything is capable of demonstration by testimony, that protection does not enhance wages in this country; that the difference between the price of labor in this country and the price of labor in Europe is not the result of protection, but arises from the fact that the labor of this country is more productive; that it does more work for the money, makes more pairs of shoes for the same money, makes more yards of prints for the same money than labor in Europe does. He showed by indisputable proof that a pair of shoes, the making of which cost 34 cents in England, cost only 25 cents in Massachusetts and that a pair that cost 50 cents to make in England only cost 33 cents in Massachusetts, and he illustrated it with print cloth and other things; no one has been able to meet this. It was shown that American labor earned more wages, but because it accomplished more and not on account of the tariff.

But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] attempted to reply to the gentleman from Texas, and what was the argument to which he was finally driven? Why, sir, it was that money in this country is worth more than money in Europe. That was about all he got out of his argument, that the tariff served to protect money in this country and give it a larger return than money in Europe will bring.

I here insert a table that will show how utterly fallacious is the claim that labor gets the benefit of the protective tariff:

Table, compiled from Tenth Census, showing value of various manufactured products, per cent. of labor cost, rate of duty existing and proposed.

Industries.	Value of product.	Labor cost.	Percentage of labor.	Present tariff.	Proposed rate.
				Per ct.	Per ct.
Carpets	$31,792,802	$6,825,218	21.5	47	30
Cotton goods	210,950,383	45,614,419	21.6	50	40
Bolts, nuts, etc	10,073,330	1,981,300	19.7	50	35
Nails and spikes	5,629,240	1,255,171	22.3	43	34
Iron pipe, wrought	13,292,162	1,788,258	13.5	70	35
Oil, castor	653,300	44,714	6.8	194	97
Oil, linseed	$15,303,312	$681,677	4.4	54	21
Screws	2,184,532	456,542	20.9	50	35
Wool hats	8,316,369	1,893,215	22.2	54	40
Woolen goods	160,666,721	25,826,392	16.1	70	40
Worsted goods	33,549,942	5,683,027	16.9	68	40

It will be seen from this that the present tariff or protection is more than double the whole cost of the labor; so that if the labor in other countries cost nothing at all no such tariff as this would be necessary to protect labor here, nor does the proposed reduction in the Mills bill bring it down to the cost of labor in any case here given.

You all heard Mr. Scott, of Pennsylvania, in his speech tell us about the stockholder in the Edgar Thompson iron and steel works who told him their profits were $5,000,000 annually. That this one man's profits were one and a half millions annually, or $5,000 a day. You also heard from Mr. FORD, of Michigan, where the chancery suit in his State developed. That the Jackson Iron-Mining Company on a capital of $300,000 had declared dividends to the amount of $5,355, or 89½ per cent. annually, beside largely increasing their plant.

I wish I had the time to demonstrate this fully. I here insert an article from the San Francisco Examiner that shows where the benefits of protection go:

WHERE THE MONEY GOES.

That there is a good deal of dissatisfaction in the United States with the way the annual industrial product of the country is distributed is not to be denied. The amount of this product as marketed is put by Joseph Nimmo, jr., Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, at $9,000,000,000; by Edward Atkinson, including products unmarketed, at $10,000,000,000. Both add for items omitted, $100,000,000. The working force—that is, the wage-earners and small farmers of the country—number 16,200,000; the workers of a higher grade, managers, directors, superintendents, and so on, paid by salaries and fees, number 1,600,000.

Mr. Atkinson and other economists agree on $432 as the average annual earnings of wage-receivers as above defined. This will include what they consume of their own unmarketed product. Next, the services rendered by persons engaged otherwise than in production (physicians, domestic servants in cities and so on) reach an annual value of $1,200,000,000. Rents, which stand for the service rendered by fixed capital, reach $800,000,000. Thus the total annual value of the produce of all the labor of every kind in the United States, including the profit on all the jobs and schemes and pools and trusts, is fully $12,000,000,000. Of this amount the wage and salary earning classes together (numbering 17,300,000) receive $8,100,000,000; leaving as the annual profit of mere capitalists, "operators," and so on, the sum of $3,900,000,000.

Thus the owners and controllers of wealth receive at least 32½ per cent. of the total product of the country. Other estimates make the proportion 37½ per cent. Wage-receivers save a sum which, while it looks important in savings-bank returns, is a mere nothing—a vanishing quantity—in the enormous figures of actual annual production. An annual saving, an annual addition to existing wealth is in fact made which averages $900,000,000, and it is made almost exclusively out of the share of total product captured by pre-existing wealth. Thus, while it is not true that the poor are growing poorer as a class, it is strictly and demonstrably true that only the rich are growing richer.—San Francisco Examiner

If I have the time, Mr. Chairman, I think I can demonstrate, as I shall endeavor to do, that the protection we have in this country is protection to money, to capital, and not to labor.

I am sorry my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who usually sits upon my right, is not here to-day, for I listened with great interest to his voluminous figures upon the resources of New England. I have no desire to enter into any contrast between the South and New England. I have nothing in the world to say against New England, except that I do not think it exactly the right thing for New England after having gobbled up in the way of taxation all we of the South had to then brag to us about her wealth and taunt us with our poverty.

Really I do not know whether that is exactly the right thing to do under any circumstances. But the gentleman from New Hampshire filled pages after pages of the RECORD with figures and statements, showing the wonderful resources, the vast capital that New England had engaged in manufactures; and while he did not figure out the result of his statement in every instance, I have taken occasion to figure out some of the results; and where he gives us the amount of capital invested, the amount of wages paid, the quantity of raw material of every description which is bought, the result shows an average of more than 20 per cent. interest or annual income upon this immense capital; and the half of the capital of New England is not engaged in manufactures either.

I give here some of his figures, from which it will be seen that the profits of the carpet industry are more than 20 per cent. net to capital.

In the entire country there are about two hundred and sixty thousand manufacturing establishments of all kinds, employing two million seven hundred and fifty thousand people. The total capital invested in 1880 was nearly three billions of dollars. The total value of all material used was about three and one-half billion dollars, while the aggregate annual value of the products thereof was over five and one-half billion dollars. The share that the six New England States, with less than one-thirteenth of the population of the country, take in this combined manufacturing industry of the Union is that of about thirty-five thousand manufactories, or over one-eighth of all, and they employ six hundred and fifty thousand people, more than one-fifth of all.

Of the total capital invested they employ within their own borders over six hundred and fifty millions, more than one-fifth of all; of the total value of materials used they consume nearly seven hundred millions, over one-sixth of the whole; and they yield in products of manufacture nearly twelve hundred millions of dollars, about one-fifth of all. And yet it is coolly proposed by hostile legislation to strike down this great wealth-producing, tax-paying section of our country, the section from which came the money to bind the Eastern States to the Pacific Ocean with bands of iron, which out of her abundance has built Western railroads and Western cities, and which to-day stands with open hand and generous purse ready to help rehabilitate the South whenever in good faith she is invited so to do.

And again:

The manufacture of carpets in the United States has been largely developed during the period of the high tariff. We now successfully compete with the best manufacturers of Europe, in Brussels, ingrain, Wilton, Axminster, Venetian, tapestry, velvet, cottage, and Dutch carpets, as well as rugs, druggets, lastings, and serges. The country has invested a capital of twenty-two millions of dollars in these manufactures of wool, which give employment to twenty-one thousand people, whose wages are upward of seven millions of dollars annually.

The materials used include thirty-five million pounds of foreign wool, two million pounds of domestic wool, twenty-five million pounds of scoured wool, inclusive of waste and shoddy, besides about fifty million pounds of mohair and camel's hair. These materials, together with chemicals, dye-stuffs, etc., cost the manufacturers about twenty millions a year, and the finished product sells for about thirty-three millions of dollars.

In this industry the New England States have invested eight millions of dollars, more than one-third of the whole, and they give employment to five thousand people, paying them over three millions of dollars annually. They use nearly one-half of the foreign wool, thus being the heaviest tariff payers, and also use almost one-half of the scoured wool. Their annual production is worth, at wholesale prices, over ten millions of dollars, or nearly one-third of the total product of the country.

The gentleman tells us, also, that New England has much of her capital invested in railroads in the South, and then he winds up by telling us that with all this capital which her people have in savings-banks, etc., they are now ready, when invited in good faith, to come South and invest it there; that is, to let us have it to build up our resources. If he were here, I wanted to ask him whether they were going to let us have this capital without interest, because from what I know of New England I suspect that if this capital is permitted to come South, they will expect a very good return for it, and we shall have that to pay. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I have his figures here. I have not time to refer to them in detail.

Mr. MILLIKEN. As the gentleman is speaking of New England, of which I happen to be in small part a representative, will he allow me a word? Can he cite to us instances where New England has accumulated great returns from her investments in the South? And can he not cite to us some very conspicuous instances where New England has lost all her investments in the South by reason of repudiation by Southern States and by people of the South of debts which they honestly owed to New England for money which New England people had honestly invested there?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Trying to befog the issue by going back to repudiation. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. Well, repudiation is a pretty sad thing for the man whose debts are repudiated; it may be nice, it may be a joke for the repudiator, but it is a pretty earnest thing for us.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. How much did you ever invest in the South? [Laughter.] I will pay your part of it now, and that will settle the matter between you and me. You may draw upon me this evening for whatever may have been the amount of your investments that have been repudiated by the South.

Mr. MILLIKEN. There are friends of mine who had a good deal of money invested in your State, and who never realized a cent from it.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Well, I will tell you why your people never got their money.

Mr. MILLIKEN. It was because your people repudiated the debt.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. The case is like that of a man who bought some mules at a very high price, and before they were paid for took the benefit of the bankrupt law. The fellow who sold him the mules came along and said, "I can not afford to lose all this money." "Well," said the debtor, "you ought not to have sold your mules so high." [Laughter.] If you people of New England had not charged so much interest on your money, you might have got it back; but you wanted too much; we could not pay your demands; you bankrupted and broke us. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. But my friend has not answered my question. I asked him to specify cases where the South has paid usury to New England. I would like to know the individual instances.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. We are paying them all the time; we are paying them now upon the railroad investments down there and other investments in the South.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman can not particularize.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to speak further of the statements of the gentleman from New Hampshire when I was led off by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN], who never fails to lead off. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from New Hampshire, after reciting the acquisitions of New England, which are marvelous, says that the New England hen lays more eggs than the Southern hen [laughter], and the New England cow gives more milk than the Southern cow. I do not know exactly how the fact is. They say that the New England hen is not protected against the pauper hen of Canada. Some gentleman here told us about how many dozen eggs were brought in from Canada last year; the number, I believe, was fourteen million dozen or fourteen hundred million dozen, I do not remember which; and what is a difference of a few hundred million dozen eggs in a debate like this? [Laughter.]

I have been trying to figure it out how the New England hen did so much better than the Southern hen. I understand they have got a patent hen-nest in which they deceive the hen into laying a great many more eggs. [Laughter.] You have heard of the patent hen-nest where, after the hen has laid an egg, they have the nest so arranged that the egg slips out of sight, and the hen gets up, looks round, and not seeing any egg goes back and lays another. [Laughter and applause.] That is the only way in which I can figure it out that the New England hen does so much better than the Southern hen. But I will tell you about our Southern cows and our Southern hens, that the eggs they do lay and the milk they do give are genuine eggs and milk. [Laughter and applause.] No fiction about it, we practice no fraud on our hens.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when I heard the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] on New England, felicitating himself about the condition, there, it reminded me of a correspondence I was reading a few days ago between Miss Anastasia Pugsley and Miss Gemima Morgrige, in which Miss Anastasia, felicitating herself upon the domesticity of her surroundings, said she was never in her life so happy as in the contemplation of drinking her own milk, and fattening her own calves, and laying her own eggs. [Great laughter and applause.] She would have been competent to enter the Home Market Club of Boston. [Laughter.]

By the way, I will say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY], just in front of me, who has visited the Home Market Club of Boston, recently that I received a circular from it a few days ago from that club. I wish to call the attention of the committee to it. It is an interesting document. I think I have it here somewhere. Yes; here it is.

I will read it. It is from the Home Market Club of Boston, and I suppose we have all received a copy. And I wish to say right here, if there is anybody who is not posted on the subject of the tariff and the effect this sort of legislation is going to have on the infant industries of the country, he is without excuse, for if the same diligence and the same effort were made to convert the heathen by sending out gospel tracts and pamphlets that have been resorted to by the friends of protection we would have had the millennium long before this. [Laughter.]

What are the objects of the Home Market Club of Boston? Let me read:

The object of the executive committee has been to arouse the attention of the public to the dangers surrounding the all-important interests of New England sustained by the protective tariff.

The all-important industries of New England! If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] would lend me that poetry of his I would say—

No pent-up Utica contracts our powers.
The whole boundless New England is ours.

That is New England. [Laughter.] What is the object of the Home Market Club?

Mr. FORAN. If the gentleman would confine himself to my speech he would get along a good deal better.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. In exposing the absurdities of the gentleman's speech I could spend several hours, but I do not wish to take up that time, as I do not think the gentleman's speech made much impression.

Here is another extract from that Home Market Club circular:

The dinners given by the club at the Hotel Vendome to Senators FRYE, HOAR, and SHERMAN, and Congressmen MCKINLEY, GOFF, and BUTTERWORTH have been widespread in their influence, and the public meetings which have been held in many parts of the State have been equally successful in arousing public sentiment to the importance of the issue before the country.

I want to warn you, gentlemen, about those dinners. [Laughter.] The same mail which brought me that circular brought me the record with the letter of Mr. Murat Halstead apologizing for being a member of the Cobden Club. He said he was at a whitebait dinner over there which got him into it. [Laughter.] I have his apology here, and will read it.

Hon. C. A. BOUTELLE,
House of Representatives:

The story that I am a member of the Cobden Club is correct. One night in London with Cyrus Field, a personal friend of Cobden, I boarded a small steamboat at Westminster and was carried to Greenwich. There we had a whitebait dinner, twelve courses of fish and as good cold champagne as was ever drank in Maine. It was a lovely dinner. There was a distinguished man in the chair and a toast-master who whooped things up and made them lively. I made a speech about the white wings of commerce on the ocean and the large rivers in America, and the distance Cincinnati was from salt water, and the indifference of her people on the tariff question.

He gives that as his excuse for getting into the Cobden Club. [Laughter.] I expect in the course of a few years, when this policy of protection, of which the gentlemen who visited the Boston Home Market Club are such devotees, has been exploded, we will find them excusing themselves with the same sort of excuse that Mr. Halstead gives; they will excuse their speeches there by charging it to that splendid dinner the club gave them. Why, we learn from Mr. KELLEY that General Garfield's conversion to the doctrine of protection took place at a dinner in New Orleans. It is wonderful, the effect of these dinners. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. Does the gentleman speak from his own experience?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I speak from the experience of Mr. Halstead and of General Garfield, and the statement of the Home Market Club, all of which has been given.

Mr. Chairman, there are many other things I would like to say, but I find my time is rapidly drawing to a close. I do want, sir, however, to call the attention of this House, not in arrogance, not in a spirit of boastfulness, but in all sincerity, to a few points about the South. I wish I had time to have read to those gentlemen who have been talking about the South here a letter written by a distinguished citizen of my own State on the South, in which he defends it against some charges that have been made on this floor. I refer to Dr. B. F. Ward, of Winona, Miss. Here is what he says. I wish I had time to give you the whole of the letter. He is replying to a letter Prof. Tillett, of Nashville, Tenn.:

No careful observer will probably deny that among the wealthy and fashionable classes at the North there is more idleness and extravagance, more folly and arrogance, more dissipation and vice, and a more impassable barrier between rich and poor than ever existed in the most opulent social circle of slave-holders. For however aristocratic they may have been, they were always courteous and refined. In the North the tendency to divide society on financial lines has grown with constantly increasing intensity for more than half a century, until now it is almost definitely established. The very rich and very poor are as widely separated as Dives and Lazarus. In the old South, on the contrary, there were processes constantly at work, effecting a gradual and steady diffusion of wealth, which preserved in a great measure the homogeneity of society.

Prominent among the agencies were the matrimonial alliances so often contracted between the families of the rich and poor. In fact, it was the rule for the active, intellectual, ambitious young men from the poorer families to marry the daughters of wealthy planters. Instead of attempting to restrain these alliances they were generally encouraged by wealthy parents with a view to preserving the physical and mental vigor of their families without sacrificing their estates. To employ a homely but expressive phrase, "brains and money were constantly combining" to build up and preserve in the old South the finest society in the world, to the exclusion of those twin evils, the millionaire and the tramp.

The fine moral and intellectual organization of Southern children has heretofore been largely due to the fact that their mothers were exempt from the hardships of physical drudgery and the depressing effects of impending want. The poorest man in the South supported his family with comparative ease, because of the gently rising gradations in society and the universal liberality of the stronger toward the weakest. How is it in those countries so long freed from the "curse of slavery," but where mechanical invention is progressively increasing the congestion of wealth and stimulating luxurious living among the rich, while it alarmingly swells the ranks of the hungry laborer, the socialist, and the pauper? Take Massachusetts, the "hub" of free schools, free labor, and boasted intelligence, as a fair representative. The average expenses of laboring men, who are the heads of families, in Massachusetts amount to $754.42, while their earnings average $558.68. In other words, the workingman falls short of a support for his family $195.74, or 32 per cent. It is wrung from the toil of the mother and children, not through the discharge of the ordinary domestic duties of woman's sphere, but in the wages mill. Again he says:

One-third of the enterprises of great pith and moment, rather than the nursery of scribblers. She has made history for others to write and sell. She has carved with the sword the pathway of the pen and made America the stronghold of the Anglo-Saxon race. The first resolutions declaring the right of the colonies to be "free and independent" were introduced into a Southern Legislature by a Southern man. The first resolutions to the same effect were presented in the Colonial Congress by another Southern man, and took form and consistence in the Declaration of Independence, under the matchless genius of still another Southern man. A Southern man led the patriot armies to victory, and established the possibilities of the proudest nation on the earth. A Southern man was prime mover of the convention that framed the Constitution. When the Government had been created, its organic law was still an unexplained book, a ponderous oar in unskilled hands.

It was left for the greatest legal mind of the age, a Southern Chief-Justice, to analyze and stamp upon it the construction which will be accepted as long as the Constitution is respected. A Southern man framed the ordinance for the organization and government of the great Northwestern Territory, an instrument second in importance only to the Constitution of the United States. A Southern man was the author of the Republican theory of popular government which prevailed during the sixty years of our greatest prosperity, peace, and happiness. Of the fifteen Presidents of the Continental Congress, eight were from slave States. From 1789 to 1853, a period of sixty-four years, embracing eleven administrations, the slave States furnished eight Presidents, whose terms of service covered fifty-two years.

During the same time the free States furnished three Presidents, whose combined terms covered twelve years. Of twelve Vice-Presidents, four were from slave States. Under these eleven administrations, the slave States supplied fourteen Secretaries of State, eleven Secretaries of War, six Secretaries of the Treasury, nine Secretaries of the Navy, and eight Postmaster-Generals. Of fifty-five Presidents pro tempore of the Senate, thirty-one Speakers of the House, twenty-two were from slave States. Of five Chief-Justices, two, and the only two of great eminence, were from slave States. Of twenty-nine Associate-Justices, seventeen were from slave States. Of twenty-one Attorney-Generals, fourteen were from slave States. Of one hundred and eighty-five public ministers to foreign countries, ninety-nine were from slave States.

Without going further into exhaustive details, for which material is abundant and overwhelming, we affirm, without fear of decent denial, that along the lines of these fifty-two years are ranged all the broad and lofty conceptions of statesmanship, all the bold and fruitful enterprises, all the grand and comprehensive achievements from which have evolved the pride, the power, and the glory of the American people.

The war of 1812 was scarcely less important in its results than the war of independence. The one left us an embryonic nation; the other developed full-grown power, wiping out the results of twenty-five years, planting our flag upon the ocean and dissolving every doubt in the minds of foreign powers that we were a government, de facto, and entitled to a place in the front rank of nations. This war, we are told by a Northern historian, "was a Southern measure for the protection of Northern interests;" yet it was inaugurated and pressed to a triumphant issue under the administration of a Southern slaveholder, supported by a "solid South," in the face of the almost solid opposition of the free States. Who were the master spirits of that struggle? Such men as Clay, Calhoun, Monroe, Grundy, Lowndes, and Crawford; while only five Senators north of the Delaware voted to sustain it.

In the gloomiest and most critical days of the conflict, New England, which "writes all the books," was holding a secession convention, denouncing the war and intriguing with the emissaries of Great Britain. As a consequence, when England sent her powerful fleet to invest our ports, she exempted the coast of New England from the operations of the blockade. When the success of the war had established its popularity in the free States, a Southern man formulated the financial policy which extinguished its immense debt in less than twenty years.

Under these same "slothful and demoralizing" auspices of slavery the great Indian wars were fought, their magnificent country opened to white settlement, the savages removed, and measures adopted for their civilization. Florida was acquired from Spain, and from France that vast domain, the Louisiana Territory, comprising more than one million square miles, greater in extent and richer in resources than the whole territory of the then existing United States, and giving us the sole ownership of the Mississippi River from its sources to the Gulf. This one achievement, conceived and accomplished by a Southern President, through the supreme skill and courage of a Southern diplomatist, overshadows in its stupendous proportions, outweighs in the vastness of its results every national measure presented by Northern statesmanship and secured by Northern enterprise since the landing at Plymouth Rock. It was this far-reaching stroke of Southern diplomacy which elicited from the great Napoleon the prophetic remark that the "acquisition of Louisiana forever strengthens the power of the United States and gives to England a maritime rival that will some day humble her pride."

The war for the independence of Texas and the administration of its government by its Southern Presidents was another manifestation of the "slothful energies" of the "dependent idlers" and "overseers." The war with Mexico and the annexation of Texas were assailed by the free States with the same vehement opposition which they had presented to the last war with England; but a Southern President again held the helm, the pluck and patriotism of the "gentlemen idlers" once more prevailed, and Columbia took in her embrace the giant of whom it has been graphically said: "If Texas were laid on the face of Europe, with the head resting on the mountains of Norway, one palm covering London and the other Warsaw, it would stretch across the kingdom of Denmark, across the empires of Germany and Austria, across Northern Italy, and bathe its feet in the Mediterranean."

It is capable of producing 12,000,000 bales of cotton and will have a cattle range left larger than the whole State of New York. This war, prosecuted by the enervated, non-progressive "overseers," gathered into the national domain also the Territory of New Mexico, itself larger than the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; extended the national boundary to the Pacific, and opened to the world the Golden Gate of California.

Mr. Tillet, in his haste to elevate the new South by degrading the old, forgets that most of the representative men of the new South, her Senators, Congressmen, Cabinet officers, governors, judges, jurists, leading journalists, college professors, eminent divines, and successful men of business in every line were born and educated under the "curse of slavery." There is no new South. The term is a misnomer and a myth. It is simply a phrase costume in which old prejudices masquerade through modern prints, seeking to pervert the education of Southern children into the conviction that their ancestors, if not criminal, were little more than a race of "idiots," blunderers, blockheads, and failures. But the present or future generations will never find reason to be ashamed of the brainwork of the old South.

But I want to take a little time to talk about the constituency I represent here. Our great staple product, Mr. Chairman, is cotton. We raise cotton for sale, and we sell it in the markets of the world. The Government fixes no price and makes no law that requires any man to pay more for that cotton than we can get for it in Liverpool.

I wish I had time to explain fully to some of you gentlemen who have not seen it the process of making cotton. We commence getting ready for it in January, and we get through with the crop about February in the next succeeding year. We bed the ground, put the seed in, and the cotton comes up.

First the cold nights come and nip it, then the cotton becomes "possum eared," then it takes "sore-shin," then it gets "lousy" [laughter]; the cut-worms cut it down, and it does seem in spite of all the planter can do that he is going to lose his crop of cotton. Then after passing through these trials grass begins to come and he has to work it out, and he has the greatest trouble in the world in saving a stand. If he gets it through this stage then he has got the drought and the flood, the cyclone and the simoon, to contend against; but if he gets through these difficulties and he gets his cotton up, then it begins to "rust," the red rust or the black rust; then it begins to blight; then comes frenching and the shedding of squares and forms; then comes the "army-worm," and then the "boll-worm;" then if it escapes all these, when it begins to open the rains and winds come and knock it out and get it dirty; that injures the price. Now, with all these difficulties to be encountered, it can readily be seen that he has great difficulty in reaching what he started out in the spring to get. He never makes as much as he thought he would or ought to make.

But, then, if he escapes all these and gets through with it, he begins to gather the cotton in the fall. I wish I had time to tell you about how these crops were produced just after the war; with what sort of horses and tools we made the cotton out of which you gathered that $68,000,000 now lying in your Treasury as the cotton tax. I know all about it, for with these "lily-white hands" I helped to make it. [Laughter and applause.]

But then the man who has gone through with all of these things takes his children, after the crop is open, and gathers it; and he hauls it to the gin-house and gins it and packs it into bales and takes it to market. A few bales only he gets, for the best he can do, the result of his own labor and that of his family for a whole year, is from three to five bales, which will be an average yield for a small family, and it brings him from $40 to $50 per bale, or $150 to $250 for his crop. Now, gentlemen, tell me is it exactly the right thing to say to that man when he takes that cotton to market, "Sir, you must contribute 47 per cent. of what you buy, or 25 per cent., or any other per cent.—I do not care what it is—to enable the capitalists in New England to get 22 per cent. on their investment?"

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me a question for information? I do not wish to interrupt him——

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. If I can have my time extended I should be very glad to do so.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended. I desire to ask him a question upon this very subject of the New England manufacturers, and to whom he says the cotton producers pay 40 or 47 per cent., which he alleges to be extorted from them. Is it not true that the goods that your Southern people buy from these manufacturers are sold to them to-day at a reduction of 30 per cent. from what they were a few years ago, and for less than they bought them before the tariff was imposed? And do they not get a much better price for their cotton than they got for it before the war?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Let me give you a little statement. You all say that the tariff makes cheaper goods?

Mr. MILLIKEN. It is an absolute fact.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. And they tell us in the next breath that it is necessary to keep up the tariff to enable the manufacturer to get a better price for his goods and to enable him to pay higher wages for his labor. Now, I have no doubt a statesman can see through that; but just to a common country fellow like myself, you know [laughter]—"now you see it and now you don't see it" [laughter]—there is a great deal of thimble-rigging about that to my mind. "You must keep up the tariff to keep up prices; but the tariff brings down prices." I do not see the logic of that. If the tariff brings down prices what do the manufacturers want with a tariff?

Mr. GUENTHER. Because you are color blind.

Mr. KERR. Is it not a fact?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Well, you say it is, but I can not see it.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Read history and you will find it is so.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Yes, it is like most of the facts you give us upon this subject.

Now, gentlemen, I want to say we have been told, and told here upon this floor, here in this debate, that "the tariff has made New England what it is, and is going to give you people in the South, whenever you accept all the beneficial provisions, all that great prosperity that pertains to New England." To hear these gentlemen talk you would suppose that they put the tariff upon the same ground as the plan of salvation; it is a thing you have to accept in order to get the benefit of it. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, we have been going on with this thing for the last fifty years. When these men take their cotton to market and the man gets back home, and his wife and little children gather around him and ask, "What did you bring us back for this cotton we helped to make?" "Well," he says, "not much, because I had to pay my debts and my taxes, and then I had to pay 47 per cent. of my cotton crop to enable the manufacturer of New England to get 22 or 25 or 50 per cent. on his capital invested in manufacturing."

Take the figures produced here by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and say if he did not show by those figures what I am now stating. If the statistics do not show that they do not show anything. And gentlemen are ready enough to rely on the census and other statistics when they are in their favor.

Mr. FORAN. Allow me to say——

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. You have had your say. I do not yield.

When the little girl of that cotton-planter retires at night do not you reckon she prays, "O, Lord, be merciful to the manufacturer of New England and hasten the day when he will get enough to allow us to have some of the proceeds of our cotton to bring home at Christmas time to buy a few of the luxuries of life?" [Laughter.]

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. My time has nearly expired.

Mr. BAYNE. We will extend your time. Is the price of cotton fixed at London or at Boston?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. It is fixed at Liverpool.

Mr. BAYNE. Does not the British manufacturer treat you in the same way as the Boston manufacturer?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Yes; but he does not levy any tariff on us. It is the Boston man who gets the tariff, not the British man. [Applause.] If the Boston man gave us any more for our cotton than the Britisher, it would be a reasonable exchange, but he does not. [Applause.]

I said a while ago they have been telling us all along for years and years back, all this is going to come back to you after a while; we will give you a home market and your money will find its way back to your pockets. Well, gentleman, let me tell you about that. I had a letter yesterday morning giving me the names of several old veterans in my State who fought in the Seminole wars, who fought in the Indian disturbances and Mexican war, and who are now very old. Old man Hiram Richardson, Capt. Benjamin Lorridge, old man Johnnie Phillips, Mr. Sam Ross, Mr. Thomas Cunningham—whole lot of old men down there who fought the battles of your country years ago, and are now old and some of them poor. They have been paying out their money for the benefit of New England for fifty years, and are going to die before it gets back to them. Would it not be a little better to allow these old men to keep their own money?

A MEMBER. They can not take it with them.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. No, they can not take it with them, as the gentleman suggests. That is the trouble. But they might have some of the pleasures and some of the benefits while they are here—if they could keep what they work for. But gentlemen on that side say it is going to come back. These old men and their sons and daughters have been deprived of the advantages they might have had but for the iniquities of the tariff. It will never get back. My doctrine is to let every man keep his own money and spend it as he pleases, unless it is necessary for the support of the Government.

Is it exactly the right thing to do to take that money away from these people to add to the profits of capital? You talk to me about capital. I have no prejudice against capital. But a gentleman passed me here the other day with a petition in his hand protesting against the passage of the Mills bill, and he said there were 320 names on it, representing $350,000,000. And that has been heralded here as a reason why this bill should not pass. Suppose I had brought here a petition signed by 320 poor honest citizens of my district—I could have brought one signed by 20,000 of them. Suppose I presented such a petition; no one on that side would have attached any importance to it. But I say, for my part, I care more for the capital of the man whose capital is his sweat, whose capital is his muscle, whose capital is his energy; I say that appeals more to me than the petition signed by 320 names representing $350,000,000, making a protest against this legislation, and demanding more of the blood, more of the sweat, more of the energy of the toiling masses of this country than they have been getting already. When such a petition comes I spit upon it with contempt; 320 men having $350,000,000 can afford surely to rest on moderate profits. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, they tell us to "Hold on, hold on; this thing will come out all right. It is a little hard on you people now, but it is the making of the home market; it is the making of New England." It reminds me of the old chestnut—you have all heard it—but it illustrates the point as well as a new one would, of the young fellow who took his daddy out to help him train his dog to be a bear-dog. The old fellow acted as the bear; the puppy got the old man by the nose and was giving him fits, when he shouted to the boy, "Help, come take him off." "Oh," said the boy, "daddy, hold on, stand it, it is hard on you, but it is the making of the pup. [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GUENTHER. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I am very much obliged to the committee, because, although I do not wish to tire the gentlemen present or to trespass upon the time of those who are to follow me, there are one or two other things that I do wish to call attention to in connection with these protests that have been received from the manufacturers against the passage of this Mills bill. I remember that a few years ago when our people, many of them, were shaking with chills and malarial fever, because they were not able to buy quinine at $3.50 an ounce, a proposition was made here by some benevolent gentleman to give them free quinine. The subject has been referred to before in this debate but I want to bring to the attention of you gentlemen whose hearts are moved by the appeals that are coming in from the manufacturers the circumstances surrounding that quinine legislation.

When that bill was before the House it gave rise to some discussion, and I find that one gentleman [Mr. BINGHAM] said: "It is a bill that ought not to pass." Mr. Chairman, what was the condition of affairs at that time? Quinine was selling at $3.50 an ounce, and the duty upon it was 20 per cent. What is the condition now? Why, sir, it is selling, I believe, at from 35 to 50 cents an ounce. Now, if I were to adopt the protectionists' mode of argument, I would ascribe this entire reduction from $3.50 to 50 cents an ounce to taking off the duty, but I will not indulge in any such absurdity. In passing I want to say a word about the arguments of the protectionists. I commenced my speech by saying that I thought taxation was a curse, to be resorted to only as a matter of necessity, but if the protectionists are right, all my early training and ideas on that subject are at fault. I was reading some time ago that beautiful but depressing story written by Dr. Johnson, "Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia." Dr. Johnson begins the tale, you remember, by saying: "Ye who listen with credulity to the whispers of fancy and pursue with eagerness the phantoms of hope, who expect age will perform the promises of youth, and that the deficiencies of the present day will be supplied by the morrow attend to the history of Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia."

Then he goes on with the story and tells how the prince escaped from the happy garden and wandered off all over the world and visited all the wise men of the earth in search of the true secret of perfect happiness and prosperity. He went everywhere, and finally came back to the happy valley feeling like Solomon of old, that all was vanity and vexation of spirit.

But, sir, what a pity it is that he had not met a modern protectionist! The whole question would have been solved for him at once. He would have asked: "What is the secret of universal happiness and prosperity?" and the answer would have been, "Taxation! Taxation!" That answers the whole question. Every good that has come to the people of this country is ascribed to tariff taxation. Tell me of a single solitary benefit that they do not attribute to protection. There is not one. But I started out to tell you about the quinine. [Laughter.] Mr. BINGHAM said "it is a bill that ought not to pass," but a vote was taken on the bill.

Before that vote was taken, however, the quinine people sent in their protest, and that is what I want to call attention to now. I have here the original protest sent to the Committee on Ways and Means with the autograph signatures of the quinine manufacturers predicting what would be the results of the enactment of the bill. I wish gentlemen could read it all. It is on the stereotyped plan of the protests of the manufacturers of to-day who are sending their protests against the Mills bill, gotten up very much like the protests against the reduction of the duty on curled hair, very much after the order of the protests against the reduction of the duty on bone-black, and other such protests that have come here from time to time.

Now, what do these gentlemen (the manufacturers) say about quinine? They ask:

> Why should objection be made to a duty of 20 per cent.? Why should the chemical industry be singled out to be ruined?

They are going to be ruined, you see.

> Will the consumer be benefited? We assert most emphatically he will not. Prices will fluctuate; average rates will be as high or higher than they have been during the existence of the protective tariff. But even should the wholesale price be as low as now at times, a consumer using it in small quantities will get no benefit from it. In whose interest, then, is the duty to be reduced?

And so they go on and say that it will close their works, that it will be the last of the quinine industry in this country, and that the people of this country will then have to pay a good deal more for their quinine than they are paying, and they figure out exactly how the increase will be made and how the people will have to pay a great deal more. Well, I see by the RECORD that some gentlemen were "taken in" by that appeal. I see that my neighbor from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] voted against free quinine. I see that Mr. BINGHAM voted against it. I see that Mr. BURROWS voted against it.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman, but I wish to inquire of the Chair if the time of the gentleman from Mississippi was extended without limit.

The CHAIRMAN. It was extended without any limit being made, which, in the absence of any other understanding, would mean that it was extended for one hour.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I will put a limit on it myself pretty soon. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, to continue this quinine case. I see that Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, voted against free quinine; I see that Mr. PHELPS voted against free quinine, a gentleman who, I noticed in the papers this morning, made a few disinterested remarks the other day to the colored men in favor of protection, and urged them to stand by protection for the sake of their colored brethren in the South. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is it not a fact that the cinchona bark from which quinine is made is not and can not be produced in this country, and that when quinine was put on the free-list, except in so far as the manufacture was concerned, it was like putting coffee and tea on the free-list, or any other article that we can not produce here? And, that being so, was it not an act directly in the line of the protective policy to put quinine on the free-list?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. No, sir; they manufacture quinine here from the bark; and here is the protest of these protectionists against reducing the duty on quinine, because it would destroy that industry in which so many men were engaged and which such good wages were paid.

Mr. MILLIKEN. But is the bark produced here?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. No, sir. But the duty was not on the bark; it was on the quinine, the manufactured article. [Laughter].

Mr. MILLIKEN. But there would have been no duty on quinine if the bark had not existed.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Now, is not that a wise answer? "There would be no quinine if there were no bark." That is about on a par with the protectionist's ordinary ideas.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Do you dispute the proposition?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. No, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. As the time of the gentleman from Mississippi has been extended, will he allow me a question?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Oh, yes.

Mr. DAVIS. I understood the gentleman to take the position that his constituents are very much burdened and oppressed by the increased cost of dry goods—cotton cloth.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. We are on quinine now. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. I know you are on that now, but you were on the other a while ago. I do not know much about quinine, because I am out of the medical business now, but I know some little about cotton cloth. I wish the gentleman to state whether he has any idea how much his people are oppressed by the tariff on cotton goods—how much more the gentleman pays for his cotton goods than the Englishman pays at his own home.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Does quinine hurt you, doctor, that you want to get me away from it? [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose the gentleman understands my question. I will let him stick to quinine, if he prefers it.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Very well; I prefer it.

Mr. KERR. In regard to quinine, is it not true that since the removal of the tariff on this article there has been discovered a process of obtaining the bark without killing the tree, as was formerly done? Is not that the fact?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. It is the fact, as I understand; but that is not the thing I am talking about. I am talking about the assertion of these people engaged in manufacturing quinine that if the duty were removed we would kill the industry and thereby deprive of employment and wages the laborers engaged in that manufacture. I am not talking about killing the tree; that was not the objection which was made.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman allow me now to turn to the question of cotton goods?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I am not through with quinine yet.

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, very well.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Will the gentleman from Mississippi allow a namesake and friend to make a suggestion?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Will not the gentleman from Mississippi limit his time so far as to decline to allow his remarks to be broken in upon by further questions? I ask this in behalf of gentlemen who have an interest in being heard after the gentleman from Mississippi has concluded.

Several MEMBERS. That is fair.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I hope the gentleman will limit himself, and not allow anybody to interrupt him.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I shall not occupy, I think, more than fifteen minutes. Of course, if I want to give some part of that to Mr. DAVIS or some other member, there will be no objection.

I want to say something further in regard to this quinine business. Senator MORRILL, who, as gentlemen know, is an authority on the subject of tariff, said, when this bill taking off the duty was passed in the Senate:

> Then, Mr. President, it is manifest that the parties concerned in this business have already engaged a large amount of raw material. They will be closed at once, although the duty is but 20 per cent. on the article.

Now, here is the moral in this thing; I want you all to bear it in mind. The quinine manufacturers sent their protest here, asserting that if this duty of 20 per cent. upon quinine were removed their factories would be closed and their men thrown out of employment and the price of quinine would be higher. The friends of protection in the House and the Senate made the same declaration, that the effect would be to close that business. Now, I want you gentlemen to take in this point: If this prediction, made by those who desired the duty on quinine continued, was not fulfilled; if the manufacturers went on and increased their business in spite of the removal of the duty; if thus the gentlemen who voted against putting quinine on the free-list were mistaken, may they not be mistaken about curled hair and black bones and other things? [Laughter.]

Is it exactly the right thing for a man who has been so badly mistaken about quinine to set up his judgment now as infallible in regard to the effects of a reduction upon other branches of business, and to protest against any reduction of the tariff? Why, sir, here are Powers & Weightman, who, we are told, would be thrown out of business, whose employés, we were informed, would be turned loose; why, sir, as the history of this industry shows, their factory was burned out soon after this removal of the duty, yet they have prospered to such an extent that they have rebuilt their factory, the labor engaged in the manufacture of quinine has increased, and wages have not diminished.

Mr. GUENTHER. Is the gentleman quite sure that the statement he has just made is correct?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. That is my understanding.

Mr. GUENTHER. It may be your understanding; but I do not think you are right.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I know that the firm is still in business, for I had a circular from them a day or two ago.

Mr. GUENTHER. They are in business; but the gentleman must bear in mind that they manufacture a great many other articles than quinine.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. But they are still in the quinine business.

Mr. GUENTHER. To some extent, certainly. But I know of one establishment that removed their factory to Cassel, in Germany, in consequence of the abolition of the duty.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. And several others were set up here in its place.

Mr. GUENTHER. I want to ask the gentleman whether he ascribes the lowering of the price of quinine to the removal of the duty.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Not wholly.

Mr. GUENTHER. Well, I am glad the gentleman does not.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I do not ascribe it to that cause wholly, because 20 per cent. would not take off $3 from $3.50. But here is the thing I have been trying to impress upon the gentlemen—this removal of the duty did not break up the business.

Mr. GUENTHER. To some extent it did.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. No, sir. The business is better than it was before; there are more people engaged in it, and more money is paid out for wages.

Mr. DAVIS. As an economical question the tariff on dry goods is far more important. There are hundreds of millions of dollars of capital invested in their manufacture in New England. Now, how much does your proposed tariff impose upon the Mississippi planter or the laborer by the tariff on cotton goods?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I do not know; but I do know the gentlemen on that side of the House deny it imposes any, and here is the thing I told you some time ago I could not understand. If it does not make the price higher what in the name of common sense do you want protection for? [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to ask you the extent of the burden which is put upon the Mississippi planter or laborer by the tariff on cotton goods. I would like him to answer, if he knows, the amount of that burden. If not, with his permission I will state the extent of it, as shown by the comparison made by Mr. Carroll Wright, the Commissioner of Labor, of the comparative cost of dry goods in Massachusetts and Great Britain:

Dry goods.—From the high, medium high, medium, medium low, and low prices for dry goods, we secure two percentages, both in favor of Great Britain. If all goods in all grades are compared we find that dry goods were 13.26 per cent. higher in Massachusetts in 1883 than in Great Britain. If the comparison is made on the basis of all goods in the medium, medium low, and low grades, from which workingmen obtain their supplies, the figure in favor of Great Britain is .9, or less than 1 per cent.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

This is the cost in Great Britain and Massachusetts, respectively. It would cost something of course to get those goods across the water. That is the cost, and with the revenue tariff the cost to the consumer should not be higher here than there.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. How about the other 4,000 articles in the tariff?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. You see, doctor, the trouble is we are forced to buy them from you people. But I do not wish to lose my time, as I have a great many other things to say; and I wish especially to make some remarks about the practice of forming "trusts." Gentlemen say they form trusts in reference to things not protected. That is true; and those are commodities of this country alone. But they form trusts on things which are protected. And right here I will take a minute or two to refer to the gentleman from San Francisco [Mr. MORROW]. I believe he sent up a wail here the other day about the failure of Coleman & Co., whose borax production was about to be interfered with by this tariff bill. Because of that he said they had failed. I have the thing right here and would like to refer to it.

Now, here is one of the complaints against the Mills bill. The failure of that firm is attributed as a result of the Mills bill. I see it stated in the public prints that Mr. Coleman had signed an agreement for his firm limiting the total production of borax from 3,800,000 tons to 1,200,000 tons, under which arrangement the price had risen from 3 cents to 6 and 8 cents.

Mr. MORROW. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. MORROW. Before the native article was produced in the market the price for forty years was never less than 28 cents, and from that they have reduced it to 6½ cents.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Before it was produced in the market. Who produced it? God produced it. It does not need any protection. It is mined and taken out of the earth. It is not produced.

These gentlemen who had the control of this borax production have formed trusts and agreed, as I have said, that only so much shall be produced in order to keep the price up. But it seems that the Mills bill has struck that down in some way. I say, "Go for them, every mother's son of them." [Laughter.] And if there can be no worse charge made against the Mills bill than that it has destroyed these trusts and every man engaged in them, I say it has done a grand good wook. Only go on and keep doing the same thing, and when all these trusts have been broken down we will have a general revival of business all over the country. I wish I had words with which I could burn them on the language of Mr. Touts I would cook 'em. [Laughter and applause.]

But let us see how this firm of Coleman & Co. have been broken down by the Mills bill. The assets of the firm are stated to be $4,500,000, and their liabilities at $2,000,000. I wish you would break me to-morrow in the same way. [Laughter.] Yet these people are complaining of the injury done to the production of borax, while the poor laboring people in the country are oppressed with taxation and demanding relief from that taxation.

Ah, gentlemen, this may be a menace, it may be a menace to the trusts of this country, and I thank God it is; but it is a menace that every honest consumer and every tax-payer will hail with delight. I wish, Mr. Chairman, I could say all that I feel on this subject. I here give you a table of the protected interests that have formed a trust to put up prices on the people. It will be seen that the average protection which the tariff allows these eighteen trusts is 30 per cent., while the average cost of labor is 24 per cent., which gives them a bonus of 6 per cent. after paying for all the labor:

Name of trust.	Protected by duties averaging, per cent.	Adjusted to guaranty a bonus in each $100 of product amounting to—	Their whole expense for labor in $100 worth of product being—

This speech has been made pursuant to some notification which I gave on yesterday, but in the disconnected and disjointed way in which I have talked I am afraid it will pan out very much like the speech of a friend of mine. He telegraphed me that he had made a speech, and for me to buy the papers the next morning and that I would find out about it. The papers had always been very kind to my friend, and I had no doubt they would have a good word to say for him, so I bought a paper. It was not very comforting. [Laughter.] It said he had been called upon at a public meeting to make a speech, but he was evidently not prepared. [Great laughter.]

I had intended in speaking about the cotton culture, and what the cotton planters of the South had done for this country, to show, I have the statistics here, something of what these people—the conton-planters and the laborers of the South—have done for the country in planting and rearing cotton. Why, sir, they have produced more than one hundred million bales of cotton since the close of the war, and brought into this country the enormous sum of nearly $5,000,000,000 from exports, besides furnishing to the manufactories of New England the sinews with which to carry on their immense manufactu ring enterprises. Think of it that these thriftless Southern cotton planters, as you are pleased to call them, have furnished for export nearly $5,000,000,000 worth of cotton since the war. This has kept the balance of trade in favor of this country, it has filled your Treasury with gold and enabled your Government in a most critical financial period to resume specie payment. I wish I had time to read you some interesting statistical tables I have prepared on this subject.

Do they not deserve some consideration? Are they to be turned out of this Hall with the statement that they come from a race of people that are bound hand and foot by prejudice? Ah, sir, I wish I had time to go into that whole question, but I do not desire to detain the House further. I only wish to say that I do not care in which end of the Capitol the gentleman stands up to say it, but for the people of the South I assert that he who intimates or charges that they have any aspirations inconsistent with the honor and the glory of this country, or the prosperity and the welfare of all of its people, he either does not know whereof he speaks, or he willfully and maliciously perverts the truth, and slanders a brave and honorable people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We can not, sir, have all the wealth of New England, and while we glory in their wealth and their prosperity I must say that when I am told about it I feel a little like the man who said that he saw but little consolation to him to be told that he and Jay Gould had a hundred millions of dollars if Jay Gould had all of it. [Laughter and applause.] And while the prosperity of New England is a great thing, and a thing to be bragged about and all that, it is a poor consolation to know that New England has all the wealth and the prosperity and we are constantly being twitted with our poverty.

Why, what are the Southern people? They are a people who would like to avail themselves of all the privileges that are within their reach. Gentlemen are attempting to make them out as a stubborn people, and a people who will not reach out their hands and take what is offered. When I hear the gentleman from New Hampshire and the gentleman from Ohio coming up here and making love to each other, billing and cooing, it reminds me, and if I had my voice I would give it to you in song, of the cooing of Bettina and Pippo in the Mascot, when New England says: "I my factories love," and Ohio responds, "And I my sheep," and New England says, "When they make their biggest gobble, gobble, gobble" [great laughter], and Ohio says, "When they softly bleat, bah, bah." [Renewed laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I will not trespass further upon the time of the House. New England hens may lay more eggs than ours, the New England cows may give more milk than ours, but, sir, we of the South, thank God, though we have not much of this world's goods to brag about, we may not be able to boast of that intelligence in book-writing capacity that some other sections of the country have, but, sir, we have many of the prettiest, many of the best, and the noblest and truest, most virtuous women on God's green earth; and we have got some of the grandest, bravest, best, and most generous men in the world among us. [Great applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, if in the course of these few feeble and hurried remarks [laughter] I have said anything that is calculated in the least to reflect on or wound the tender sensibilities of the New England hen or the Ohio sheep, I ask pardon now, sir, and trust it will be granted. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, the many speeches already delivered and yet to be delivered on this question, abounding in figures, tables, and calculations in which the general and local interests of the country have been so ably discussed, have determined me, in the brief time that I shall take, to make only observations, without going into details, as to what would be the general result, in my judgment, if this bill should become a law, and what immediate effect it would have on the people whom I represent.

If we, in the deliberation of this important measure, which it is conceded by all involves the welfare of all the people, would thoughtfully examine each section when under consideration and vote thereon uncontrolled by the dictation of a caucus and uninfluenced by party policy, each member being governed by individual judgment obtained from his own personal observation and from the evidence and arguments advanced, then even this bill might be so perfected that its results would be beneficial.

Right here let me say that in my votes on the different propositions as they come up I shall not allow myself to be controlled by partisan spirit, but shall vote on each one according to my best judgment after being convinced that the vote so cast will be conducive to the interests of the whole people. I recognize that the masses of the Democratic party, who differ so radically with us on this question, are just as patriotic and just as much interested in the welfare, advancement, and glory of our country as those who belong to the party of which I am a member, and that they, in advocating the principle of non-protection, are actuated by pure and patriotic motives. While I have always been considered, and have always been, a firm believer and advocate of the Republican cause, yet I have never allowed party feeling so to sway me that I would not concede to my opponents a love of country and an honesty of purpose.

The President of the United States in sending his message to Congress and placing before the country the issue—shall the customs levied for revenue be so collected as to foster and protect home industries?—and by ranging himself and his party squarely against this proposition, has taken away all the possibilities of a deceptive campaign by his party in the different manufacturing States of this country. For this action he deserves the unqualified praise of every Republican. For years the Democratic party has deceived the people of my district, at least, as to the true status of their party on this question. Even my immediate predecessor, a Democrat, was proclaimed throughout the district a protectionist, and that it was not inconsistent but in accord with the principles of Democracy for him to be so. In vain will the political managers of the Democratic party in the manufacturing States again attempt to inaugurate their dishonest methods of campaign. The President of the United States, a Democrat, has effectually, by his message, proclaimed that it was dishonest to blow both hot and cold on this question. All honor to him for that!

Some of the Democrats from the manufacturing States of the North have comforted themselves by what they consider a fact, that this bill is not in the interests of free trade. From the majority of the speeches made by the members advocating the passage of this bill, in which they so glowingly set forth the deplorable condition of the country, attributing the same to the protective feature of the present law, and following closely their arguments, the result which will follow the passage of this bill will be free trade. Henry George, who is certainly one of the keenest observers of events, as he is also a close reasoner, says, in relation to the discussion in Congress of the bill, of the speech of Mr. MILLS, as follows:

> Mr. MILLS's speech in opening the tariff debate, as printed in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, justifies the impression produced by the telegraphic reports. It is a manly, vigorous, and most effective free-trade speech, abounding with telling points that go to the very heart of protection. It ought to be largely circulated as a campaign document.

Also of the speech of Mr. MCMILLIN, he says:

> If there remained in the mind of any one a lingering doubt lest the issue between the two giant parties should be belittled into a mere question of tariff tinkering, Mr. MCMILLIN's speech on the reopening of the tariff debate on Tuesday last should dispel it. "I would be gratified," said the Tennessee Congressman, "to have any man explain the justice of requiring one man to contribute a tax in order to make another man's vocation." This is not talking tariff reduction. It is talking free trade.

Mr. Chairman, I am a protectionist, and am so because from observation I am satisfied that the results of a protective tariff are beneficial to the people. Let me give to this committee an uncolored statement of the condition of the people of one of the largest manufacturing districts, whose welfare would be jeopardized by the passage of this bill. Essex County constitutes the Sixth Congressional district of the State of New Jersey. The city of Newark, located in this county, has a population of 165,000, and out of this number there are employed in the different trades nearly 49,000. The city of Orange and the townships have a population of about 50,000, and the number of employed is estimated at 10,000. It has often been asked of me what was manufactured in my district, but the question what was not manufactured there, would be more easily answered.

We manufacture thread, leather, hats, jewelry, clothing, sewing-machines, buttons, trunks, corsets, shoes, brass goods, celluloid, engines, boilers, harness and saddlery, paper boxes, pottery, fertilizers, tin-ware, iron and steel, silk, hardware, tools, smeltings, cutlery, sash and blinds, carriages, undergarments, shirts, bags and satchels, straw hats, iron moldings, files, shades, zinc, chemicals, cigars, saws, locks, varnish, skates, coach-lamps, wall-paper, clocks, faucets, smoothing-irons, lime and cement, brushes, all kinds of machinery, tacks, licorice, needles, pianos, organs, awnings, carbon lights; and so I might continue to enumerate.

The present bill, if passed in the shape in which it now is, would materially affect many of the different industries of my constituents and the almost immediate result would be a reduction of the wages of the individuals employed in these industries. The present duty on most of the articles manufactured in my district represents about the difference between the wages paid to those employed in this country and those paid in Europe. It would be impossible to arrive at the conclusion, from careful observation of the existence of matters in my district, of those advocating the passage of this bill, that the protective tariff results only in the enormous profit of the manufacturer and the downtrodden and deplorable condition of the wage-worker.

Without fear of contradiction I make the assertion that manufacturers and employers, Democrats and Republicans alike, would pronounce such conditions founded on theory simply ridiculous, because in practice they do not exist. The average wages in all branches of trade in my district are from 100 to 150 per cent. higher than the wages paid in England. A large percentage of the mechanics of my district emigrated to this country from England, Scotland, Ireland, Germany, in fact from all nations of Europe. They left their mother country for the purpose of enjoying the blessings of free institutions and to better their condition. Let us see if they have accomplished their purposes.

If the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, or any other doubting Thomas who has in so glowing phrases sounded the glories of free trade, will accept my invitation I will take him to my district and will ocularly convince him that his theories and calculations are all wrong. I would take him first to the different sections of the city of Newark and show to him entire wards built up with comfortable and substantial dwellings owned and occupied by the mechanics and operatives employed in the various factories.

There are in Newark about thirty thousand dwelling-houses, and very few people own more than the house in which they live. Twenty-four thousand of these are owned by individual owners, the large per cent. by far being mechanics and wage-workers. I could point out to him many a mechanic who works at the bench adjoining that at which his employer is also busily engaged, who is, financially, in as good and oftentimes far better condition than the employer, who comes under the class so severely and unjustly denounced on the floor of this House as a bloated monopolist.

Mr. Chairman, it has always been a matter of pride to our city that, with the exception of a few industries the nature of which requires an enormous capital, the manufacturing industries are run in small establishments, the proprietor in almost all cases having been himself for years an employé, and whose share of the profits in comparison with the wages paid makes the result practically co-operative. I would further take him to the savings-banks of our city and show to him that our wage-workers have laid aside for a rainy day the sum of nearly $10,000,000. [Applause.]

There are many organizations which are in their nature beneficiary, acting in the capacity of life-insurers, which are supported by these mechanics. Then I would take him to the different building and loan associations, the bulk of whose members again are wage-workers, and show him their prosperous condition. But this is not all. I would then take him to the farming districts in mine and the adjacent counties, and the farmers there will tell him that they find a ready and a very profitable market for their productions.

From what I have seen, Mr. Chairman, in the different manufacturing cities throughout this country, the conditions existing in my district are not exceptional; and are we, by our votes, called upon by the Ways and Means Committee of this House to break down this system that has been so beneficial in its results? No. What they should strive for, and what the intelligent mechanic demands, is not the establishment of a policy that means to him a reduction of wages, but such legislation, as far as it can be had, that shall give to the individual worker a fair and just remuneration for his labor.

Do not, in your discussion of this question, gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee, think that you will be able to deceive the people. They well know that your monopolists and your millionaires have not been created by following manufacturing pursuits, for in these the intelligent wage-worker has, and will see to it that he shall receive his share of the profits, leaving but a reasonable recompense for the capital invested. No! they have heretofore been created by corrupt legislation, enacted in part here in the Halls of Congress and by the Legislatures of the different States, almost without exception, where designing men had succeeded by corruption and bribery to enact laws which enriched them and robbed the public. It should be a matter of congratulation that at last the American people have become aroused, so that political death will strike the man who will knowingly lift up his voice or give his vote for the passage of laws which have for their purpose the personal enrichment of one individual or set of individuals.

Mr. Chairman, when the people shall be fully informed of the manner in which their petitions have been treated by the Ways and Means Committee, and how their representatives have been denied the right of appearing before the committee to urge that justice should be done to their interests, they will become justly indignant. I introduced a bill which was referred to the Ways and Means Committee, in behalf of an industry which is now suffering from competition with the convict labor of the Austrian prisons. There has been no relief given in the Mills bill, and I am compelled to say to those engaged in that industry that a committee of the House refused to give a hearing, denying the right of explanation to their representative.

I am informed that all the petitions presented to this House and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means for consideration, signed by probably hundreds of thousands of workingmen, are filed up unread, unconsidered, and thus treated with contempt. This ignoring of the right of petition of the people will not do in a republican form of government, and they will resent the insult offered at the polls. In the opening of my remarks, I said that if the members would consider each section of the bill, and vote thereon uncontrolled by the dictation of a caucus, and governed by individual judgment obtained from their own personal observation and from the evidence and arguments advanced, even this bill might be so perfected that its results would be beneficial.

But there can be no hope that the bill will be so considered. The Democratic majority of this House—and I am now speaking of them as a party, not as individuals—has proven itself to be incompetent to enact proper legislation. I say this with the experience of the past few days before me. A more preposterous and outrageous piece of legislation than was the passage of the river and harbor bill never better deserved the unmitigated condemnation of an intelligent people. A bill appropriating nearly $20,000,000 passes this House, leaving out sufficient appropriations in cases where the necessity for improvement was great, and full of schemes which are questionable, to say the least of them, and placed there, it will be so considered by the people, for the purpose of catching votes, is rushed through, under a suspension of the rules, in thirty minutes, no opportunity for amendment being given.

I am much afraid that the remaining appropriation bills will be brought into the House and the endeavor made to pass them too, without due consideration. If the Republicans were in the majority and were responsible for such pernicious legislation, what a howl of indignation would be heard throughout the length and breadth of the land from the Democratic press. As in the river and harbor bill, the sections of this bill show that it was constructed for the purpose of obtaining votes. Salt is put on the free-list, an article cheap and the consumption of which forms but an inconsiderable item of expense in the household.

Take sugar, one of the heaviest expenses in every household, and we shall find the reduction but slight. Was the majority of the Ways and Means Committee casting their nets for the Louisiana vote? The speakers on the other side advocating the passage of this bill, have appealed to our patriotism to consider this question in an unpartisan spirit, and having done this they show their own inconsistency and the shallowness of their own patriotic motives by framing this bill in committee, from which the Republican members were excluded, and by calling a caucus inviting the members of their own party to propose such alterations and amendments which, if adopted by their caucus, are to bind the member to cast his vote for the passage of the bill. When the bill shall have thus been perfected they will bring it into this House and ask the Republican members to swallow, out of sheer patriotism, the nauseous dose which they have concocted.

Mr. Chairman, the only sure method of reducing the revenue is to place articles, if thought politic, on the free-list, or by reducing or abolishing the internal-revenue taxes. These taxes are the cause of the establishment of the most dangerous monopolies which we have in this country. The whisky ring is interested in keeping up the tax which prevents the man without capital from becoming a competitor. The tobacco interest is opposed to the total abolition of the taxes, because it would enable many skillful workmen with small means to start in business for themselves, and thus directly benefit the consumer both as to the quality and the cost of the article.

It is further unequal taxation, because the consumer pays the tax, and why should I, who do not smoke or use tobacco in any form, be thus exempted from my fair contribution to the expenses of the General Government?

In conclusion, I would say that the differences between capital and labor will soon be determined by the intelligent wage-workers, and while it is true that there have been and that there still will be strikes and lock-outs until these differences are adjusted, yet the conditions in this country, as depicted by the advocates of this measure, are overdrawn and exist only in their own morbid imagination. Few Democratic votes will be gained, but thousands will be lost by statements made on the floor of this House that the generation is even now here which will behold the Southern auctioneer standing in the market places of our Northern cities and selling the products formerly manufactured there in sight of the furnaces from which the smoke is no longer curling—articles which must be produced, and can only be so produced by underpaid labor; but this state of affairs, I predict, will never come to pass. Whenever the people of the South shall be able to produce articles which require in their manufacture skill and intelligence, the labor which is employed will by the peaceful revolution now going on receive its fair and just compensation; and in this fight the intelligent mechanic of the North will never submit to be reduced to the condition of his fellow-worker, white or black, at the South, but by combination and by powerful organization he will elevate to his own level his Southern brother.

Mr. Chairman, if this bill is considered, as all actions indicate it will be considered, in a partisan spirit, then I trust it will never pass this House. We should not let our actions be controlled by the effect it might have in the coming election. If in the coming election side issues are forced upon the Republican party, and questions purely social, moral, and religious in their character, belonging exclusively to the conscience of the individual, the home, the school and the church, are interjected, then the result even in our manufacturing State might be considered doubtful. If, however, this is made the only question at issue, as I think it should and will be, then my district, and I believe the State of New Jersey, will rebuke the men who have sought to cripple their industries by the overwhelming defeat of the Democratic party, it being responsible.

If this question was not of the most vital importance to my constituents, I should have contented myself with offering such amendments as their welfare demands when the bill comes up for consideration, but I should have thought myself derelict in my duties if I had not entered my formal protest against this legislation, the results of which would be disastrous. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] reserves the remainder of his time.

Mr. HOOKER. I move that the committee rise, if no gentleman on that side desires to speak this afternoon.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NELSON. I understand that the 5 o'clock adjournment rule does not take effect until we get through the general debate on the tariff bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It does not.

Mr. NELSON. Under the existing rule, as I understand, the time for adjournment is not reached until half-past five.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order adopted yesterday the time for the adjournment at 5 o'clock does not arrive until after the conclusion of the general debate on this bill. This day being Saturday, the time for adjournment would be 5 o'clock p. m., unless otherwise ordered by the House. The gentleman from Mississippi moves that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) had come to no resolution thereon.

JOHN FLETCHER.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 128) for the relief of John Fletcher.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to John Fletcher, of Franklin, Ind., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $3,450, for loss of cattle while in the employment of the United States, in the year 1870, by the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ADAMS. Let the report be read.

Mr. MATSON. The report is lengthy. I can state the facts.

Mr. ADAMS. Let the gentleman make the statement.

Mr. MATSON. This bill is for the reimbursement of a gentleman who was under contract to deliver certain cattle to a fort in one of the Territories; while under the orders of the officer supervising the contract, and while his party were moving from one point to another, they were stampeded by Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians, and he lost his cattle. The loss as found by the committee is placed at $3,450.

The matter has been repeatedly investigated in every recent Congress, beginning with the Forty-fifth. The bill has been reported favorably nine times by the House committee, and by the Senate committee as often. In the last Congress it passed both Houses, but did not reach the President in time for his signature.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MATSON. If any further explanation is desired, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL], chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, is prepared to give it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

E. B. EDDY.

Mr. MOFFITT. I call up from the Private Calendar, for present consideration, the bill (H. R. 7675) for the relief of E. B. Eddy, of Hull, Quebec.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $348.56, being the amount of customs duties improperly collected from said Eddy at the custom-house at Morristown, N. Y.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MOFFITT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE OVER TENNESSEE RIVER.

Mr. FORNEY. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill H. R. 8623.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections, if any.

The bill was read by its title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8623) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Tennessee River at or near Guntersville, Ala., and for other purposes, with amendments by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FORNEY. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the bill. It is recommended by the Committee on Commerce with amendments, and is in the usual form.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to dispensing with the further reading of the bill?

Mr. ADAMS objected, but subsequently withdrew his objection.

There being no further objection, the reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. FORNEY. There are amendments to be acted upon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the amendments will be voted on in gross.

The amendments were adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FORNEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF MARION, IOWA.

Mr. KERR. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill S. 1795.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 1795) for the relief of the First National Bank of Marion, Iowa.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $450 to the First National Bank of Marion, Iowa, as interest from October 1, 1880, to January 1, 1883, on United States 4 per cent. coupon bonds numbered 205 and 22703, for $500 each, and numbered 16847, 22135, 22138, and 5442, for $1,000 each, the coupons representing the interest on said bonds, for the period above indicated having been destroyed while detached from the bonds and in the custody of the United States postal authorities: Provided, however, That a satisfactory bond of indemnity shall be filed with the Secretary of the Treasury before said payment shall be made.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KERR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE NEAR CHATTANOOGA, TENN.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7564) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near Chattanooga, Tenn., and that the bill be put upon its passage. I will state that it is drawn in the usual form, contains the usual provisions, is approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War, and has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Commerce. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. Is there any amendment recommended?

Mr. NEAL. Yes; there are one or two amendments.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In section 2, line 11, after the word "bridge," insert "and equal advantages in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph companies."

In lines 23 and 24 strike out the words "Secretary of War" and insert "Light-House Board."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NEAL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill as amended was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SURVEY OF CERTAIN HISTORIC GROUNDS, ETC.

Mr. STEELE, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill (S. 354) to provide for the survey of certain historic grounds, locations, and military works.

Mr. ROMEIS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made, by an officer of the Engineer Corps, in co-operation with the Maumee Valley Monumental Association, an examination and inspection of each of the following-named historic grounds, locations, and military works, to wit:

The burial-place on Put-in-Bay Island of the sailors of the Navy in the war of 1812.

Fort Industry, at the mouth of Swan Creek, on the Maumee River.

Fort Miami, on the north and west side of the Maumee River, 7 miles above Fort Industry.

Fort Meigs, and the burial grounds of the soldiers of the war of 1812, near the same, on the south and east bank of the Maumee River, 10 miles above the mouth of Swan Creek.

A suitable portion of the battle-field of Fallen Timber, on the north and west bank of the Maumee River, 4 miles above Fort Meigs, where Anthony Wayne defeated the allied Indian nations under Turkey Foot, August 20, 1794.

Fort Defiance, at the confluence of the Auglaize and Maumee Rivers, erected by General Wayne in August, 1794.

Fort Wayne, at Fort Wayne, Ind., at the confluence of the St. Joe and St. Mary's Rivers, which was erected by General Wayne in October, 1794.

And he shall cause to be made a survey and full report to Congress of the location, situation, and condition of the same, and the amount of grounds necessary for the proper protection and improvement of the aforesaid works, forts, battle-fields, and burial places in and near the same, as well as the probable cost thereof; and the said report shall be accompanied with the necessary maps and drawings.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $150 is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the expense of the examination and inspection provided for in this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. OATES. I do not know that I am opposed to the bill, but I would like to have a little further opportunity to examine it before being called on to consider it.

Mr. STEELE. What is the amount of money appropriated by the bill?

Mr. ROMEIS. Only $150. The Senate has passed the bill twice.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been before the Committee on Military Affairs in two Congresses. It merely provides that an engineer officer shall go out there and define the lines of the property owned by the Government, with a view to any steps that may be taken hereafter for its protection or improvement.

Mr. OATES. If that is all the bill provides, I have no objection to it.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROMEIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The House bill (H. R. 1738) was laid on the table.

REFUND OF DUTIES TO THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1692) to refund duties paid by the State of New York on arms imported in 1863, and that the bill be put on its passage. This bill was before the House some weeks ago, and objection was then made to its consideration by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] because he wanted it amended by striking out the provision allowing the State a premium on the gold. That amendment has been adopted by the committee, and I think there can be no further objection to the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas an act entitled "An act to remit duties on arms imported by States," approved July 10, 1861, and the act supplementary thereto, approved July 25, 1861, have expired by limitation: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to refund, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the duties paid by the State of New York on arms imported in 1863, amounting to the sum of $42,796.87, which sum includes the premium paid in the purchase of gold for the payment of said duties: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied that the said arms were purchased in good faith for the use of the troops of the State of New York organized to aid in suppressing the then existing insurrection against the United States.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out all from the word "three," in line 7, to the word "Provided," in line 10, and insert the following: "Amounting to the sum of $30,943.96."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

A MEMBER. I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, from what committee does this bill come?

Mr. TRACEY. It is reported from the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

That this claim was presented to the Forty-ninth Congress, and a report was made in regard to it by the Committee on War Claims on the 23d of March, 1886. As the examination by your committee has led them to the same results with those arrived at by the committee of 1886, they do not think it necessary to recapitulate the facts, but refer to that report, and therewith annex a copy for information.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill referred to them do pass.

[House Report No. 12, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5011) to refund duties paid by the State of New York on arms imported in 1863, having examined the same and accompanying papers, submit the following report:

This claim is for duties paid by the State of New York on arms imported in 1863, and used in arming troops that were mustered into the service of the United States.

The foreign cost of the arms has been repaid by the United States, but the cost of importation has never been refunded. The application made by the State that it might be released from paying the duties was denied, for the reason that the act to remit duties on arms imported by States, approved July 10, 1861, and the act supplementary thereto, approved July 25, 1861, had expired by limitation.

It is evident that the foreign cost of the arms having been repaid by the United States, that part of their cost that the State was compelled to pay to the United States should also be refunded.

It seems to your committee that the duties paid were quite as much a part of the cost, charges, and expenses to the State in arming the troops as the original cost of the arms.

The duties were paid in gold, and at a time when the premium on gold was very high, which, of course, increased largely the expense to the State.

Your committee therefore recommend that said State of New York be reimbursed the amount of said duties paid on arms purchased by said State in 1863, and thus used in arming troops which were mustered into the service of the Federal Government, and that said bill do pass.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Subject to the right to make objection, I would like to inquire why this bill did not go to the Committee on Ways and Means, as it relates to the subject of refunding duties. I would like to know also whether there has been any correspondence with the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he has recommended this legislation.

Mr. TRACEY. Yes, sir; there is a letter from Mr. Secretary Folger, in which he recommends the refunding of the money, but does not commit himself on the point of paying a premium on the gold. That, however, is now stricken out. That was the feature of the bill which was objected to by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON], and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER], and which has heretofore delayed the passage of this bill through Congress. There is also a letter from Acting Secretary of the Treasury Fairchild reaffirming the statement made by Mr. Folger, and saying that he sees no reason to dissent from his conclusion.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Has the bill ever been before the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. TRACEY. It was before the Ways and Means Committee in the last Congress, but my understanding is that, under our rules, it had to go to the Committee on War Claims in this House.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. What was the action of the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. TRACEY. The Ways and Means Committee reported the bill favorably to the House, but it never was acted upon. That is my understanding. I was not a member of the House at the time.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. On the question of jurisdiction, why does the gentleman insist that the Committee on War Claims has jurisdiction over this matter?

Mr. TRACEY. I understood it was the opinion of the Speaker that it should go to that committee under the rules of this House of Representatives.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. The refunding of duties is a matter which comes distinctly under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. TRACEY. Well, Mr. Speaker, this is a matter in which I have no personal interest, and if the gentleman chooses to object, I suppose the bill must go over.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I dislike very much to object to a bill which the gentleman assures the House is entirely just and proper; but the claim is a considerable one, and the gentleman does not seem to present at this time any clear recommendation from the Treasury Department on the subject.

Mr. TRACEY. I have a number of papers here relating to the claim, but as I did not anticipate any objection I did not think it necessary to read them.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I should certainly feel bound to object, unless the claim were clearly made out.

Mr. TRACEY. With the permission of the House, I will read a letter dated February 7, 1884, from Charles J. Folger, then Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 7, 1884.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 4th instant, in regard to a claim pending before your committee, for the refunding of duties paid on arms purchased by the State of New York in 1863 and used in arming the State troops, which are stated to have been mustered into the service of the Federal Government; the State of New York being represented in the matter by J. B. Stonehouse assistant adjutant-general of the State.

A letter was addressed by this Department to the Speaker of the House of Representatives on January 12, 1882, transmitting papers connected with the matter.

In addition to what was stated in that letter and its inclosures, I may add that on July 27, 1861, Congress passed an act directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the governor of any State or its duly authorized agent, the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by such State for enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting these troops, etc.

The arms referred to in this claim were imported for the use of the State of New York, in equipping Federal troops, on which the State was compelled to pay the duties.

I understand that so far as the cost price of the arms is concerned, the State has been in part at least reimbursed under authority of the act referred to, but that the duties have not been refunded.

It seems to me that the duties paid were quite as much a part of the cost, charges, and expenses to the State in arming the troops as the original cost of the arms and freight paid thereon.

These arms were purchased and the duties paid at a time when the premium on gold was very high, which of course increased largely the expense to the State.

Whether any claim for the enhanced expenses on this account should be allowed is for the committee to consider.

I therefore recommend an allowance of the claim in such an amount as may be proven to the satisfaction of the committee to be proper.

I may add that the arms in question were not, as I understand, imported within the time specified in the acts approved July 10, 1861, and July 25, 1861 (12 Statutes, pages 255, 274), and so authority for refund of the duties in question was not accorded by the act last mentioned.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. J. FOLGER,
Secretary.

Hon. ABRAM S. HEWITT,
Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

Mr. BLAND. Inasmuch as the session of to-day must, under the standing order, close in a few minutes, I think we may as well adjourn. I make that motion.

Mr. CANNON. I wish the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] would allow me to have passed a bill involving only $100.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BLAND that the House adjourn, it was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill which has been read?

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask one or two questions in regard to this matter—in the first place, whether any claim of similar nature has ever been allowed?

Mr. TRACEY. Yes, sir. Let me read a communication on the subject from the Commissioner of Customs:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF CUSTOMS,
Washington, D. C., February 12, 1888.

SIR: In answer to your verbal request of this morning, I can see no objection to stating that the amount of $29,883.50, duties paid on imported arms by the State of New York, was refunded to that State in 1861 under the act of July 10, 1861.

Refunds were also made under similar circumstances to the States of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania.

Respectfully, yours,

JOHN S. McCALMONT,
Commissioner of Customs.

General J. G. FARNSWORTH,
Arlington Hotel, Washington, D. C.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand that this claim arose during the war.

Mr. TRACEY. Yes, sir; in 1863.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no recollection that such a claim as this has ever been passed by the House, though I may be entirely in error. If the gentleman has any instance to cite, I would be glad to have him do so, because this may be a precedent for other claims.

Mr. TRACEY. The duties in this case were paid under protest; and the chief of ordnance for the State of New York, in his report made at the end of that year, stated that it was fully understood the money paid for duties would be refunded.

The SPEAKER ro tempore. The Chair must state that the hour fixed by the standing order of the House for adjournment on Saturdays has arrived; and it is the duty of the Chair——

Mr. CANNON. I do not understand that the rule to which the Chair refers operates until the close of the general debate on the tariff.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the order now operating the House on Mondays and Saturdays must adjourn at half past 5 o'clock. The order fixing the hour of adjournment at 5 o'clock does not take effect until the close of the tariff debate. In pursuance of the standing order, the Chair is now compelled to declare the House adjourned until 11 o'clock on Monday next.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

By Mr. WALKER: Of citizens of the Fourteenth district of Missouri.

SENATE.

MONDAY, May 14, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of April 17, 1888, an estimate of the cost of removing a sand-bar recently formed at the entrance to the harbor of Block Island, R. I.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of March 27, 1888, certain information as to the necessity of fortifications upon Puget's Sound; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of March 27, 1888, certain information as to the appropriation necessary to carry into effect the joint resolution directing the Secretary of the Interior to investigate the practicability of constructing reservoirs for the storage of water in the arid regions of the United States, etc.; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What disposition does the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] desire to have made of the communication?

Mr. STEWART. Let it be printed, and I will look at it. I think it ought to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it should be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. STEWART. It looks to an appropriation.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will have to pass upon the question.

Mr. PADDOCK. Primarily it belongs to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think it belongs to the Committee on Agriculture. I would say with regard to it that a joint resolution has passed Congress at the present session directing the Secretary of the Interior, through the Geological Survey, to make investigations as to the arid regions of the United States, with a view of locating reservoirs and promoting irrigation.

Mr. PADDOCK. Is not that in the interest of agriculture?

Mr. STEWART. I think that it is dealing with the public lands. If the communication is to be referred to a committee, I think it ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PADDOCK. Very well.

Mr. STEWART. It deals with the question of public lands. It may be in shape, however, to go to the Committee on Appropriations as it is, but I suggest that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the communication will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands and printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of the senate and house of representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, praying for legislation which will prevent the immigration and importation into the United States of convicts, lunatics, idiots, and other persons liable to become a public charge; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of Charles E. French, of Boston, Mass., praying that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to refund and exchange bonds, with a view to the reduction of the public debt; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of A. D. Tansey, late postmaster at Plainfield, N. J., praying payment of the amount that was found due him by the Government on a readjustment of his salary, under the act of 1854; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. FARWELL presented a petition of citizens of Mercer County, Illinois, praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Edwards County, Illinois, remonstrating against any change in the Bureau of Animal Industry, as at present constituted, etc.: which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BUTLER presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston, S. C., remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill 1448 to create a national bureau of harbors and water ways; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston, S. C., praying that a law be passed which will provide for a reduction of letter postage from 2 cents to 1 cent an ounce; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Transportation of the State of Nebraska, praying for the passage of House bill 8367, providing for the regulation of the rates of railroad companies chartered by the United States by the States or Territories through which such railroads run; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. MORRILL presented a petition of citizens of Wallingford, Vt., praying for a more efficient protection of agriculture by preventing fraudulent importations of cattle; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALLISON presented a petition of citizens of Tombstone, Ariz., praying that provision be made for the settlement of claims for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the petition of George E. Jones, late postmaster at Boonesborough, Iowa, praying to be paid earnings as computed under the act of 1854, in the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General; which was referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. FAULKNER. I present a memorial of the Farmers' Alliance of Yellowstone County, Montana Territory, remonstrating against any change being made in the Bureau of Animal Industry as at present constituted, etc., and a memorial of the St. Louis (Mo.) Butchers' Union, consisting of 500 members, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Palmer bill for the extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other infectious diseases among cattle, and also thanking the Senators from Missouri and Kansas, Mr. VEST and Mr. PLUMB, for the facts so clearly set forth on the floor of the Senate in the debate on this bill. I move that the memorials lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a memorial of John Sunderland and 21 other citizens of Macon County, Missouri, remonstrating against the passage of the Palmer bill for the suppression of pleuro-pneumonia and other cattle diseases; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PALMER presented the petition of Anson H. Baker and 21 other ex-Union soldiers and sailors, citizens of Chesaning, Mich.; and the petition of James A. Meviele and 19 others, ex-Union soldiers and sailors, and Carrie E. Mr. CAMERON presented two petitions of citizens of Tionesta, Pa., praying for the repeal of that portion of the internal-revenue law classing druggists as liquor dealers, etc.; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of ex-Union soldiers and sailors, citizens of Harrisburg, Pa., praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MANDERSON. I present a petition of the board of transportation of the State of Nebraska, over their official seal, suggesting the fact that by the claim of the Union Pacific Railway Company, and other companies chartered by act of Congress, they are not subject to State control or legislation, and asking that proper legislation be had to produce the result that they shall be under such control.

As the petition is very short, but a few lines, and comes from one of the State boards of Nebraska, I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF BOARD OF TRANSPORTATION OF THE STATE OF NEBRASKA.

To the Senators and Representatives in Congress assembled, and to the Senators and Representatives from the State of Nebraska in particular:

It is known to you that the transcontinental railroads, and especially the Union Pacific Railway, chartered by act of Congress, claim that by virtue of such Federal act or acts of incorporation they are not subject to State control and legislation.

The board of transportation does not concede this claim, nor in any manner admit the same, but, on the contrary, contends and believes that Congress did not intend to create, and did not in fact create a corporation or corporations within the State limits superior to the State governments themselves, and not subject to police regulation and the local laws the same as domestic corporations, and that the highest judicial authority will ultimately so hold. Yet, nevertheless, as Congress has reserved to itself the power to amend each and every one of the several charters granted to these transcontinental corporations, it may be the shortest and quickest solution of this question to declare by Federal enactment the law upon this subject.

Such an act has been prepared and introduced in the House of Representatives by Hon. KNUTE NELSON, of Minnesota, a copy of which accompanies this communication. Therefore we, the board of transportation of the State of Nebraska, respectfully request and urge that you and each of you give this measure your cordial support. It is right and just and in accord with the spirit of our institutions and free government, and as in duty bound will ever pray.

Witness our hands and the official seal of the board of transportation of the State of Nebraska, this 26th day of April, A. D. 1888.

[SEAL.]

H. A. BABCOCK.
G. L. LAWS.
WM. LEESE.
C. H. WILLARD.
JOSEPH SCOTT.

Be it enacted, etc., That where any railroad company heretofore chartered or incorporated, or which hereafter may be chartered or incorporated by act of Congress, has built or constructed and operates, or shall build, construct, or operate a railroad through, across, or into the territorial limits of any State or Territory of the United States, the tolls, rates, and fares made or charged for the transportation of property and passengers over or upon such road or roads for traffic within the limits of a State or Territory, and the tariffs and schedules thereof, shall be subject to the legislative control of and by the several States and Territories through, across, or into which such road or roads are constructed, built, or operated, anything in the charter of, or acts of Congress creating such company or companies, or any law of any State or Territorial Legislature enacted in pursuance of such charter or act of incorporation, to the contrary notwithstanding.

SECTION 1. That section 1 of this act shall be limited in its operation, and shall apply only to the carriage and transportation by such company or companies of passengers and property wholly by railroad or partly by railroad and partly by water (when both are used under a common management, control, or arrangement), from one place or station to another place or station, both being within the territorial limits of one and the same State or Territory, and shall in no case apply to any commerce between the States, Territories, or into foreign countries.

Mr. MANDERSON presented a petition of ex-Union soldiers and sailors, citizens of Nebraska, praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLUMB. I present the petition of Capt. John Cowdon, praying that so much of the river and harbor bill as refers to the improvement of the Mississippi River be referred to the Committee on Improvement of the Mississippi River. I present the petition in duplicate, and I ask that one copy be referred to the Committee on Commerce and the other to the Committee on Improvement of the Mississippi River. I will state in connection with the petition, without any special knowledge in regard to the matter at issue, that in view of the fact that it is a subject of very serious discussion, I hope that one committee, or both, will arrive at some definite conclusion which will relieve Congress from this perpetual doubt as to whether the improvement which is being carried on is after the proper plan or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred as suggested, if there be no objection.

Mr. PLUMB presented a memorial of Cadmus Grange, No. 350, Patrons of Husbandry, of Cadmus, Kans., and a memorial of the Manhattan (Kans.) Grange, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Palmer pleuro-pneumonia bill; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the mayor and city council of the city of Parsons, Kans., praying for the passage of a general law providing for the erection of Government post-office buildings in every city and village of the United States containing 3,000 inhabitants or over; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also presented two petitions of citizens of Osage County, Kansas, praying for the enactment of such statutes as shall provide for the adequate punishment of crime against women and girls; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. REAGAN presented a petition of 40 citizens of Erath County, Texas, and a petition of citizens of Callahan County, Texas, praying that an appropriation be made for the payment of Indian depredation claims; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BOWEN presented a petition of 12 male citizens of Colorado Springs, Colo., and a petition of 21 male citizens of Longmont, Colo., praying for the better legal protection of women and girls within the Territorial, admiralty, and maritime jurisdiction of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of Dr. Charles Ambrook, on behalf of the Boulder (Colo.) Medical Association, praying for the removal of duties from medical books, surgical instruments, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report favorably, with amendments both in the body of the bill and the title, the bill (H. R. 5932) providing for the holding of the terms of the United States courts in the district of Minnesota, and I return with it a paper which was not before filed here, being a petition on the subject which was laid before the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar and the accompanying paper will lie on the table.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 905) to incorporate the District of Columbia Suburban Railway Company, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1051) to amend the act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

Mr. STEWART. I am directed by a majority of the Committee on Military Affairs to report an original bill, accompanied by a report.

The bill (S. 2918) to reimburse the State of Nevada for moneys expended or obligations incurred by said State and the Territory of Nevada and afterwards assumed and paid by said State in the suppression of the war of the rebellion, and for guarding the overland mail and emigrant route, was read twice by its title.

Mr. WALTHALL. I wish to state that several members of the Committee on Military Affairs do not concur in the report just submitted by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. I stated that it was a majority report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 157) for the relief of Newton S. Murphey, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 2919) to define the routes of steam railroads in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2727) authorizing the purchase of a site for a building for the accommodation of the Supreme Court of the United States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of the Bennington Battle Monument Association, praying that an appropriation of $22,000 be made to complete that monument, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 2920) relative to the Revolutionary battle-field of Bennington; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BOWEN, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 111) for the relief of William M. Keightley, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2403) to adjust the accounts of the Department of Agriculture, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2475) to increase the appropriation for the erection of a public building at Winona, Minn., reported it without amendment.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1404) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River, and to establish it as a post-road, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6440) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near the city of Omaha, Nebr., reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8343) to authorize the construction of a wagon and foot-passenger bridge across the Noxubee River, at or near Gainesville, in the State of Alabama, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CALL, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 2941) to incorporate the national academy of dental science; which was read twice by its title.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. VANCE. A petition was presented some time ago, praying that a pension be granted to Minerva Tilley, of North Carolina, for services rendered the United States Government in the Florida Indian war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and reported adversely upon by that committee. I asked that it be laid on the table in order that I might introduce a bill so as to secure the sense of the Senate upon the propriety of granting the prayer of the petition. I now introduce a bill granting a pension to Minerva Tilley, which I ask may be read the first and second times, and placed on the Calendar in connection with the adverse report or the petition upon the same subject.

The bill (S. 2921) granting a pension to Minerva Tilley was read twice by its title, and ordered to be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 2922) setting apart a tract of land to be used as a cemetery by the Alvarado Cemetery Association, of Georgetown, Colo.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2923) for the relief of Mrs. Josephine D. Hellyer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TURPIE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2924) to increase the pension of Sterne H. Fowler; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 2925) in relation to cadets at the Naval Academy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON introduced a bill (S. 2926) for the relief of Madison V. Boeitnight; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SPOONER introduced a bill (S. 2927) to provide for the redemption of lands sold under trust deeds in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2928) authorizing the issue of 2½ per cent. fifty-year bonds, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SPOONER. I move that 50 extra copies of the bill be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COKE introduced a bill (S. 2929) to authorize the Paris, Choctaw and Little Rock Railway Company to construct and operate a railway, telegraph, and telephone line through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2930) to authorize the Paris, Choctaw and Little Rock Railway Company to construct a bridge across Red River at or near Hooks' Ferry, Red River County, Texas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SPOONER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2931) to provide for a commission to determine the location of steam-railroads and depots in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 2932) granting a pension to the minor children of Levi M. Hunter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2933) for the relief of Hall & Gregory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 2934) granting a pension to Mary Sullivan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HISCOCK introduced a bill (S. 2935) for the erection of a public building at the city of Elmira, N. Y.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (S. 2936) granting a pension to George Fosgate; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2937) to prevent convict labor from competing with organized labor, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2938) granting a pension to James McDonald; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2939) granting a pension to Margaret E. Adamson; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PADDOCK introduced a bill (S. 2940) to provide in certain cases for the regulation of railway companies chartered by the United States by the several States and Territories in which the railways of such companies run and are operated; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. HISCOCK introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 81) providing for the purchase of five hundred copies of Scribner's Atlas for the use of the Department of State; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

THE VETO POWER.

Mr. STEWART introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 80) proposing an amendment to subdivisions 2 and 3 of section 7 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. STEWART. The joint resolution proposes to reduce the vote in the two Houses requisite to pass a bill over the veto of the President from two-thirds to a majority. I think the time has come when a majority vote ought to be sufficient to pass a bill over the veto of the President. I ask that the joint resolution be printed and lie on the table, and I shall at a convenient time call it up and make some remarks upon the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will lie on the table.

AMENDMENTS TO CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. HARRIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 2952) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army, as reported by the Court of Claims, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 2952) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army, as reported by the Court of Claims, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. CALL and Mr. FRYE submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, appropriating $100,000 for improving the Missouri River at Omaha, Nebr., and $50,000 for improving the Missouri River at and near Plattsmouth, Nebr.; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROWN. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the river and harbor bill. The amendment pertains to the completion of the existing project at Romerly Marsh, on the coast of Georgia. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

SAVANNAH HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. BROWN. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the river and harbor bill, which I desire to have read for information. I shall then move to refer it to the Committee on Commerce, and I desire to submit a few remarks in support of the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 10, line 217, strike out "$90,000" and insert after the word "improvement" the words:

On project for securing a channel 28 feet deep at mean high water, from the city of Savannah to the sea, $250,000.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I move the reference of the amendment just offered to the river and harbor bill, for an increase of the appropriation made in the House bill for the harbor of Savannah, to the Committee on Commerce, and I respectfully ask that the Senate indulge me while I submit a few remarks on the motion at this time, and I especially ask the attention of the Senators who are members of the Committee on Commerce, to whom the amendment is to be referred. It is no part of my purpose to make any assault upon the river and harbor bill as it passed the other House, on account of the liberal appropriations it makes to harbors connected with other cities. I wish them all good success and prosperity, and hope that all obstacles may be removed as speedily as possible which may stand in the way of their commercial growth. My object is not to ask that less be done for other Southern cities, but to ask that some measure of justice be extended to the city of Savannah.

The great Central Railroad system has its offices and its terminal at Savannah. It controls over 2,200 miles of railroad, and has intimate business relations and connections and exchanges business with several thousand additional miles. The Central system, and the Savannah, Florida and Western system, and the East Tennessee system, in connection with the steam-ship lines that run from Savannah to New York and Boston, comprising about 5,000 miles centering at Savannah, pour into her lap an immense commerce, which is increasing in tonnage with great rapidity every year. The only thing that has prevented an enormous growth has been the want of sufficient depth of water to accommodate the sea-going commerce. That has been in some measure remedied, and every foot additional depth that is given to the harbor causes a large commercial increase in the business of the city. When the estimate for the last project by the Secretary of War for getting 28 feet depth of water shall be carried out, the commerce of Savannah will reach annually several hundred millions of dollars. But I will refer more particularly to that project after a little while. For the present, I desire to call attention of the Senate, and especially of the Committee on Commerce, to the unjust and unreasonable discrimination which has been made against Savannah in the river and harbor bill. To show this I have prepared some figures and tables giving the amount proposed to be appropriated to each of several cities for the current year, and also giving the commerce of the city as reported by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War. Take first the city of Charleston.

CHARLESTON.

The estimate for completion of the work of improving the harbor is $3,000,000. Appropriations already made, $1,482,500. Balance to be appropriated under the project, $1,525,000. (See page 1132, volume 2, part 2.)

Commerce:
Exports	$17,410,000
Imports	635,000
	18,045,000

Proposed to be appropriated under the House bill for this year, $350,000.

MOBILE.

By reference to Senate Report No. 1884, second session, Forty-ninth Congress, page 79, I find the imports and exports of Mobile to be put down at a little less than $3,000,000 for 1886. The project is to have a channel 23 feet deep. The estimate is $1,500,000.

The appropriation proposed by the House bill for the present year is $250,000.

CUMBERLAND SOUND.

Page 1191, volume 2, part 2:

Cost of work, estimated	$2,071,023
Already appropriated	367,500

Amount proposed by this bill for the current year, $112,500.

Exports	$3,034,595
Imports	1,625,590
Total commerce for 1886 (see page 1198)	4,660,185

TEXAS.

Sabine Pass (page 1385, volume 2, part 2):

Estimated cost	$3,177,606.50
Appropriated to the present time	548,750.00

There are no commercial statistics of this port in the last report of the Secretary of War, but by reference to the Senate Report No. 1884, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, it will be seen that the commercial statistics are given to the 30th of June, 1884, the latest attainable, to wit, lumber, wool, cotton, hides, and assorted merchandise, of an aggregate value of $125,434. The amount proposed by this bill to be appropriated for Sabine Pass for the current year is $250,000.

Aransas Pass and Bay up to Rockport and Corpus Christi (page 191, volume 2, part 1):

Estimated cost	$1,571,293.00
Amount spent up to June 30, 1887	393,556.95
Amount proposed to be appropriated in the present bill	100,000.00

So far as I can find, the report of the Secretary of War gives no commercial statistics, for the reason, I suppose, that there is not a heavy commerce to report.

Galveston (page 1416, volume 2, part 2):

Estimated cost of the improvement	$8,478,000.00
Amount appropriated to July 1, 1887	1,778,000.00
Total sea-going commerce of the port is	73,874,701.00

The amount proposed to be appropriated for the current year is $500,000 and $100,000 for improving the ship-channel in Galveston Bay, making $600,000 for the ship-channel and the entrance to the port.

SAVANNAH.

According to the report of the Secretary of War for 1887, volume 2, part 1, page 145, the appropriations for the harbor of Savannah from 1874 to 1881, inclusive, amounted to $482,000. In 1881 the Secretary of War was directed by statute to have an estimate made of the cost of deepening the channel to 22 feet. The engineers estimated that it would cost $730,000 to accomplish the object. In 1882, two hundred thousand was appropriated; in 1884, two hundred thousand, and in 1886, one hundred and fifty thousand, leaving one hundred and eighty thousand balance of the estimate for completing the channel to 22 feet in depth. It is now proposed to divide the one hundred and eighty thousand into two installments. On account of the failure to pass the river and harbor bill at the last session of Congress, and on account of the unfinished condition, there has been much filling in, and it is very important that a sufficient amount should be at once appropriated and let the work be completed.

But in this connection it is proper that I should refer to the act approved August 5, 1886 (see House Executive Document No. 57, first session Fiftieth Congress). The Secretary of War was directed to have a survey and estimate made of the cost of improving the harbor of Savannah, from the Cross-Tides above Savannah to the bar, with the view of obtaining 28 feet of water in the channel. The engineer reports that including 10 per cent. for engineering, the total cost is estimated at $6,660,000 (page 2, letter of Secretary of War transmitting engineer's report). Of course, the execution of this project would take a number of years, and it would enhance the commerce of Savannah in much greater proportion than it has ever been enhanced by the opening of the channel to the depth of 22 feet, which in its unfinished condition has almost doubled the business in a few years. The Chief of Engineers also estimates that $600,000 of this appropriation can be profitably expended during the current year (General Gillmore's annual report for 1887, Appendix N, page 1058).

Now, in view of the liberal amounts appropriated to the other Southern cities to which reference has been made, for the improvement of their respective harbors, I ask that the sum of $250,000 be appropriated to complete the old project and begin the new, in the harbor of Savannah.

While this would not meet the requirements, as estimated by the Chief of Engineers, and would be only about one-third of the amount that could be profitably expended this year, still the $250,000 would complete the old project, and in connection with it, commence the dredging that would be made in deepening the ship-channel to 28 feet, so as to accommodate vessels of heavy draught; and it would be expected that it would take a number of years to complete this improvement, but when completed the position of Savannah as a first-class port would be assured, and an immense commerce would be conducted through that port.

But a word, Mr. President, in reference to the present commerce of Savannah as compared with the other cities to which the House bill makes most liberal appropriations.

COMMERCE OF SAVANNAH.

By the same report of the Secretary of War, volume 2, part 2, page 1164, it will be seen that the exports through the port of Savannah during the year were $51,028,190 in 1886. The imports through the harbor were $51,118,524, making an aggregate of imports and exports, which passed through the harbor by water, of over $100,000,000. The above statement does not include receipts and shipments by rail, nor does it include the value of domestic traffic, local manufactures, etc., but is confined strictly to the volume of exports and imports which have a direct connection with the water-way transportation of the city and harbor of Savannah.

I have here a table annexed to letter from O. M. Carter, first lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, addressed to Colonel Gillmore, giving the comparative commerce, exports and imports, of Charleston, Savannah, and Norfolk for fifteen years from 1870 to 1885 inclusive, by which it will be seen that the commerce of Norfolk, exports and imports, for the fifteen years was $140,548,164, the commerce of Charleston for the like period amounted to $292,068,325, while the commerce of Savannah for the like period amounted to $408,276,869, showing the commerce of Savannah for the period above mentioned to be almost as great as that of Charleston and Norfolk together.

Mr. President, I do not come before the Senate to ask favors for the city of Savannah, I come to demand at least the semblance of justice in her behalf, and to enter my protest against the favoritism and partiality contained in the House bill as it comes before the Senate. It seems to me that the bill as it stands would be subject to the objection that its purpose is to serve local interests, and promote local prosperity for a few places, at the expense of others of much greater commercial importance.

The commerce of Savannah, as I have already shown, is greater than the commerce of Mobile, Cumberland Sound, Sabine Pass, Aransas Pass, and Galveston all combined. There is no other harbor in the United States where each dollar appropriated does more to improve a harbor and build up a thrifty commerce than the harbor of Savannah. Still the House bill appropriates to the five harbors mentioned, which all combined have less commerce than Savannah, $1,312,000 for the current year, while Savannah with a greater commerce than all of them combined is to have but $90,000. There is no justice, there is no reason, there is no equity in such discrimination. To do the same measure of justice to Savannah that is done to the other cities mentioned the appropriation ought to be $500,000, but I am only asking two hundred and fifty thousand, the same sum given to Mobile, the same sum given to Sabine Pass, less than half the sum given to Galveston, and one hundred thousand less than Charleston. Mr. President, I desire to be understood as submitting the earnest protest of Savannah against the favoritism and injustice of the House bill. But I can not doubt that the Committee on Commerce of the Senate will so amend the bill as to grant this reasonable request on the part of one of the most important commercial ports of the Union, and the most important port on the South Atlantic coast, with more extensive and complete railroad connections than any Southern seaport city. In addition to this, and in connection with her other rapidly growing trade, it is a well-known fact that Savannah does the largest business in naval stores of any port on the face of the earth.

Mr. President, to show the unjust discrimination made by the bill as it passed the House in favor of other Southern harbors against the harbor of Savannah, I append to my remarks the following tabular statements, which I trust will command the attention of the Senate, and convince the judgment of Senators that it is their duty to correct the error and redress the wrong done to the city of Savannah by the bill as it passed the House of Representatives.

Table showing amount proposed to be appropriated, exports, imports, and total commerce.

City.	Appropriation.	Exports.	Imports.	Total Commerce.
Savannah	$90,000	$51,028,190	$51,118,524	$102,146,714
Charleston	350,000	17,410,000	635,000	18,045,000
Mobile	250,000	.....	.....	*3,000,000
Cumberland Sound	112,500	3,034,595	1,625,590	4,660,185
Sabine Pass	250,000	.....	.....	125,434
Aransas Pass, etc	100,000	.....	.....	.....
Galveston	600,000	.....	.....	73,894,701

*Less than $3,000,000.

Savannah has had appropriated since 1874, $1,034,000; estimated for Savannah to get 28 feet of water, $6,660,000. Galveston has had appropriated $1,778,000; estimated for Galveston, $8,478,000—estimate for Galveston $1,818,000 more than the estimate for Savannah. Estimated to give Savannah 28 feet of water, $6,660,000. Balance of estimate not yet appropriated to give Galveston 25 feet of water, $6,700,000.—Forty-ninth Congress, second session, Report No. 1884, page 84.

I will here remark that I think the commerce of Charleston and Mobile are imperfectly reported, but I have given the best estimates that are in my reach.

One more short table and I have done.

Take another combination in the following table:

City.	Amount proposed.	Commerce.
Savannah	$90,000	$102,146,714
Mobile	250,000	*3,000,000
Cumberland Sound	112,500	4,660,185
Sabine Pass	250,000	125,434
Aransas Pass	100,000
Galveston	600,000	73,874,701
Total	1,312,000	81,660,320
Savannah	90,000	102,146,714

*Less than $3,000,000.

From the above it will be seen that while Savannah, whose commerce amounts annually to $102,146,714, only gets $90,000 appropriation, the five ports mentioned receive $1,312,000, or over twelve times as much, while their aggregate commerce, according to the Engineer's reports, amounts to only $81,660,320, or about $20,000,000 less than that of Savannah alone. What justice is there in this absurd proposition?

Mr. President, I move that the amendment be printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF LEAD ORES.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate without delay if there is any regulation of his Department under which lead ores which contain gold or silver are admitted free of duty. If so, under what law are lead ores put on the free-list because they contain other valuable mineral besides lead; and also to inform the Senate what amount of lead ores have been imported into the United States during the past ten months of the present fiscal year, and what amount of silver ore has been imported into the United States during the same period, and what percentage of lead, if any, was contained in such silver ore.

THE MEAT PRODUCT.

Mr. VEST. I offer a resolution which I ask may be read, lie on the table, and be printed, giving notice that I shall call it up to-morrow.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee of five Senators shall be appointed by the President of the Senate, whose duty it shall be to examine fully all questions touching the meat product of the United States, and especially as to the transportation of beef and beef cattle, and the sale of the same in the cattle markets, stock-yards, and cities, and whether there exists or has existed any combination of any kind by reason of which the price of beef and beef cattle have been so controlled or affected as to diminish the prices paid the producer without lessening the cost of meat to the consumer; that said committee may hold its sessions during the recess of the Senate at such times and places as it may determine, and shall have power to send for persons and papers and also to employ a stenographer and a sergeant-at-arms, all the necessary expenses of said committee to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and said committee shall make report to the Senate at its next session by bill or otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed and lie on the table.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

A bill (H. R. 8629) granting a pension to Mrs. Abba E. Jackson; and
A bill (H. R. 8722) granting a pension to Jessie M. Barthauer.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. 128) for the relief of John Fletcher;
A bill (H. R. 328) for the allowance of certain awards made by a board of claims to certain citizens of Jefferson County, Kentucky;
A bill (H. R. 4581) for the relief of Thomas Mathews and others;
A bill (H. R. 5222) for the relief of A. M. Anderson and others; and A bill (H. R. 5215) for the relief of Andrew J. Nugent.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 2527) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Red River of the North by the Duluth, Rainy Lake River and Southwestern Railway Company;
A bill (H. R. 3376) to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans;
A bill (H. R. 8623) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Tennessee River at or near Guntersville, Ala., and for other purposes; and
A bill (H. R. 7564) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near Chattanooga, Tenn.

The bill (H. R. 8285) to remove the political disabilities of Elliott Johnston was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. 9673) for the relief of the counties of the Territory of Arizona and to legalize the indebtedness thereof, and provide for funding the same, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The bill (H. R. 882) to correct the muster of and for the relief of George W. Davenport was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 7675) for the relief of E. B. Eddy, of Hull, Quebec, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 103) authorizing and directing the Department of Justice to transfer certain rooms which have been occupied by the United States courts and officials to the city of Utica, N. Y., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

ANCIENT AND HONORABLE ARTILLERY.

The bill (H. R. 9793) authorizing a loan of arms and equipments to the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company was read twice by its title.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that that bill be now put on its passage; and I ask that it be read for information, and call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] to it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, under such regulations as he shall deem proper, to loan to the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Massachusetts one hundred and fifty rifles and equipments, belts, bayonets, scabbards, and cartridge-boxes, for use at the celebration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of that company, to be returned in good order on or before the 1st day of July next.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 347) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Youngstown, Ohio.

The first amendment was, in line 2, after the word "purchase," to insert "acquire by condemnation:" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to purchase, acquire by condemnation, or otherwise provide a suitable site, and cause to be erected thereon, at the city of Youngstown, in the State of Ohio, a substantial and commodious public building, with fire-proof vault, for the use and accommodation of the post-office, internal-revenue office, pension office, and for other Government uses.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that that amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 10, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" and in line 15, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

The site, and the building thereon when completed according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed the cost of $75,000; and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of at least 50 feet, including streets and alleys; and for the purposes herein mentioned the sum of $75,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was concurred in.

HEIRS OF SOLOMON SPITZER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following resolution from the House of Representatives:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 11, 1888.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be requested to return to the House the bill (H. R. 2699) for the relief of the heirs of the late Solomon Spitzer, for the purpose of correcting the same; and the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to insert in said bill the word "unexpected" instead of the word "unexpended."

The resolution was concurred in.

REPRINTING OF A REPORT.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the memorial of George Ticknor Curtis, remonstrating against any action on the part of Congress against the awards made by the Government of Mexico, etc., be reprinted for the use of the Senate. It was ordered to be printed the other day, but there was a mistake made in the heading, and it is very important that it should be in proper shape.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the order to reprint will be made.

SENATOR FROM INDIANA.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to make a privileged report. I am directed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred certain resolutions of the joint convention of the two houses of the Legislature of the State of Indiana concerning the election of DAVID TURPIE as United States Senator, and sundry other memorials, to report thereon. I suppose the report should be read at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read at length, if there be no objection.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senate desires to proceed to other business, I shall consent to have the report printed without being read at this time. It will take, I suppose, about five minutes to read it; but it can be printed and lie over.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be printed in the RECORD. That will answer the purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked that the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections be printed in the RECORD. That order will be made if there be no objection.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred certain resolutions of the joint convention of the two houses of the State of Indiana concerning the election of Hon. DAVID TURPIE as United States Senator, and a memorial signed by F. Winter and seventeen others, members of the Legislature of said State, protesting and remonstrating against the admission of Mr. TURPIE as a member of the Senate of the United States from the State of Indiana, and a communication signed by F. Winter and John M. Griffiths, in behalf of a committee appointed by the joint convention of said assembly of said State, for the purpose of presenting to the Senate of the United States the facts attending the election of DAVID TURPIE as aforesaid, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

Mr. TURPIE received a certificate of his election from the governor of Indiana, which constitutes a prima facie title to his seat, and has been admitted thereupon to take the oath.

The two houses of the Legislature of Indiana having failed to concur in the appointment of a Senator, met in joint convention, and after sundry ballotings, in which no person had a majority of the votes cast, a ballot was had in which Mr. TURPIE received two more votes than all others. A quorum of said joint convention and a quorum of each house was present and voted. The proceedings were in all respects regular, and resulted in a valid election of Mr. TURPIE, unless the facts which the remonstrants offer to prove constitute a valid objection.

They offer to show, first, that there being a vacancy in the office of lieutenant-governor, Hon. Robert S. Robertson was duly elected to fill such vacancy, and thereby became entitled by the constitution and laws of Indiana to preside over the senate; but that on the meeting of the senate on the 6th day of January, 1887, being the first day of the session of the Legislature at which said alleged election of Mr. TURPIE took place, one Alonzo G. Smith usurped the office and function of such presiding officer, was supported and maintained in such usurpation by a majority of said body, excluded Mr. Robertson from said office and function and continued so to preside and so to exclude Mr. Robertson during all the sessions of said senate, including its attendance on said joint convention, until after the said alleged election of Mr. TURPIE.

Second. That before said alleged election the senate wrongfully and for the purpose of obtaining a majority for said TURPIE in said joint convention, declared two members, who had been duly and lawfully elected members thereof, not entitled to their seats, and declared two other persons, who had not been duly and lawfully elected, to be entitled to such seats, and thereupon seated such persons; and that this was done without right, without evidence, and without hearing or debate, and that said persons so seated thereafter were present and voted for Mr. TURPIE in said convention, and that without such votes said TURPIE would not have received a majority.

The committee are of opinion that the facts offered, if proved, will not warrant the Senate in declaring the sitting member not entitled to his seat. There can be no doubt that the body in question was the constitutional senate of Indiana. The journals of both houses of the Legislature of the State have been submitted to us. It appears that the body was recognized as the senate by the governor and by the house of representatives. Statutes to which its constitutional assent was necessary were enacted and have become part of the law of the State. It seems to us that, without entering upon the question whether there was a vacancy in the office of lieutenant-governor which Mr. Robertson was duly elected to fill, the recognition of Mr. Smith by a majority of the senate as its lawful presiding officer and the recognition of the senate as a lawfully organized body by the other house, as well as by all its own members, who remained and took part in its legislative proceedings, and by the executive department, require us to consider it as the lawful senate, lawfully organized so far as to be entitled to take part in the joint convention which elected a Senator of the United States.

We also think that the judgment of the senate of Indiana as to the title of Messrs. Branahan and McDonald, the two members in question, to their seats is binding upon the Senate of the United States. This body is made by the Constitution the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its members. The senate of Indiana is likewise the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its own members. We must determine all questions arising out of the proceeding of the electors. But who sustain the character of electors is to be determined by the legislative body of the State. We can not inquire into the motive which controlled its judgment. In rendering that judgment, whether it shall give a hearing to parties, permit debate, examine witnesses, act upon evidence or without evidence, are matters within its own discretion. If that discretion were exercised in the manner charged by the remonstrants, a majority of the committee think that a great public crime was committed, for which the offenders are responsible to the people of Indiana, but we can not try the question. A majority of the committee do not mean to be understood as now committing ourselves to an opinion upon the question whether the Senate can not refuse to admit to a seat a claimant who owes his election to a legislative body which is itself the result of fraud or crime, which has overcome the true will of the people, even if it has possessed itself of legislative authority and of the technical evidence of a rightful character, or whether the judgments of such a body as to the title to seats of its individual members are entitled to any respect whatever. If that question shall hereafter unhappily arise, it will be dealt with on its own merits. The committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the several memorials.

Mr. HOAR. The report is a unanimous report of the committee, asking to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorials, thereby confirming the title of the Senator in question to his seat. I suppose there should be a vote of the Senate accepting that report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received and the committee discharged, and the report printed in the RECORD, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. There should be no action taken until it is printed.

Mr. HOAR. I shall call it up to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report, then, will be placed on the Calendar, and the order informally announced by the Chair as to discharging the committee will be vacated.

OHIO VALLEY CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9711.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). The Chair ought to ask if the morning business is completed. If there be no further morning business the Senator from Iowa moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill moved by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9711) making an appropriation to enable the several Executive Departments of the Government and the Bureau of Agriculture and the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and Commission of Fish and Fisheries, to participate in the centennial exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States, to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio, from July 4 to October 27, 1888.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, this bill is an appropriation to enable the Executive Departments to be represented at the centennial exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States. The Committee on Appropriations recommend sundry amendments. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with so far as to allow the amendments to be considered as they are reached in the regular reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 6, after the word "Fisheries," to insert "under the direction of the President of the United States;" so as to make the clause read:

That the head of each of the several Executive Departments of the Government, the Commissioner of Agriculture, and the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and Commission of Fish and Fisheries, under the direction of the President of the United States, be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to prepare and make suitable exhibits at the said centennial exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States, to be held at Cincinnati, beginning on the 4th of July and closing October 27, 1888.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line 13 to line 23, as follows:

That there shall be appointed a committee of Congress composed of nine members, three to be appointed by the President of the Senate and six by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Said committee shall constitute an advisory board to confer with the managers of said exposition and the heads of the several Executive Departments and bureaus in reference to the character, extent, and conduct of the governmental exhibit provided for herein. Said advisory board is authorized and directed to visit said exposition and make such report to Congress in that behalf as they may deem needful and proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. After the date "1888," at the end of line 12, there should be a colon instead of a period, so that the proviso will fit in and come immediately after "1888."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 23, after the word "that," to strike out "said committee" and insert "the President;" in line 24, before the word "discretion," to strike out "its" and insert "his;" and after the words "custody as," in line 30, to strike out "said committees may provide" and insert "he may direct;" so as to make the clause read:

Provided, That the President may, in the exercise of his discretion, allow such documents and exhibits as relate to early settlement at Marietta, Ohio, and the establishment of civil government in the territory northwest of the Ohio River, to be taken to Marietta and exhibited during the time from July 15 to 19, 1888, inclusive, under such restrictions and custody as he may direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 37, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

That to enable the several Executive Departments of the Government, the Department of Agriculture, and the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and Commission of Fish and Fisheries, to participate in said exposition, to be held as aforesaid, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $145,250, apportioned as follows.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out line 54 as follows:

For expenses of advisory board, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 55, after the words "that the," to strike out "said advisory board" and insert "President;" in the same line, after the words "if in," to strike out "their" and insert "his;" so as to make the clause read:

That the President may, if in his judgment it shall be deemed necessary and expedient in order to secure the best results with greatest economy, transfer a part of the fund hereby apportioned to one Department or bureau to another Department or bureau. The term bureau wherever used herein shall be construed to include the Agricultural Department and the Smithsonian Institution.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 61 I move to strike out the word "and," and after the word "Institution" to insert "and Commission of Fish and Fisheries;" so as to read:

The term "bureau" wherever used herein shall be construed to include the Agricultural Department, the Smithsonian Institution, and Commission of Fish and Fisheries.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 63, after the word "authorized," to strike out "and requested;" so as to read:

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to detail an officer of the Pay Department of the Army or Navy to disburse the fund appropriated by this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 67, after the word "effect," to strike out "of," and in line 69, after the words "and a," to strike out:

Board of audit composed of not less than three persons, one of whom shall be appointed by the committee of Congress: Provided, however, That payment of the expenses incurred by the advisory board shall be made on vouchers approved by the president of said board.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Person to be designated by the President to make final audit of said accounts.

So as to make the clause read:

The payments on account of expenses incurred in carrying out and into effect the provisions hereof shall be made on itemized vouchers approved by the representatives of the Department incurring the liability and a person to be designated by the President to make final audit of said accounts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 88, before the word "officer," to strike out "committee;" so as to make the clause read:

That no officer or employé appointed as aforesaid shall be paid extra or additional compensation by reason of services rendered in virtue of such employment; but nothing herein shall be so construed as to prevent the payment of the just and reasonable expenses of any officer or employé appointed or employed under and by virtue of the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 77, after the word "agriculture," I move to strike out the word "and," and after the word "Institution" to insert "and Commission of Fish and Fisheries;" so as to read:

That the head of each of said Executive Departments, and of the Department of Agriculture, Smithsonian Institution, and Commission of Fish and Fisheries.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 5, on page 2, after the words "National Museum," I move to insert a comma, and the same in line 33, after "National Museum."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. As it is very important to have the amendments acted upon as soon as possible in order that the Government may be represented in the exposition which is to convene early in July, I hope the Senator from Iowa will ask for a committee of conference now on the amendments, so as to expedite the business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair omitted to put the question on the adoption of the preamble.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In view of the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. ALLISON, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 11th instant approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. 70) appropriating $30,000 for the International Exhibition in Brussels, Belgium.

The message also announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. 2614) to authorize the Batesville and Brinkley Railroad to build a bridge across the Black River, in Arkansas;

An act (S. 1828) to provide for a light-house at Newport News, Middle Ground, Va.;

An act (S. 2506) for the establishment of a light-house, fog-signal, and day-beacon in the vicinity of Goose Rocks, Fox Island Thoroughfare, Maine;

An act (S. 2458) to amend an act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River, at the foot of Pennsylvania avenue east; and Joint resolution (S. R. 68) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the Military Academy at West Point José Andrés Urtrecho, of Nicaragua.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

Mr. FARWELL. I move to take up for consideration at this time Calendar number 938, being the bill (S. 2615) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to acquire and use real estate for railway purposes in the District of Columbia.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois if the Committee on the District of Columbia has not also taken action in regard to the other railroad company, and whether it has not reported a bill in regard to it. I should much prefer, so far as I am concerned, that we should consider the bills together. I do not think it is just to pass this by itself, and I can not give my consent to taking up one of them unless the other is to be taken up also.

Mr. FARWELL. I can inform the Senator that the committee have taken action upon the other matter, but it does not interfere with this in the least, and does not include this. The committee instructed me to report this bill, and to ask for its passage.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has the other bill been reported?

Mr. FARWELL. Yes, sir, to-day.

Mr. COCKRELL. But is it not to be considered in connection with this?

Mr. FARWELL. No, sir. The committee instructed me to report this bill as it is; and all it does is to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to condemn land to the south of Maryland and Virginia avenues, for railway purposes only, and to enable them to get to a square of land which they own, near the Long Bridge.

Mr. COCKRELL. What does the other bill do? I should like to have the whole question settled when it is up.

Mr. FARWELL. The other bill permits the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to enter at the Boundary and E streets and tunnel a mile and a half or a mile and a quarter, and then go along by the Baltimore and Potomac tracks to Sixth street, and then come in on this side of Sixth street at a point opposite the present station. In addition to that, it authorizes the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to lay a railroad track on the North side of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad to the Long Bridge.

Mr. COCKRELL. Here is the difficulty I see about the matter: If we give one company vested rights down there and it condemns property, and the other company in order to get to the depot should want to occupy the same ground, there would be a controversy, and they would never adjust it.

Mr. FARWELL. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that so far as having a station opposite the present Baltimore and Potomac station is concerned the latter company raises no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. How will it be about the property condemned? How is the Baltimore and Ohio Company to run its road across the same property?

Mr. FARWELL. Not at all. They come in on the north side all the way. There is no conflict at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have the whole matter settled together. That is the only point with me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate.

Mr. VANCE. The bill has not yet been taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did say that he understood unanimous consent was given, but the Chair will put the question.

Mr. FARWELL. Is there objection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, somewhat hastily perhaps, announced that he had heard no objection.

Mr. FARWELL. Is there objection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators say they did not hear.

Mr. FARWELL. Is there any objection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair now asks the question, is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. VANCE. I object. It is manifestly proper that the bill which has been reported from the committee this morning should be acted on first so as to let both these great lines come into the city on an equality. If we give one line all it wants, it seems to me we may have difficulty in the way of the other bill. I think it is manifestly proper that the bill just reported should be acted upon first.

Mr. FARWELL. There is no conflict whatever between the bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. VANCE. I have objected once or twice already. I do not mean to take any more of the time of the Senate at present.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think this bill ought to go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware objects.

Mr. FARWELL. I move, then, to take up the bill notwithstanding the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 19, noes 13; not a quorum voting.

Mr. FARWELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to appeal to the Senator from Illinois not to press this motion this morning. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER], who is in charge of another bill with which the Senator from Illinois and myself are perfectly familiar, is absent, and he has some interest in this. I think perhaps it will be better policy to take up and consider first the bill that I suppose was reported this morning by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. FARWELL. The Senator from West Virginia agrees to this bill. He does not object to it.

Mr. HARRIS. I am aware of the fact that the committee has reported this bill, and I do not wish the Senator to understand that I am in any sense antagonizing the bill; but I think perhaps it will be better policy to consider the other bill first, or consider them both, so that one shall follow immediately after the other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] to take up the bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], whom I do not see in the Chamber, but feeling satisfied that he would vote "nay" on this question if present, I shall so vote.

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER]. I am not aware how he would vote on this motion, and therefore I shall not vote.

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE].

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA], but with the understanding which I have I am at liberty to vote on this question, and I vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], and therefore shall not vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CHACE. My colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. DAVIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired generally with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], who has not voted, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. QUAY. I am informed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] is in favor of this bill. That being the case, I vote "yea."

Mr. EVARTS (after having voted in the affirmative). The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] not being in his seat, I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—21.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2615) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to acquire and use real estate for railway purposes in the District of Columbia, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. VANCE, to add to section 2 the following proviso:

Provided, That the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company shall be required to remove their track and depot from the public grounds which they now occupy and locate them upon the lands so acquired.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, for some years past the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company has occupied the public mall in front of the Capitol and erected its depot on Sixth street, and, without any rent or charge, it has occupied that ground for a long period of time.

The proposition of the bill which the Committee on the District of Columbia reported this morning to the Senate, which will be before this body for its consideration very soon, is to give the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company like privileges to come in upon the north and easterly side of the track of the Baltimore and Potomac road and enter the mall on the opposite side of Sixth street, and build its depot almost directly opposite the depot of the Baltimore and Potomac Company. That amounts to a destruction of the Mall for the purposes for which it was originally intended, and it will have to be abandoned as a place of pleasure and of public resort by the citizens of the capital.

My proposition, therefore, is to compel the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to withdraw its depot and tracks and locate them upon the land which this bill authorizes the company to acquire just outside the Mall. If that were done we should then have an end to this obstruction and occupation of the public grounds in the city. If it is not done, equal and similar rights and privileges can not be refused to any other corporation that desires to come in and avail itself of the public property of the United States. For that reason I have offered this amendment, which I hope will meet with the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senate is perfectly familiar with the magnitude and the ability of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. It has probably the best managed railroad system in the country, if not in the world, managed with a large spirit. Wherever it has had an opportunity it has displayed public spirit and patriotism. I have no sort of feeling of hostility to it or criticism of it. The model civil service of the country, if not of the world, is to be found in the organization of that concern. But I do regard it as a national misfortune that the road was permitted to come in upon that magnificent mall in the way that it was; and that without a dollar of compensation the company was presented with the most valuable piece of land in the city of Washington, and it has proceeded to extend its privileges to occupy, to the practical exclusion of the public, one of the fine streets of the city. It is now proposed virtually to sanction and to perpetuate this, and to permit another railroad company to come in by the side of it.

If there be power enough in the public sentiment of the country and the Congress of the United States I trust it will, at least in the last emergency, provide some limit for these companies so that they may not extend their machine-shops and warehouses down even to the Monument, covering this fine piece of ground.

I do not blame them, in one sense, for taking all that is given them; but it strikes me that the course of Congress in presenting this magnificent property to this company is most extraordinary. I feel obliged to vote against the whole proposition.

Mr. FARWELL. The question of the removal of the passenger station is not considered in this bill at all. It was considered before the Committee on the District of Columbia, and was unfavorably considered. It was not agreed to. This bill does not touch or involve the question of the location of the depot or its removal. It simply provides that to enable the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to transact their freight business with some comfort and take the cars out of the streets they may condemn land south of Virginia and Maryland avenues. That is all the bill does except in addition to that it permits the company to go onto a block they own near the river and near the Long Bridge. That is all the bill proposes.

I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I hope the bill will not pass. I think Washington City with its parks and public grounds and buildings already laid out and made should be the model city of the world, and the convenience of the people and those who come here should be consulted in all respects where it can be done without detriment to the beauty and the plan of the city.

I have no doubt that the Baltimore and Potomac depot should be removed from its present location, and that the whole magnificent boulevard or park on the river should be thrown open to conveyances of every kind.

I should have no objection if it was necessary to giving this or any other railroad company a site at the cost of the people of the United States wherever it could be found without destroying the beauty of the magnificent front on the river, which ought to be extended and ought to be improved, without being interrupted by a railway-crossing of any railroad.

There is no convenience of the people of Washington which requires that that railroad company should have its depot immediately upon or adjacent to Pennsylvania avenue. It might as well be a quarter of a mile or a full mile removed. The depot might as well be on the banks of the Potomac River, or it might as well be further down the river, with our present facilities and our increasing facilities for rapid transit. The little time consumed in reaching the depot would be infinitesimal, while to permit this corporation to continue running its tracks across one of the most beautiful parks of any city, capable of being made so, a necessary lung of the city, and with the improvements which the Government has made there, is, in my judgment, altogether wrong, and not to be permitted by any wise consideration of public policy.

For one, I shall vote against this bill and any bill to locate the depot of any railroad company in immediate proximity to Pennsylvania avenue.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, the proposition made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] would destroy interests far more important than the streets of Washington City. It is a bigger question than running a railroad from Virginia avenue down to a little brick house near Pennsylvania avenue, where perhaps somebody's horse will be frightened. Adopt the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina and there can be no traffic, freight or passenger, from North to South unless it shall pass through a tunnel to the Long Bridge; and if the Senator from North Carolina does not know that it certainly is his misfortune. The practical result would be to make all Virginia west of the Blue Ridge a part of West Virginia, and all of Southside Virginia a part of North Carolina.

His amendment tends to that effect. The pending bill is one which I can indorse thoroughly. With the amendment put upon it proposed by the Senator from North Carolina I suppose I could console myself, as a more distinguished Senator once said when he told his colleagues that he could go from Washington to Chicago in the light of his own effigy. This bill, if passed with this amendment, would destroy, so far as we are concerned, the entire interstate-commerce act; and the amendment is only intended—I am not a searcher of hearts, but when I use the word "intended" I think that is the effect—to destroy this measure by one method or another; that is, to make everything go back out to corporations and destroy the only one that gives the western part of Virginia any line of freight and passenger connection.

I beg pardon for not being able to make myself very well understood on account of the condition of my throat.

I submit to the sound judgment of the Senate whether, according to the suggestion I have made, it is proper to consider such a proposition at this time. This is my nineteenth year in legislative life, and in that time I have had some interest in questions relating to railroad matters in the South, and in that time I have listened to every railroad president from here to the Gulf, and this is a renewal of what I knew twelve years ago. I ask the Senate to stop and consider if it is not better to pass the bill of the Senator from Illinois without the amendment now proposed, not as a political factor, but as an industrial one. There is, without making any reflection, something under this.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I could not very well hear what the Senator from Virginia said, but I should be glad to be informed by him or any one else how the location of the depot on the public grounds on Sixth street, at the corner of Missouri avenue, would answer all the purposes of opening up Southern traffic and travel, as he seems to desire, and how the change of that same depot a few blocks south of the Avenue would have the opposite effect.

SESSION WITH CLOSED DOORS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business. The Sergeant-at-Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors of the Senate.

After three hours the doors were reopened.

RUDOLPH LOBSIGER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be priated:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State relative to the claim of Mr. Rudolph Lobsiger, a Swiss citizen, against the United States, and recommend that provision be made by law for referring the matter to the Court of Claims for examination on its merits.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, May 14, 1888.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, accompanied by a report of Mr. Somerville P. Tuck, appointed to carry out certain provisions of section 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801," approved January 20, 1885.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Improvement of the Mississippi River, to whom was referred the amendment to the river and harbor bill submitted by Mr. BOWEN, proposing to appropriate $25,000 to enable the Geological Survey to investigate the extent to which the arid region of the United States can be redeemed by irrigation, the segregation of the irrigable lands, the selection of sites for reservoirs, etc., reported it favorably and moved its reference to the Committee on Commerce; when, on motion of Mr. STEWART, the proposed amendment was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PADDOCK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2762) to provide for the erection of public buildings for post-offices in towns and cities where the post-office receipts for three years preceding have exceeded $3,000 annually; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (H. R. 8464) for the relief of Merchants' National Bank of Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

LOAN OF CERTAIN ARMS AND EQUIPMENTS.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the House Calendar and take up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 9793) authorizing a loan of arms and equipments to the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, under such regulations as he shall deem proper, to loan to the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Massachusetts one hundred and fifty rifles and equipments, belts, bayonets, scabbards, and cartridge-boxes, for use at the celebration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of that company, to be returned on or before the 1st day of July next.

The committee recommended the adoption of the following amendment:

In the ninth line, after the word "returned," insert "in good order."

There being no objection, the bill was considered, the amendment adopted, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LONG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF TARIFF DEBATE.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That general debate in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the bill (H. R. 9051) entitled "An act to reduce taxation and to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue," shall close on Saturday, May 19.

Mr. MILLS. If there be no objection, I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. MILLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE W. DAVENPORT.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 882) to correct the muster of and for the relief of George W. Davenport and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the muster of George W. Davenport, late second lieutenant of Company C, Eighth Michigan Cavalry, upon the records and rolls of the War Department, so as to show said Davenport as mustered into the military service as second lieutenant of Company C, Eighth Michigan Cavalry, on December 15, 1862, and honorably mustered out on April 30, 1865; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay said George W. Davenport, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum of money equal to the pay of a second lieutenant of volunteer cavalry from December 15, 1862, to April 30, 1865, first deducting any sum or sums which said Davenport has received on account of his services in the war of the rebellion during the time mentioned aforesaid.

The committee recommend that the bill be amended as follows:

In line 9 strike out the words "December fifteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two," and insert in lieu thereof the words "January fifteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-three."

In line 10 strike out the words "April thirtieth" and insert in lieu thereof the words "January sixteenth."

In lines 15 and 16 strike out the words "December fifteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two," and insert in lieu thereof the words "January fifteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-three."

In line 16 strike out the words "April thirtieth" and insert in lieu thereof the words "January sixteenth."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, the amendments agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ANDREW J. NEWGENT.

Mr. WARNER. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5212) for the relief of Andrew J. Newgent, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to pay Andrew J. Newgent, of Jackson County, Missouri, the sum of $375, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full payment for two horses taken from said Newgent by the Confederate forces, while he, the said Newgent, was lieutenant-colonel commanding the Second Batallion Missouri State Militia, the said horses being the private property of said Newgent.

There being no objection, the bill was considered and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SALLIE R. ALEXANDER.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1909) granting an increase of pension to Sallie R. Alexander, widow of Lieut. Col. Thomas L. Alexander, United States Army; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MINOR CHILDREN OF PATRICK FRAWLEY.

Mr. HUNTER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2655) granting a pension to the widow and minor children of Patrick Frawley; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LYDIA HAWKINS.

Mr. HUNTER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2655) granting a pension to Lydia Hawkins; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN LEARY, DECEASED.

Mr. HUNTER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1076) granting a pension to the widow of John Leary, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

AUSTIN P. COX.

Mr. MANSUR, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6067) for the relief of Austin P. Cox; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MANSUR also, from the Committee on Claims, reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 6530) for the relief of Manual Mason;

A bill (H. R. 4563) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund money wrongfully paid for duties on imports by Daniel Marcy; and

A bill (H. R. 7619) for the relief of John P. Clum.

THOMAS G. MACKIE.

Mr. MANSUR also, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6069) for the relief of Thomas G. Mackie and the heirs at law of William A. Hyde, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. TABARRAH.

Mr. CAREY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 948) for the relief of William H. Tabarrah; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

R. D. BABCOCK.

Mr. CAREY also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 5225) for the relief of R. D. Babcock; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

IRREGULARITIES IN COMPENSATION OF GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS.

Mr. WHEELER, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, reported back favorably the joint resolution (H. Res. 164) for the appointment of a joint committee of both Houses of Congress to inquire into existing irregularities, if any, in the compensation of the officers and employés of the Executive Departments and bureaus of the Government; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GRANT OF CERTAIN LANDS, WYOMING.

Mr. WHEELER also, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back favorably the bill (S. 850) granting certain lands in the Territory of Wyoming for public purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. MILLS. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

Mr. HATCH rose and was recognized.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] may have an extension of his time, not exceeding thirty minutes, if he so desires, in order to conclude the remarks which he is about to make to the committee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Chairman, I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] and to the Committee of the Whole for the courtesy extended to me. Nothing less than the magnitude of the interests involved in the pending bill and its effects upon the prosperity and welfare of the people of the whole country would induce me to trespass upon the patience of the House at this time. But, Mr. Chairman, I feel that I would be faithless to my own convictions, derelict in my duty to the people I have the honor to represent upon this floor, and disloyal to the interests confided to the Committee on Agriculture, of which I have the honor to be the chairman, if I refused or neglected to speak earnestly and plainly upon what I consider a legislative crisis in the history of the country. I shall offer no apology to this House, as I have never offered one anywhere, for speaking in behalf of the agriculturists and of the agricultural interests of the country.

Agriculture is the oldest and the most honorable occupation of man. It is the foundation of our earliest civilization, and its development marks the periods of the passage in the history of the world "from savagery to barbarism and from barbarism to civilization." It is to-day the foundation of all commercial and material progress in this country. It marks in every age of the world the steps of civilization as clearly and distinctly as the posts mark the miles on the road. The history of the world teaches us that in all ages, in every country, agriculture has borne more than its fair proportion of the burdens of government.

Whether taxation has been exacted from it in kind, or under whatever system taxes have been levied, agriculture has always borne more than its just proportion, and too often, as in our own country, has been the prey of skillfully devised systems of taxation for the benefit and enrichment of some favored class. This, Mr. Chairman, is particularly true in the nineteenth century and under our republican form of government in the year 1888.

No system of taxation can be devised which benefits one class of the people in a country that does not bear with equal hardship upon some other class or classes. It is utterly impossible to devise a scheme of taxation that will inure to the benefit of one class without imposing a corresponding burden upon other classes. Under our system of taxation the largest proportion of the money exacted from the people by the Federal Government comes through the custom-house. It is either levied upon articles that are not manufactured in this country, in which case the Government gets the sole benefit of the tax, or it is levied upon articles that are manufactured in this country as well as in foreign countries, and in all such cases the Government gets its proportion of the tax, while the manufacturer of the protected articles is also benefited by the tax; and the proposition which has been stated upon the floor of this House by more that one gentleman, that a tax upon an article manufactured abroad and brought into this country through the custom-house does not add to the cost of the article to the consumer is too ridiculous to be met by argument.

A gentleman who can persuade himself to believe that proposition certainly could not be convinced by argument, even if one should rise from the dead. The idea that a tax upon a manufactured article does not add to its cost to the consumer is as ridiculous as the idea that the freight charges added to the cost of an article transported 1,000 or 3,000 miles does not add to its price to the consumer. No tax can be levied upon a manufactured article that does not benefit the manufacturer, and a long line of the ablest writers and speakers upon this question, covering a period of a hundred years, have stated time and again that the manufacturer alone receives the benefit of such taxes. And, Mr. Chairman, within the last few years there has been added to the roll of illustrious authorities who have declared this to be a maxim in political economy the name of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], an extract from whose life of Hamilton was read upon this floor by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] the other day, in which it is stated that the tariff tax inures to the benefit of the manufacturer alone.

Now, sir, if that proposition be true, the agriculturists and the great mass of consumers of this country certainly have no share in the profits made by the manufacturers, and therefore no share in the benefits resulting from this species of taxation.

Mr. Chairman, there has been enough written and said upon this subject within the last week or two in the House of Representatives to deter almost anybody from attempting a set tariff speech at this stage of the discussion of the pending bill. History has been ransacked, libraries have been overhauled, and everything of interest upon the question that has been printed within the last hundred years has been quoted upon this floor.

I have been looking through the RECORD at some of the printed speeches, and they remind me of one of those new-fangled patch quilts, some of them "crazy-quilts" at that. They are patched all through with quotations and tables, and again quotations, in a manner which must appal the reader (and which certainly does appal the speaker), who is to follow their publication. I do not, therefore, expect, and do not undertake, to say anything new upon this subject; but I do wish to call the attention of the House and, as far as my words can reach, the attention of the country to the proposition I have laid down, that a tax which enriches the manufacturer impoverishes the farmer. We have seen in this discussion a good deal of skill and ability on the part of our friends on the other side in the manner in which they have conducted their part of it, so as to lead not only the minds of the members on this floor, but the minds of the people throughout the country, into a discussion of the principles of taxation, as if we were undertaking here to inaugurate a brand new system of tariff.

I wish it were true. I am ready for that contest whenever it comes. I do not believe in the present system. I do not believe in the principles on which the present system is based. But what is the bill under discussion and pending before the House to-day? Is it a departure from any principles involved in the Morrill tariff act? Not at all; it preserves, I am sorry to say, every principle and feature of that law. It is simply a proposition of modification and reduction. It does not touch a principle involved in what is known as the Morrill tariff act. I wish we had a bill pending before the House to-day based entirely upon a principle of equality and fairness—better and deeper than we can get in the present measure. But I do not intend to be led off by the adroitness and skill of our friends on the other side into discussing the principles involved in this bill. They are fastened upon us; and all we can hope to do, and all that this bill seeks to do, is simply to reduce under the present system the amount of taxes now collected by the Government and put into the Treasury; that is all.

What is the condition of the Treasury of the United States to-day under the present tariff law? What is the attitude of the Government of the United States contrasted with that of all the other nations of the earth in regard to this subject of taxation? Let us look for a moment.

At a meeting of the National Institute of Statistics, held in Europe, a detailed comparison of the revenues and expenditures of seven of the leading states of Europe was given by M. Cerboni, superintendent of accounts, or perhaps I should rather say auditor-general of the Kingdom of Italy. The total receipts and expenditures for these different nations for the year 1885–86 were as follows:

Austria—
Receipts	$380,000,000
Expenses	382,000,000
England—
Receipts	465,000,000
Expenses	480,000,000
France—
Receipts	602,000,000
Expenses	583,000,000
Germany—
Receipts	$477,000,000
Expenses	478,000,000
Italy—
Receipts	282,000,000
Expenses	286,000,000
Russia—
Receipts	613,000,000
Expenses	624,000,000
Spain—
Receipts	167,000,000
Expenses	175,000,000

With the exception of France, not one of these seven countries I have named levies $1 of tax upon its people over and above the amount needed for the ordinary and extraordinary expenses of the Government. Not a single European country to-day exacts more tribute from its people than it needs for the expenses of its government; and I say here to-day that there is not a kingdom in Europe that would dare to exact of its people $100,000,000 a year in excess of the needs of the government. Such an exaction would produce a revolution in any country in Europe. There is not a government upon the face of this earth, except the United States, that is strong enough to lay the heavy and hard hand of the taxing power upon its people in excess of the wants of that government. But under the system which has been fastened upon us, what have we been doing? In 1885–'86, the year referred to in the figures I have read, the gross receipts of our Government were $336,000,000, in round numbers, and the expenditures $221,000,000; in 1886–'87 the receipts were $371,000,000; actual expenses, $244,000,000; disbursements for all purposes, only $267,000,000, showing a surplus revenue in 1885–'86 of nearly $94,000,000, and in 1886–'87 nearly $104,000,000.

Under the present system the Government of the United States is exacting from the people of this country nearly a hundred million dollars a year more than it needs. For what purpose is this tribute levied? I propose to undertake to show for what purpose it is done. It is done to enrich favored classes that have fastened their fangs upon the legislation of this country. It is done to enrich one class of people at the expense of the masses. The wholes ystem was conceived in greed and avarice, and it has been maintained from that day to this by misrepresentation, corruption, and fraud.

Mr. PLUMB. Will my friend from Missouri allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HATCH. With great pleasure.

Mr. PLUMB. Are any of the European countries which have been named by the gentleman engaged in paying their public debt?

Mr. HATCH. I answer, yes, sir; some of them are paying their public debt, and some of them are paying interest on their public debt. France is paying part of her public debt. But the gentleman knows as well as I do that the United States Government to-day is not in a position to pay its public debt; and it has been placed in that same position by the same political party that inaugurated the system of legislation that exacts tribute from one portion of the country for the benefit of another.

But over and above all the needs of the Government beyond every dollar that the Government of the United States can use legitimately to-day, except to take the surplus and go into the open maket and pay an exorbitant price for these bonds, we are exacting from the people, taking from the arteries of trade and commerce, nearly $100,000,000 that ought to be left in the pockets of the honest people of the country.

Mr. PLUMB. I would like to ask one more question, if the gentleman pleases.

Mr. HATCH. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. Does not section 3693 of the Revised Statutes provide that the interest-bearing debt of the United States may be paid whenever bonds bearing a less rate of interest can be sold at par in coin; and if so, why not pay the public debt?

Well, my friend, I am one member of this House who has stood here for nine years pleading for the payment of this public debt.

Mr. HERBERT. We paid all that we could pay under the law, and now we are buying it.

Mr. HATCH. We paid every dollar that was due and are glad to do it, and if I have received any one instruction more emphatic than another from the people whom I have the honor to represent upon this floor, it is that I should always vote to pay the public debt. I have never seen occasion to vary from that principle. We are willing to be taxed for that purpose; but we are not willing to be robbed day after day and year after year to put money into the coffers of bloated monopolies and favored manufacturers of the country. That is the position the agricultural community of this country assumes to-day; and right here the gentleman's question reminds me of what I had intended to refer to later on, but shall take occasion to call attention to now.

If gentlemen on that side would read history, if their memories were not so treacherous, if they would learn the lesson which experience would teach from what transpired on this floor in the Forty-sixth Congress, they would accept with avidity and gladness the bill tendered to them by the Democratic party to-day.

My friend from New York sitting near me [Mr. COX] remembers it, all gentlemen around me remember it, when in the Forty-sixth Congress Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, then chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, reported to the House what was known as the Wood refunding bill, where he offered to the national banks, through the measure then presented, a bond, I believe, if my memory does not deceive me, of 3 per cent., and when what was known as the Carlisle amendment was put on the bill and passed the House and Senate; but the national banks, in the exercise of their arrogant power, induced the President of the United States to veto that bill; and yet within less than twelve months afterwards they would have given $10,000,0000 to have had it passed.

Never from that day to this has there been a time when as liberal a bill in their interest could be passed through the House of Representatives; and if gentlemen on the other side would learn a lesson from the experience of the past they would not only take this bill now before them, but they would take it by a unanimous vote upon that side and be glad to get it; for I tell you, gentlemen, if it is rejected now, within less than twelve months you will be willing to give millions of dollars to get as moderate a reduction of taxation as we now propose. In my judgment, if this bill is not passed by this Congress the voice of the people sweeping over the length and breadth of the land will place a membership in the Fifty-first Congress that will take this system, and, instead of simply reducing it as we propose to do, will bring it down to a point where it will do equal and exact justice to all the interests of the country without regard to favored classes or sections.

We have had some very remarkable statements made during the course of this debate. I think one of the most eloquent, easily and gracefully delivered speeches that I have ever had the pleasure of listening to was delivered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]; and one of the most laudatory of his own section that was ever delivered was delivered by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I propose to notice a few of the statements made by these gentlemen. The figures that I propose to embody in my remarks have been verified by the statistician of the Agricultural Department, and I believe they are exact and absolutely correct.

Now, it has been stated, and no man denies it, that since 1850 this country has grown in wealth and in prosperity at a ratio unprecedented in the history of any nation on earth. Notwithstanding the four years of the civil war, notwithstanding the destruction of property during that period—from 1850 to 1880—the country had grown to an extent almost startling when we contemplate it. It has grown up into the billions. I know it to be true; the figures state it. Gentlemen upon the other side as well as upon this side have quoted them, and I believe them to be correct. But where has that money been concentrated? What favored class, if any, in the United States have reaped the benefit of that great accumulation of wealth? Has it been equally and evenly distributed throughout the land? No. Has it, in any single State or section of the country, been distributed to all classes alike? No. Has one class solely got the benefit of it? Yes. Now, look first at the general figures before I come down to itemizing some of them.

The nearest estimate that can be made of the value of the agricultural wealth of this country is based upon the valuation of farms, farm animals, farm implements, and machinery. The ownership of the land, its improvements, the ownership of all the stock upon the farm, the ownership of all the tools and machinery necessary to run it, constitute the farmer's capital. In 1850 the farmers of this country owned $3,967,343,580 of property. In 1860—mark this—they had increased their aggregate wealth from the sum named to nearly eight billions, or, to be more exact, $7,980,493,063, a little more than doubling the original capital in ten years, and showing by calculation a net increase of about 101 per cent. In 1870 they had increased from $7,980,493,063 to $11,124,958,747; not quite 40 per cent. In 1880 they increased from $11,124,958,747 to $12,104,001,538, or only about 9 per cent. Between 1850 and 1860 we had the lowest tariff and the lowest rate of tax collections that we have had in this country for the past seventy years. Between 1870 and 1880 we have had the highest we have ever had. Between 1850 and 1860 the farmers of the country more than doubled their wealth, and between 1870 and 1880 they accumulated but 9 per cent. increase.

I append an exact and verified table of the figures.

	1850.	1860.	1870.	1880.
Farms	$3,271,575,426	$6,645,045,007	$9,262,803,861	$10,197,096,776
Farm animals	544,180,516	1,089,329,915	1,525,276,457	1,500,384,707
Farm implements	151,587,638	246,118,141	336,878,429	406,520,055
Total	3,967,343,580	7,980,493,063	11,124,958,747	12,104,001,538

While I do not claim that the high tariff since 1861 is the sole cause of this decay in the industry of more than half our people, I do most earnestly contend that in that fact is to be found the secret of one of the most potential causes of the terrible blight and depreciation of values which has befallen American agriculture.

If this is not true, why is it that during the same decades, and fostered and protected by this system, the manufacturing districts have so enormously increased in wealth? There is but one answer. Protection benefits the manufacturer alone, while it oppresses and levies tribute upon all other classes.

Now, contrast the statements made and the figures given with the following table of the wealth per capita of the nine manufacturing States with that of all the other States, from 1850 to 1880 inclusive:

Wealth per capita according to census estimate of true valuation.

Years.	For the nine manufacturing States, Maine to Pennsylvania, inclusive.			All other States.
	True value of real and personal estate.	Population.	Per capita.	True value of real and personal estate.	Population.	Per capita.
1850	$3,130,989,851	8,626,851	$363	$4,004,790,377	14,565,025	$275
1860	5,591,607,424	10,594,268	528	10,568,008,644	20,849,053	507
1870	15,290,032,687	12,298,739	1,243	14,778,485,820	26,259,641	563
1880	19,530,000,000	14,507,407	1,353	24,012,000,000	35,648,376	674

This shows that the wealth per head was nearly as much in other States as in the Eastern and Middle States in 1850 and 1860, while in 1880 it was twice as much per capita in the nine manufacturing States named.

The population of that region had increased 68 per cent., and wealth 527 per cent. The population of the other States had increased 145 per cent., and their wealth 500 per cent.; i. e., the increase of wealth in the manufacturing States is greater with an increment of 68 per cent. of population than in the other States, which show an increase of 145 per cent. in population.

But the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who, I am sorry to see, is not in his seat this morning—I do not know that I could make any impression upon him, but I would like him to hear what I have to say—the gentleman from New Hampshire, with a pride that was very commendable and an eloquence that is not excelled by that of any gentleman on this floor, gave us a graphic picture of the six New England States, how much they had gained in wealth, and he claimed that this prosperity was due to the present tariff laws, and I agree with him, as it is a complete vindication of my own position. Now let us see what proportion and what classes of the people of the six New England States have accumulated this property, and with what consummate tact and skill these gentlemen attempt to withhold from their constituents at home and from this House the real facts.

Oh! they fight the West as an agricultural producing region and not a manufacturing one; and they say we are sectional if we undertake to reform the tariff because it is in the interest of the West. I want to find out whether the agriculturists of the six New England States between 1870 and 1880 received their equal, fair, and just proportion of this immense accretion of wealth. In 1850, in the six New England States, the total value of the farms, farm animals, implements, etc., the wealth of the agriculturists of the six New England States, aggregated the amounts shown in the following table:

Total values of farms, farm animals, implements, etc., of the six New England States.

States.	1850.	1860.	1870.	1880.
New Hampshire	$66,432,023	$83,297,400	$99,295,801	$88,715,604
Maine	66,852,031	97,424,385	131,128,193	123,805,039
Vermont	78,749,737	114,196,989	168,506,189	140,811,400
Massachusetts	121,933,644	139,888,690	138,482,891	164,288,956
Rhode Island	19,100,640	22,179,388	25,496,346	29,039,040
Connecticut	82,086,453	104,480,565	145,033,019	135,185,831
Total	435,154,525	561,467,417	707,942,439	671,846,058

In 1880, after more than ten years of profound peace and unexampled prosperity, ten years of the largest accumulations of wealth that New England has never seen, the wealth of her agriculturists fell off from $707,000,000 to $671,000,000, a loss of over $36,000,000; while the same figures demonstrate the fact that the largest relative or percentage gain in agricultural wealth was during the low-tariff period between 1850 and 1860.

This system, merciless as death itself, robs alike the neighbor and the stranger; robs a portion of their own people as it does the people of the Mississippi Valley. The agriculturists and people to-day are poorer, relatively, than they were in 1870; and the census of 1890 will show that the decrease has been greater since 1880 than in the decade that I have named.

Mr. HERBERT. Illustrating the value of the home market they talked so much about.

Mr. HATCH. I will come to that presently. I want the two gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. BURNETT and Mr. RUSSELL], whom I see before me, who are representatives of this agricultural interest in New England, and my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. MCKINNEY], during this coming campaign to hold up to the farmers of New England this fact, that while New England has grown rich the farmers of New England have grown poor. In spite of their home market, in spite of the advantages of large cities and manufacturing towns and all the blessings that flow from this high protective tariff, as stated by our friends upon the other side, the agriculturists of New England are poorer than they were ten years ago.

Some gentleman upon the other side has spoken of the three great States of New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, the other three manufacturing States. From what has been said you would suppose that the agriculturists had grown very rich. What do the figures show in regard to those States—New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania?

Value of farms, farm animals, farm implements, and machinery.

	1850.	1860.	1870.	1880.
New York	$650,202,067	$936,366,584	$1,494,738,190	$1,216,637,765
New Jersey	135,342,305	202,131,598	286,854,890	212,678,330
Pennsylvania	464,098,693	754,166,275	1,194,786,853	1,095,405,324
Total	1,249,643,065	1,892,664,457	2,976,379,873	2,524,721,419

A loss of over four hundred and fifty millions in the last-named decade.

Mr. BLAND. Of farm values?

Mr. HATCH. This statement includes farm values, improvements, stock, and farming implements. They include the entire capital and wealth of the farmers of those States. And Pennsylvania, the most favored of all the States under the present system, with her myriad of highly protected industries, her unexampled accumulation of wealth in the hands of favored classes, her long role of millionaires laid the iron hand of protection upon her farmers, and in the name of "American industries" robbed the agriculturists of $99,381,529 in the decade between 1870 and 1880, and it is still going on in an increased ratio.

What a picture the little State of New Hampshire cuts in this table, the State that was so extolled by my friend [Mr. GALLINGER]. He held it up in contrast with Southern States and showed how much more money they were making than could possibly be made in the agricultural States of the South. How, then, stands New Hampshire in this race? In 1850 the agriculturists of that State had a value of $66,432,023; in 1860, $83,297,400; in 1870, $99,295,801. In 1880 they had lost nearly eleven millions of dollars, having only $88,715,693.

Now if this system of protective tariff piles up this immense amount of money, which has been stated, in the New England and other manufacturing States, I ask again, who gets it? As stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts in his history of Alexander Hamilton, the manufacturer alone gets it. But they say to us in the West, if you will simply build up manufactories and diversify your industries you will grow rich as we do. But, my friends, we do not want to grow rich as you do. Public sentiment in the West is upon a higher plane than robbing one portion of its own people to enrich another portion. [Applause.] Whenever you devise a system of taxation that will bear equally upon all the people of the West then we want to support it. But when you present to us a proposition that we shall rob nine men out of ten in the Mississippi Valley simply to make one man rich we reject it with scorn and contempt. And that is what you are doing.

Mr. CHEADLE. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. HATCH. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHEADLE. I understood you to say, in stating the evidence of wealth of the farming class, that it consisted in their lands and stock. Do you take into consideration the money they have on deposit at interest?

Mr. HATCH. Well, my friend, between 1850 and 1860 the farmers had some surplus money at interest; but since your party has been robbing them under the existing tariff system they have not any surplus money left. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CHEADLE. Will the gentleman now permit me to state just one fact?

Mr. HATCH. I can not yield for the gentleman to make a speech. If he wants to ask a question——

Mr. CHEADLE. As a representative of an agricultural district, I want to make just one statement of fact——

Mr. HATCH. Let the gentleman get his own time. I can not yield for a statement.

Mr. CHEADLE. I only desire to say——

Mr. HATCH. I decline to yield to the gentleman for his statement.

Mr. CHEADLE, while Mr. HATCH was proceeding with his remarks, endeavored to make himself heard.

Mr. HATCH. Oh, yes, I will stir you up worse than that before I get through. You gentlemen who are here representing agricultural districts in the West and are opposing this bill will find a storm of indignation when you go home that will be as much as you can meet. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I know whereof I speak.

Mr. KERR. I desire to ask the gentleman——

Mr. HATCH. The misfortune of the gentlemen over there is that whenever any one on this side of the House undertakes to make a point on this tariff bill they try to break the force of it; not with argument, but by undertaking to ask questions. They are living, breathing interrogation points. [Laughter.] There are some gentlemen over there who never take the pains to expend time and labor in the preparation of a speech of their own, but are always trying to get their names into somebody else's speech. They remind me very much of what I heard a distinguished Presbyterian divine of Kentucky say once when he referred to the fact that the greatest of English poets had stated that some men are born great, others achieve greatness, and others have greatness thrust upon them. If the poet had lived in this day and generation and been acquainted with the House of Representatives he would have added a fourth class—the class of men who are continually thrusting themselves upon greatness. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Only a question.

Mr. HATCH. I will yield to the gentleman for a question, if he will not make a speech.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I wish to ask whether it is entirely becoming for the gentleman from Missouri to make that charge against this side of the House, in view of the fact that we have extended his time half an hour, although there are many gentlemen here still desirous to speak?

Mr. HATCH. That has nothing in the world to do with the question I have stated, for I have patiently sat in my seat during this entire debate and have never interrupted a gentleman on either side by a question. I am not in the habit of doing so. When a gentleman has anything to say on this floor let him say it in his own time; and if I want to reply I will take my own time to do it, and not try to force myself into his speech. I was under the impression that the extension of time was given to me and not to gentlemen who seek to consume it with questions.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE] asked me whether I included in my statement the money owned by the farmers. So far as was possible to get at that matter in taking the census of what the farmers own their money is included. This is a statement of the agricultural wealth of the country. But I want to state here, without the fear of successful contradiction, that the bank deposits by farmers in the agricultural districts of the country have been steadily going down, growing "beautifully less" under this tariff, ever since 1860. I know a bank in my own county to-day which was in existence between 1850 and 1860; and you know it (addressing Mr. BIGGS, who sat near Mr. HATCH); you borrowed many a dollar from it with which to handle stock—I refer to the old Branch Bank of the State of Missouri, at Palmyra. It still exists under a different name. Between 1850 and 1860, in Paris and Palmyra, the county seats of Monroe and Marion Counties, and other large agricultural counties, 75 per cent. of the stock of the local banks and of all the money deposited therein belonged to the farmers. Is not that true?

Mr. BIGGS. It is; I know it to have been the fact.

Mr. HATCH. And to-day 75 per cent. of the loans of those banks are made to the farmers. That is the way the tables have turned. I challenge the statement of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] when he says that one-third of the deposits in the savings-banks of New England are made by farmers. I deny that statement; and I challenge him at any time during this discussion to produce any statistics to show that any such proportion of the farmers of New England are depositors in the savings-banks. I know that the farmers are getting poorer every year. I know it by personal experience; I know it by personal intercourse with leading farmers in the West; I know it by statistics which no man can gainsay. And it is perfectly natural that it should be so. The burden of this tariff taxation falls upon them; they pay the heaviest proportion of it. Everything that they buy is taxed, and everything that they sell is free.

I see the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER] in his seat. I want to refer to a very singular statement made by him and a table printed in his speech. On page 3895 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that gentleman, with a facetiousness that has never been equaled on this floor except by one or two other distinguished gentlemen, undertook to ridicule the idea that the farmers are not protected under our existing tariff legislation; and he gave a list of the imports of farm products——

Mr. GUENTHER. Do you propose to protect the farmers?

Mr. HATCH. Do I propose to protect them? Well, if you will just listen a few minutes, you will hear my answer to that question; I will show you how I propose to protect them. I propose to protect them simply by keeping them from being robbed, that is all. I want to protect them against robbery, but not against fair competition in the open markets of the world.

But the gentleman from Wisconsin prints a list of farm products imported into the country, and under the head of breadstuffs he has placed barley; and then in a note——

Mr. GUENTHER rose.

Mr. HATCH. Let me get through my statement. You will be more uneasy before I am done with you. According to the gentleman's statement nearly $6,000,000 worth of breadstuffs were imported in three months, and over $4,000,000 worth consisted of barley. Barley is brought from Canada to Milwaukee and Rochester and Detroit, and made into beer, every bushel of it made into beer. I ask, then, is barley a breadstuff? Does the gentleman claim that barley is a necessary of life?

Mr. GUENTHER. It is to some persons. [Laughter.]

Mr. HATCH. But, Mr. Chairman, I want to show the skill with which these gentlemen try to mislead the people. They talk about the imported "breadstuffs," when four millions out of the six millions are barley for beer! And the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER] makes a great speech about that.

Mr. ATKINSON. Is the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] aware of the fact that in the report on Commerce and Navigation barley is classified as breadstuffs?

Mr. HATCH. Oh, yes, I know it is; and the man down there that classified it in that way knows as little about it as my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER] or the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GUENTHER. We know as much in Wisconsin about agriculture as they know in Missouri.

Mr. HATCH. Then the gentleman says wheat is protected. Wheat protected! Oh, yes. They say, "We protect the farmer by putting a tariff of 20 cents per bushel on wheat." What farmer in Wisconsin is so ignorant that you can palm that off on him? What farmer lives to-day in the Mississippi Valley, who grows a bushel of wheat, that you can palm off on him the proposition that he is protected by a duty on wheat? Gentlemen talk about wheat coming over the Canadian line; and that duty was laid upon wheat to protect a few farmers upon the Canadian border.

Mr. GUENTHER. Will the gentleman permit me——

Mr. HATCH. I can not yield further.

Mr. GUENTHER. Then the gentleman should not assail me.

Mr. HATCH. I do not propose to assail the gentleman. I assail his argument. The gentleman has had his time, and I did not interrupt him.

Mr. GUENTHER. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. HATCH. Yes; ask me a question, if you want to.

Mr. GUENTHER. Do you know the difference between the price of wheat in Canada and the price of wheat in Wisconsin?

Mr. HATCH. I do, and I am going to tell you. I will give you all that information. Just hold still for a minute or two. I know it hurts. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GUENTHER. Oh, no, it does not hurt me.

Mr. HATCH. Now, Mr. Chairman, in 1887 the United States produced 456,000,000 bushels of wheat, that is, we were the largest wheat-producing country in the world. In the same year Canada produced 36,000,000 bushels. And yet we, producing 456,000,000 bushels, are afraid of Canada with her little 36,000,000 bushels! If you take out of the Canadian product one-ninth, or 4,000,000 bushels, for seed, that leaves Canada only 32,000,000 bushels to feed her own people and for export. And yet gentlemen tell the farmers of the United States that they are protected because we levy a duty of 20 cents a bushel on wheat! Gentlemen, you do not deceive anybody by that proposition. There was a time when wheat was exported from the United States to Canada. I heard the Hon. Frank Hurd, at Trenton, N. J., on the 27th of January, 1887, make the statement I am about to read, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BURNETT] heard it, too, and it has been published. Mr. Hurd said:

I remember the time when this country shipped millions of bushels of grain annually to Canada. A number of firms in our city of Toledo, Ohio, grew rich out of the trade with Canada under the reciprocity treaty. Now Canada has a specific duty of 25 cents a bushel on your wheat, avowedly for the purpose of retaliation.

Oh, yes, Canada has put a duty of 25 cents a bushel on American wheat, and the American farmer, when he wants a few bushels of Canadian wheat or barley to improve the quality of his grain or to get a new variety, has to pay a tariff of 10 or 20 cents a bushel on it.

Mr. GUENTHER. Mr. Chairman, I have waited very patiently for the gentleman's answer to my question about the difference between the price of wheat in Canada and the price of wheat in Wisconsin, or Minnesota, or Michigan.

Mr. HATCH. I have got that table here, and when I come across it I will give the gentleman the figures.

Mr. GUENTHER. I thought you knew it. I thought you knew everything about agriculture.

Mr. HATCH. How much is it? Can the gentleman state it himself?

Mr. GUENTHER. You state it. This is not my speech.

Mr. HATCH. No; but if this was his speech the gentleman would cut a much better figure when he goes back to Wisconsin in the next campaign. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GUENTHER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Chairman, I appeal to the gentleman whether he has not taken up enough of my time. I am afraid he is in the condition of the infant he described here the other day, and that he is crying for peppermint. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GUENTHER. Oh, no; my stomach is in excellent condition. [Laughter.]

Mr. HATCH. Now, gentlemen talk about the price of wheat, and we have heard a great deal on that subject. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] gave an illustration the other day that ought to be an answer to every gentleman upon the other side on this question of the price of wheat. The value of wheat is fixed in the markets of the world. The value of every bushel of wheat or grain in Canada, in Kansas, in New York, in Massachusetts, or in any State, is fixed by the markets of the world, plus the cost of the transportation that is necessary to take it to the center of trade. The price of wheat in Canada is controlled by its quality or grade and the locality at which it is offered for sale, just as it is in this country.

Mr. MORGAN. And the center of trade is where the surplus goes.

Mr. HATCH. There is where the surplus goes.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], in the very eloquent and classical speech that he made a few days ago, stated that only about 10 per cent. of the products of the farmers of this country were exported. Yes; we do not export much of the peas and strawberries and "goober" peas, and all that; but why is not the gentleman candid and frank enough in his statement to say to the House and to the country what proportion of the great cereal crops are exported? Mr. Chairman, three-tenths of all the wheat grown in this country is exported. Between 1876 and 1880 one-third of the entire crop was exported. A little over one-half of the tobacco crop is exported; and about seven-tenths of the entire cotton crop. Of all meat products, from 8 per cent. to 10 per cent.; and of pork products alone 15 per cent. is the average for the last twenty-five years, and within that time it has reached a total export of 25 per cent. We have exported in one year the product of seven millions of hogs.

There are a good many things in that table that never were raised for export; they are strictly for home consumption, and a very large proportion are for consumption in the immediate family that raises them. A very small proportion of perishable vegetables and fruits go abroad.

But the point that I want to emphasize right here is this: That the farmers of Missouri and the Mississippi Valley have the price of their great products fixed by what that surplus brings in the markets of the world. Liverpool fixes the price of wheat for the world; and it amuses me to find gentlemen upon the other side, almost with tears in their eyes, pleading for protection from pauper labor of Europe in behalf of their rich manufacturers. Have you ever heard one of them say a word about the pauper labor of Europe as it affects the agricultural classes of this country?

Mr. BIGGS. Not one.

Mr. HATCH. Not one, says my friend from California. I know it; not one. Not one word is uttered or one thought given in behalf of the great masses of our people who are the bulk of the laborers of this country, the agricultural masses of our community. And what sort of competition do they have to meet?

Mr. Chairman, here is a table embodied in a crop report, No. 46, of the Department of Agriculture, and on page 590 I find a tabulated list of the wages of agricultural laborers in some of the countries producing wheat. Listen to it. India, that produced in 1887, 239,000,000 bushels of wheat to throw upon the markets of the world, in 1886 paid for wages (reduced to dollars and cents in our currency) $2.38 a month, and in 1884 it was just $2 a month.

The wages of agricultural labor were equivalent to $2.28 per month in 1876, $2.01 in 1884, and if the same nominal rate in 1887, the reduction in value of the rupee would make $1.81, or nearly 7 cents per day for twenty-six working days. The rupee is rated at 43.6 cents in 1876, 38.6 in 1884, and 34.6 in 1887.

The following statement shows the interior average prices of wheat, and also the wages of agricultural labor.

Think of it for a moment: 7 cents a day the laborer in the wheat fields of India gets; and our friends who are in favor of this system of building up the industries of the country, of piling up the money in the pockets and coffers of the manufacturers, never look beyond that manufacturing interest or have a word to say when they are confronted with the proposition that the American wheat-grower comes into competition with foreign labor that can live on $2.38 a month or as low as 7 cents a day. It is all right for the farmers to compete with the cheap and most degraded labor of the world, but it is terrible if the American artisan and machinist and mechanic have to come into competition with the skilled and cheaper labor of Europe.

I here append a table showing the wheat supply of the world for the years 1880 to 1887, inclusive, that those interested may examine carefully the condition and price of the labor with which the American wheat-grower must compete in raising this most valuable and important cereal.

But to continue the line of thought I was pursuing. I am sorry the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] is not in his seat. I think the climax of absurdity was reached in that gentleman's remarks when he said of the woolen industries of the United States—and I want to quote his exact words as I find them on page 11 of the printed speech. He says:

The great wool-growing interest of the country, a matter of prime interest to all civilized people, only in the infancy of its development.

The wool industry of the United States only in the infancy of its development! We have heard a good deal of "infant industries," but this is carrying it further than I thought a gentleman would have the temerity to do on this floor. I want to put into my speech in the RECORD, so that the gentleman will read it and learn the facts, a reference to some of the early lessons of his childhood that he will find taken from the Bible. As far back as the fourth chapter of Genesis we find, in the second verse:

And Abel was a keeper of sheep.

And when he has digested that and familiarized himself with the flocks of Abel, I want him to turn to the twenty-first chapter of Genesis and read the verses, 21 to 31, inclusive, where Abraham presented Abimelech with sheep and oxen.

And Abraham set seven ewe lambs of the flock by themselves.

That they might be a witness and a commemoration of his having digged the well in dispute.

Wherefore he called that place Beersheba.

And if he is not satisfied with that, let him turn to the thirty-second chapter of Genesis and read there verses 9 to 20, inclusive, where Jacob makes the peace-offering to Esau, including two hundred ewes and twenty rams; a larger flock perhaps than any farmer owns in the district represented by the gentleman from Michigan.

Wool-growing an infant industry! The oldest in the history of man, coming down to us consecrated by ages, marking the very footsteps of civilization and the pathway of progress. Shepherds throughout the world have been caring for their flocks since the oldest history of man; and yet the gentleman talks about it and about wool-growing as an "infant industry!"

I have not time to go into all that I had intended to say upon this wool question; but as a representative of the Western farmer, a wool-grower myself to about the same extent as probably an average of ninety-nine farmers out of one hundred in the Mississippi Valley, I declare that the farmers of the Mississippi Valley to-day, almost unanimously, are in favor of free wool and a corresponding reduction upon the manufactured woolen goods of the country. Give us a reduction of manufactured woolen goods; give us the open markets of the world in which to sell our products, and the American farmer will undertake, wherever it can be profitably done, to grow wool in competition with any other country in the world. Except upon the plains of the Territories and States of the far West the growing of wool as a matter of profit is not an industry; it is simply an incident upon the farms.

The farmers in the Mississippi Valley keep small flocks of sheep for their value in the market as mutton, and the wool crop is simply an incident to that industry.

In support of these positions I will append two articles from the Chicago Tribune of recent date, carefully prepared, ably written, and strengthened by unquestioned facts and figures:

UTTER FAILURE OF THE HIGH WOOL TARIFF.

The chief reduction effected by the Mills bill is in putting wool on the free-list. No other single item of the bill, save that on sugar, would lead to a reduction of over $2,000,000 of revenue, while the free-listing of wool will of itself cut down the surplus revenues over $12,000,000 and lead to the cheapening of clothing more that one hundred millions a year. Free wool, therefore, must be considered the distinctive feature of the bill, and the ultra protectionists who have made this provision of the measure their strongest attack should be encouraged to continue the fight on the ground of their own choosing.

No tariff is more unjustifiable than that on raw wool, and the pretense that the levy operates to protect and benefit farmers is already disproved by incontrovertible facts. Eagerly seeking to make a handle of the wool tariff, because this tax was imposed ostensibly for the protection of farmers, the bounty-monopoly advocates now find they have caught a Tartar, but they should not be permitted to shift the argument and abandon the ground of their own selection. Free wool is the chief provision in any genuine tariff-reform bill, and on that main issue the contest must turn.

As the Tribune has repeatedly shown from the official record, the number of sheep in the States of Ohio, Michigan, Pennsylvania, New York, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, and Minnesota decreased during the period of high wool duties between 1867 and 1882 from 29,879,222 to 14,761,150, or a loss of one-half—a frightful decline of a product in so short a time, and so highly protected. Wool-growing was better maintained during the period of high protection in Pennsylvania and Ohio than in any other States east of the Missouri, but even in these exceptional States the loss was heavy. The Pittsbugh Post has prepared the following table on wool-growing in New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, the figures being taken from the census of 1860, the agricultural report of 1887, and the Treasury report on wool prices:

1860—NO TARIFF.

Sheep in Pennsylvania	1,631,540
Sheep in Ohio	3,546,767
Sheep in New York	2,617,855
Prices—fine	56 to 60 cents
Prices—medium	45 to 50 cents
Prices—coarse	40 to 42 cents

1887—HIGH TARIFF.

Sheep in Pennsylvania	1,094,323
Sheep in Ohio	4,562,913
Sheep in New York	1,579,866
Prices—fine	33 to 34 cents
Prices—medium	37 to 38 cents
Prices—coarse	33 to 35 cents

SOME OF THE RESULTS.

Decrease of sheep in three States after twenty years' high protection	539,090
Decrease in prices—fine wool	23 to 26 cents
Decrease in prices—medium wool	8 to 12 cents
Decrease in prices—coarse wool	7 cents

If such results as these had followed a reduction of duties or the placing of an article on the free-list the lamentations of the high-tariff monopolies would continue without ceasing; but they must now face the fact that the wool tariff failed to secure even for sheep-growing farmers the results promised, and that even in New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio wool-growing declined disastriously under high protection. What was promised at the time this tariff was adopted? Mr. Stephen Colwell, the most active and influential person in devising the wool tariff of 1867, said:

"Give us the needful protection and we will engage that sheep husbandry will increase and be remunerative, while woolen manufactures will expand and diversify, affording a market for the raw material and rescuing the people from their dependence on foreign lands for their clothing, which they will be able to procure permanently at home at less cost than abroad."

How completely each of these promises has been falsified! Instead of sheep husbandry being extended and made remunerative it has dwindled away and fallen off fully 50 per cent. in the States east of the Missouri, and but for the value of sheep as mutton none of the animals could now be raised at a profit in this portion of the country. Instead of woolen manufacturing being expanded and diversified factories can be found all through the manufacturing sections of the East that have been standing idle for years or working only on half time, and, as a leading woolen manufacturer recently said, an advertiser who would offer to buy a woolen-mill at 50 per cent. of its cost would have "more answers than if he wanted a bull pup."

Instead of having a home supply of wool, nearly one-half the wool used in the United States is imported, notwithstanding a 41 per cent. duty, and the raw wool and that embodied in woolen goods brought into this country from abroad with duties added on both, cost the people at least $60,000,000 per annum. The tremendous burden of a high tax and incident bounties on an article of prime necessity used by every man, woman, and child has been endured for twenty years without producing any of the benefits promised to the farmer, the wool manufacturer, or the wearer of woolen goods.

Mr. Colwell said at the time the high wool tariff was adopted, "The protectionists only asked that their policy should receive a fair trial," and pointed "to the other industries wherein their promises were fulfilled." The trial was granted, and after twenty years the experiment has proved a wretched failure to the growers of sheep and an onerous burden to the people. All persons concerned in wool-growing, as farmers, manufacturers, or consumers, have suffered great injury, and benefit has accrued to no one except a handful of wealthy ranchmen who have great flocks of sheep on the Government and cheap lands of the far Southwest herded by shepherd dogs and the underfed Mexican greasers on nominal pay. And it is the underselling of these ranchmen that has broken down the wool market and almost ruined the sheep-growing business east of the Missouri.

As the flocks of sheep steadily decrease under the coddling of a high tariff of 41 cent. protection in all the States east of Western Kansas and Nebraska, west and south of the ninety-seventh parallel of longitude, in the ranch country, the number of sheep increases. It is the competition of this great area, where sheep can be raised for almost nothing, that is killing our wool-growing in all the old Western, Central, and Eastern States. The following table exhibits the average size of flocks in 1880 and the per cent. of increase to 1885 in the competing sections:

States.	Owners.	Average flock.	Increase.
			Per cent.
Nebraska	2,119	157	135
Kansas	3,804	216	30
Utah	2,001	282	8
Washington	1,067	428	18
Oregon	4,605	560	99
California	4,326	1,430	11
Idaho	128	1,465	60
Colorado	406	3,075	14
Montana	137	3,400	67
Nevada	97	4,000	68
New Mexico	814	5,450	13
Texas	8,390	9,480	118
Wyoming	44	13,600	33
Arizona	35	23,220	74

The increase here has been, from 1880 to 1884, from 17,710,351 to 25,319,877. Nothing has checked it.

The high wool tariff enables these States and Territories to undersell and seize the American market for wool; and yet scores of Congressmen whose constituents are going out of the wool-growing business refuse to vote to give their people cheaper clothes by placing wool on the free-list. Who are they representing, any way? Certainly not the people living east of the Missouri River.

These gentlemen from the East, who talk so glibly about a home market for the products raised upon the farm and what a value it is to the farmer if he has got a market at his door, do not understand the condition of things in the Mississippi Valley, where farming is upon a broader scale than raising products from little truck patches. There the farmer is dependent not alone upon his home market, but upon agriculturists in other sections of the country and the markets of the world. Where does the farmer of Missouri go for a market for the surplus mules and horses that he raises? To the South. He goes to the cotton-planters and sugar-planters and rice-planters of the South. The very best market that the Western farmer has to-day for the surplus of the grain upon his farm he finds when he goes to the Southern planter. He goes to him to sell his stock and his bacon. The farmers of the West are as much interested in the price of cotton as the cotton-planter himself. If cotton is depressed, if there is a short crop at the South, there is a low market for the mules and the horses and the surplus produce of the farms of the West. All this boastful talk about the home market for the farmer has been so often exploded that I will not take up the time of the House to go into it further, except simply to affirm that, with the facilities of transportation we have to-day, the farmer of New England has got to sell all but the perishable products he raises in competition with the other sections of the country.

I say the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BURNETT], who is said to be the owner and proprietor of the model dairy farm of New England, to-day can not sell the surplus butter produced in that dairy in Boston except at a price fixed by the creameries of Iowa and Northern Illinois.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. That is true.

Mr. HATCH. I know it to be true. Transportation and facilities of exchange have obliterated distances in this country; and except for the little truck which perishes in a day and must be marketed at once, no farmer is benefited by a home market; because when he takes anything worth raising into the market to sell he has got to have the price fixed for it by the markets of the country.

Now, what burdens are imposed upon the farmers of the country under the present system. And how moderately and modestly the majority on this side of the House propose to reduce them at this time! Look at salt. Every farmer in the United States is bound to have salt. He can not raise his stock without it. There are two hundred and sixty-eight salt manufactories in the United States, according to the census of 1880; and now they are all under one trust. The entire product is fixed by a trust. There are two hundred and sixty-eight manufactories, with a capital of $8,225,740, and an average number of hands of 4,289; and sixty millions of people every day of their lives pay tribute to these two hundred and sixty-eight manufacturers of salt. Every head of stock in the United States, as it licks its little daily portion of salt to preserve its life, pays tribute to two hundred and sixty-eight manufacturers of salt.

The farmer buys his piece of land and undertakes to improve it by building a house, and every single article he wants to put into that house is taxed in the interest of a monopoly—his lumber $2 a thousand; his window-glass 61 to 68 per cent. for the smaller sizes and 94 to 108 per cent. for larger sizes of window-glass. Now, there were fifty-eight manufacturers of window-glass in 1880. I have understood there was a convention of them held here some time this winter, and they numbered seventy-two, but in 1880 there were fifty-eight protected by an average of about 65 per cent. for the small sizes of glass, and sixty million of people, as they look out of their windows on the bright light of heaven, have to pay tribute to fifty-eight manufacturers. Every poor man starting in the struggle of life, who tries to build a shelter for his family; every poor man starting in the race with an ambition to own a home of his own—in my judgment the grandest ambition that ever took possession of a young man—before he can put a light into his window must pay 65 per cent. tribute to these fifty-eight manufacturers. And they come and tell us, "If you remove this exorbitant tax, or even cut it down, you will destroy our industry;" and they tried to frighten my friend from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] when on the floor by shaking the red flag of window-glass industry at him.

Why, my friend, if you people in Maryland who are engaged in the manufacture of window-glass are not unlike all the other citizens of Maryland, when you tell them that sixty million people are paying tributes to these few glass manufacturers, they will stand by you in your vote upon this bill. Stop their industry? I do not believe a word of it. But suppose it does stop it; if it has got to be subsidized with the blood and the labor of sixty million people, let it go; let it stop. Tell your fifty-eight manufacturers to go and engage in some honorable industry that does not have to be subsidized by the people to make it profitable. Gentlemen talk here about this little industry and that little industry having to stop if we do not subsidize them. Then, in God's name, let them all stop. Let them stop, and go and engage in some honorable business that does not have to take money out of the pockets of the rest of the people in order to make it profitable. That sort of argument has no terrors for me—none in the world. I never could see any sense in robbing one hundred men to make one man rich, and it is nothing but robbery.

Grindstones—there is not a farmer in the United States that can run his farm without a grindstone, and that is taxed, too. Grindstones are taxed about 15 per cent. Linseed oil, which the farmer needs to paint his house and his other buildings, is taxed 54.79 per cent. There is a tax of 76½ per cent. on vinegar, and they call that a protection to the farmer. Some gentlemen on the other side of the House have set forth in their speeches tabular statements in which they include vinegar as a farm product or industry, but I can tell those gentlemen that Yankee industry has wrought a wonderful change of late years in the manner of producing vinegar. It is now a manufacturing industry and in 1880 had 306 establishments in full operation. Vinegar made upon the farm has entirely disappeared from the commerce of the country.

Mr. HIRES. Can the gentleman explain to the House upon his principles how it happens that the poor man that he talks about buys his window-glass now under this "oppressive" system cheaper than he bought it under the tariff which was in force in 1861?

Mr. HATCH. Oh, well, if that is true—if the tariff does not increase the price to the consumer—why do you want to keep it on?

Mr. BUCHANAN. But if it does not hurt you, why do you want to keep it off?

Mr. HATCH. But it does hurt us; and if you were not afraid you would let us take it off. You want to keep the tariff on because you know that it enhances the profits of the glass manufacturer. If that is not true, what is the sense of keeping it on?

Mr. Chairman, I am admonished that my time has nearly expired. I have a word to say to my political brethren on this side of the House before I close. Gentlemen upon the other side who are opposing the passage of this bill are offering nothing in its stead for the relief of the people. They are divided among themselves upon every proposition, as has been fully explained to the House. They would not dare to vote to-day to repeal the entire internal-revenue taxes. They will not go before the country upon a platform of free whisky and free tobacco, and taxed clothes and taxed window-glass, taxed lumber and taxed salt. I know they will not do it, and it is all hypocrisy and cant to pretend that they will do it.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. We will try them on it.

Mr. HATCH. It is all hypocrisy and cant, for hypocrisy and cant, like injustice and oppression, find congenial shelter under this robber flag of protection. But, my friends, we are advancing rapidly. In the Forty-eighth Congress a tariff bill had been introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and on the 6th day of May, 1884, after it had been in Committee of the Whole for awhile, the enacting clause was stricken out. Gentlemen would not even wait for the perfecting of the bill under the five-minute rule, but voted to strike out the enacting clause. Again, in the Forty-ninth Congress, they voted against going into Committee of the Whole to even consider a tariff bill. But now we have not only got a tariff bill under discussion, but there is a fair prospect of its passing the House. Moderate and conservative as it is, it will give some relief. It will pass, and I believe that when it comes to the final vote, every Democrat on this side of the House will vote for it.

The gentleman from Michigan, with an assumed irony which I have never heard surpassed, undertook to break the force of that sentence of the President's message which states that it is a condition and not a sentiment that confronts us. Yes, my friends, it is a condition. It is the condition of the agricultural masses of the country that I have undertaken in my feeble way to lay before the House. It is the condition of the great mass of the laboring and producing classes of the country. It is that condition which confronts us to-day; it is one of bondage to these manufacturing establishments; and the time is coming, and that very soon, when the bands of that bondage are to be broken by the action of this House.

Mr. Chairman, for eighteen hundred years that which, more than anything else, has given to the Christian hope and strength in his struggle with the enemies of Christianity has been that grand declaration of Paul to the Phillippians, when he said that every knee shall bow and every tongue shall confess the divinity of the Saviour and the fundamental truth of the Christian religion. As a Democrat, believing in the power of Democratic principles to relieve our people from this great oppression, I rejoice to-day with exceeding great joy that the time is coming and coming quickly, coming with the first bright days of June, when every Democratic knee in the United States shall bow to the decrees of the overwhelming majority of the Democratic party, and every Democratic tongue shall confess revenue reform as the fundamental principle of the Democratic party. [Loud applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SYMES. Mr. Chairman, the so-called tariff question has been discussed more in this country than any other. Ever since Alexander Hamilton, the greatest genius of the American financial and industrial policy, made his report in 1789 to the First Congress upon raising and collecting the revenue, the tariff has been the leading topic of discussion and a leading question in the division of political parties. All parties have agreed in the past, and still agree, that the collection of duties on imports is a legal and proper mode of raising the ordinary revenues for the support of the Government. All parties have in the past agreed that direct taxation or internal revenue should be resorted to only in times of great emergencies and when the demands of the Government are greater than it is practicable to levy or raise by taxing foreign imports. The leading American thinkers and statesmen who have risen above the behests of local demands or the temporary exigencies of a political campaign have always held to this fundamental principle of American revenue and taxation. I can not, in my limited time, take a view of and cite from the history of these questions.

But it will not be denied that the statesmen of both parties have never advocated resorting to internal taxation in this country except in pressing emergencies, and such taxes have been immediately removed when the extraordinary demands that gave rise to them have ceased. Internal or direct taxes have been imposed upon the American people only three times in the history of the Government. The first time was in 1791–'92, and it lasted until 1801. President Jefferson, in his first message to Congress, specially recommended the repeal of these internal taxes, and they were repealed. In his second message he spoke of internal taxation as extraordinary, and only to be resorted to in great emergencies. The war of 1812 with England created such an extraordinary demand on the Treasury that internal taxation had to be again resorted to. So soon as that emergency was over President Monroe in 1817 specially recommended its repeal. No other internal or direct taxes were levied until the war of the rebellion, when they became necessary to assist in the preservation of the Union. So it appears that all internal taxes have been immediately repealed when the demands of the Government made it practicable, with the single exception of the large internal-revenue taxes which have been continued during the past fifteen years.

The repeal or material modification of the present internal taxes has been and is now opposed by the Democratic party. In this, as in many other things, we find the Democrats advocating a policy contrary to the judgment and opinions of the great statesmen from whom they pretend to derive their political principles. Under the leadership of the President they are endeavoring to fasten permanently upon the people of this country a system of internal or direct taxation which is at war with the true theory of the American system. They insist on keeping up this direct tax, with its inquisitorial methods and its 4,000 officers scattered over the country, after the extraordinary emergency under which it was adopted by the Republican party had passed away. Although the demand for this direct taxation seemed imperative when the same was adopted during the war, still it must be doubted whether the people of the country would have indorsed such a system, or Congress have enacted it, if it had even been supposed it was to be a permanent direct-tax system engrafted upon the institutions of this country. It has heretofore been the pride of the American people that they had no inquisitorial direct-tax system characteristic of the governments of Europe; that, having no standing armies in time of peace, the demands for a direct-tax system could only arise to supply deficiencies in time of war or other great emergencies.

Mr. Chairman, there is good reason and the best of causes for this American system of taxation, and the policy of raising substantially all the revenues of the Government in time of peace by duties on imports and resorting to direct taxation only when necessary to meet the extraordinary demands of the Government in time of war. This is the only method by which stability and permanency can be given to the commercial, financial, and industrial interests of the country.

All must concede that a very high tariff, a very low tariff, or a medium tariff will result in establishing, building up, and giving prosperity to or causing the decline or destruction of, as the case may be, many leading industries of the country. If the tariff is to be made by Congress very high or very low, according to temporary emergencies of the Government, it will overthrow all the future prosperity and permanency of our manufacturing and industrial interests. Such a vacillating policy of legislation, depending upon real or imaginary contingencies, or on the opinions of some politician who temporarily occupies the Executive chair, must necessarily subvert and destroy the industrial American system, which supplies the ordinary revenues of the Government, protects American labor, and gives material prosperity to the whole nation.

Mr. Chairman, a change in the permanency of this American system will remit us to those dark and bankrupt times from 1846 to 1857, brought upon the country by the Democratic party after they had succeeded in defeating the father of the protective system, Henry Clay, by falsely pretending before the people in the Presidential campaign of 1844 they would not repeal the tariff of 1842. The history of that campaign and the course of the Democratic party seems to be repeating itself. The revenue reformers in the last campaign insisted they did not propose to so revise or change the tariff as to interfere with the wages of American workmen or with the great industrial and manufacturing interests. But immediately after the election of the first Democratic President in a quarter of a century, a combined effort is made to so lower the import duties and so add to the free-list that it must result in a great reduction of wages to the laboring men and in the overthrow and destruction of many of the industrial interests of the country. The result of raising the ordinary revenues for the support of the Government by duties on foreign imports must be that many manufacturing, mining, and other industries which furnish raw material to the manufacturers will be protected from foreign competition.

A confidence in the permanency of such a system of taxation has caused hundreds of millions of money to be invested and expended in the erection of permanent plants for manufacturing, mining, and other industries closely allied to them. Millions of artisans and skilled laborers in these protected industries have become dependent upon the prosperity of these factories for the support of themselves and their families. This state of things has continued for a long series of years. Manufacturing and kindred industries have become permanently established. The capitalists, owners, and operatives in this great system of industries have staked their capital, their enterprise, and their energy upon the permanency of this American system of protection by tariff which has existed for so many years. It can not be said those protective tariffs which have built up these industries were, to any considerable extent, war taxes. It can not be said that those interested had any reason to suppose the new unheard of and untried policy proclaimed by the President and the Democratic party at this time, of reducing the surplus and the revenues by the repeal of the tariff taxes instead of by the abolishment of the internal-revenue system, could have been apprehended. The history of all political parties from the origin of the Government seemed to demonstrate that no such radical change in the American system of finance and taxation would be entertained.

The extraordinary demands of the Government for the revenues collected both from the tariff and internal taxes have ceased. The war has long since ended. The great national debt created by the war has been nearly paid off. A large surplus is accumulating in the Treasury, which must be disposed of, and the revenues of the Government must be reduced. All concede this. There is no conflict of opinion between the two parties upon the proposition that the surplus and the revenues must be reduced. This is the question that confronts us to-day.

Mr. Chairman, it is the same question which confronted the Government and the people when Jefferson was elected President in 1801. It is the same question that confronted the people and the administration after the election of President Monroe in 1817; and it is the same question that has been before this country practically since the election of the first Democratic House of Representatives in 1874. The Republican party had a majority in the Forty-seventh Congress, and made a revision and reduction of both the tariff and internal taxes. A small portion of the Democratic party since 1874 have advocated that the internal revenues should be reduced as well as the tariff taxes. But after the election of President Cleveland the avowed policy of the party is to maintain permanently the internal-revenue and direct-tax system, and to make such a reduction in the duties on imports and by adding to the free-list that the revenues derived from tariff taxes added to the internal-revenue receipts shall be only sufficient to support the Government.

President Cleveland in his last onslaught upon the protective system and harangue in favor of free trade, by courtesy called his third annual message, specially urges the retaining, permanently, the internal-tax system and the reduction of the revenues of the Government by the repeal of tariff taxes.

The Republican party advocates the repeal or modification of the internal-tax system, because a war measure, and the maintaining of such tax on imports as will not interfere with the prosperity of the manufacturing and other kindred industries depending upon them, and such as will not affect the employment or lower the wages of the American workmen.

The position of the President and his party is entirely impracticable, if we should admit that it was politic. The Republican party claims that the tariff should be equitably and properly revised, and some reductions made so as to correct the inequalities and suit it to the industrial changes that have taken place since the Republicans last revised it in the Forty-seventh Congress. But they are opposed to making such a reduction of the tariff as would reduce the surplus in the Treasury and the revenues to the ordinary needs of the Government, without also a large reduction of the internal revenues.

To attempt to reduce the tariff taxes to the extent of seventy-five millions a year, which is necessary, if no reduction of internal revenue is made, would destroy American industries and impoverish American labor. Only theoretical free-traders, Bourbon Democrats, or those as deficient in information upon these economic subjects as the President seems to be, would proclaim such a policy or attempt such a task.

The Secretary of the Treasury estimates the revenues of the Government for the fiscal year 1888 to be $383,000,000 and the actual expenditures at $316,000,000. Of this the receipts from customs are two hundred and twenty-eight million, from internal revenue one hundred and twenty millions, and miscellaneous thirty-five millions. How can a reduction of seventy-five millions be made in the two hundred and twenty-eight millions of import duties without so reducing protective duties as to flood the country with the products of cheap foreign labor, close many manufacturing and kindred industries, and throw millions of laboring men out of employment. We have listened to and we have heard many free-trade revenue reform speeches to learn how it was proposed to accomplish this object so urgently recommended by the President and his followers in Congress, but it has not been pointed out in any practicable way.

FREE RAW MATERIAL.

Mr. Chairman, what is raw material? If there is a phrase in the English language that has been and now is abstractly and deceitfully used, it is "free raw material." Congress and the people have been treated to an exceedingly large supply of very free and very raw material on this tariff question of late. It has certainly been free enough and raw enough to suit the most ultra free-trader. For the past three weeks it has come forth in this Hall "like the outbursting of a fountain from the earth, with original, spontaneous, and native force." It has issued forth as free and as raw as the whisky that oozes through the worm of the illicit distillery in the most reliable Democratic free-trade districts.

The President insists upon free raw material. He says:

> The radical reduction of the duties upon raw material used in manufacture or its importation is, of course, an important factor in any effort to reduce the price of these articles. It would not only relieve them from the increased cost caused by the tariff on such material, but the manufactured product being itself cheapened, that part of the tariff now laid upon such products as a compensation to our manufacturers for the present price of raw material could be accordingly modified. Such reduction or free importation would serve largely to reduce the revenue. It is not apparent how such a change can have any injurious effect upon our manufacturers.

The President here shows his want of comprehension of the whole tariff system. In one paragraph he persuades the farmers that the tariff which protects the manufacturer is a great wrong to them. In another paragraph he attempts to show the manufacturer that he will be benefited by putting what he calls "raw material" upon the free-list. The President forgets or ignores the fact that putting "raw material" on the free-list would ruin many of the great agricultural, mining, and other industries of this country.

The President and his party claim that their special object is to reduce the revenue without injuring any of the great industries of the country. If all the dutiable articles now imported, generally referred to as raw material, were put upon the free-list it would reduce the revenue only about twelve millions. The following table shows the amount of duties collected on the different dutiable raw materials imported during the year 1886:

Coal-tar dyes	$522,686	Hops	$217,917
Potash	104,716	Iron ore	525,193
Soda	1,448,263	Marble	229,672
Coal	581,000	Salt	706,324
Copper ore	108,096	Lumber	867,849
Hemp	194,136	Zinc	88,900
Manila	626,895	Wool	5,126,108
Jute	293,788
Sisal-grass	493,751	Total	12,419,699
Hay	184,351

Place all of these articles upon the free-list and it would almost destroy the wool, flax, hemp, and jute industries of the farmer, greatly depress the trade and production of lumber, and depreciate the value of the iron and copper mining and coal industries. Still it is claimed that the paramount object is to reduce the revenue. Then, why does not the Mills bill put sugar on the free-list and pay a bounty to the producers? The revenue collected on sugar and molasses amounts to about sixty millions per annum. It is a necessary article of food to 60,000,000 people. Here 60,000,000 people are taxed about $1 per head to protect a very small industry. I would build up the sugar industry in this country. I would pay such bounties to the producers of sugar from cane, from sorghum, and from the sugar-beet as would make it profitable and an object to build up this industry for the future benefit of this country. But I would not tax a necessary article of food $68,000,000 per annum for this purpose. I would at least reduce the tariff on sugar until the revenue collected should be only sufficient to pay bounties to insure its production and build up the industry. If there were no other purely revenue and direct taxes that could be repealed sufficient to reduce the revenue to the required amount for the economical administration of the Government I would put sugar on the free-list and pay the bounty direct from the Treasury. Putting sugar on the free-list or so reducing the tariff as to derive only a sufficient revenue to pay bounties on the American production will reduce the surplus revenue $40,000,000 more than putting all raw materials on the free-list.

The more we examine this bill the more we are forced to the conclusion that its object is to bring about free trade more than a reduction of the revenue. The more it is scrutinized in detail the more it will be found that the duties on the articles which produce mostly a revenue tariff are not so diminished as to reduce the revenue in a material degree. It is simply an attack upon the protective system and goes as far in the direction of free trade as its authors dare go with any hope of passing the measure.

The free-trader says, "England and other European countries admit raw materials free." So they do, because they have not got and can not produce the quantities of raw material they must have. These free-traders will not understand the breadth and the illimitable extent and variety of the resources of our country. To buy raw material abroad when it is found to an unlimited extent at home because England and other European countries are compelled to buy it for want of a sufficient quantity accords with other free-trade fallacies. Our country produces nearly every kind of raw material, and the few classes which can not be produced here are now on the free-list. They seem to forget that our country produces every article that flourishes between the torrid and frigid zone, from the orange of Florida and California to the lakes of ice in Maine and Minnesota; that the traveler in our country may now in the course of a few days, by the agency of steam, gather samples of every variety of cereals, fruits, and mineral productions which he could formerly find in a voyage around the world. It would be folly to try and enforce a material and industrial policy upon this country because it has been followed by the government of an island that might be laid down within one of our States or Territories. It is only the Bourbonism of the free-trader or the Anglomania of the college professor and Mugwump that could seriously contemplate such a policy.

FREE TRADE HAS INJURED ENGLAND.

Mr. Chairman, it might be supposed from the continued statements of the free-traders, by courtesy called revenue reformers, that the manufacturing and agricultural classes of England had been benefited and had prospered under free trade. Our large importing merchants, who make great fortunes by bringing into this country the products of cheap foreign labor and selling it in competition with the products of our better-paid labor, refer us to England as illustrating the benefits of free trade. That class of capitalists who represent English capital and seek investments in the character of business enterprises which are aided and made monopolies by the grants of special privileges and franchises from both our State and National Governments, and who receive unduly large profits and dividends which are sent across the ocean to enrich English capitalists, all cite you to England to show the benign influence of free trade.

All those college professors and theoretical free-traders who obtain their ideas and thoughts from English free-trade writers, who know nothing of the practical workings and results of free trade in England or of protection in this country, cry out for free trade, and refer to England to prove their theories. Every Bourbon Democratic politician who has slept a Rip Van Winkle sleep for the last quarter of a century, and has learned nothing from the actual workings and results of the protective policy in this country, or of free trade elsewhere, flippantly asserts that free trade has worked beneficially in England.

Mr. Chairman, the fact is that free trade in England has proved very injurious, and has blighted the former prosperity of her industrial and laboring classes.

There are many reasons why a protective tariff should exist in this country above all others. The institutions of our country, the political status and equality of all men, whether laborers or millionaires, the diversified and illimitable character of our natural resources, the variety of climate and products, and the necessity that our working classes should receive much higher wages than those of other countries make a protective policy indispensable. Still it can be shown that a universal free-trade policy has injured England and Ireland, and given to their continental neighbors important advantages over them.

DEPRESSION OF TRADE IN ENGLAND.

Mr. Chairman, in 1885 a royal commission was appointed to inquire into the depression of trade and industry in England. It was composed of thirteen prominent business men, economists, and statesmen. It made an exhaustive inquiry into the causes of the depression, and examined as witnesses leading economists and business men. It extended its inquiries through its foreign service to all countries. It made from time to time, during the year 1886, reports of the testimony of witnesses and of the answers of laboring and commercial organizations to its questions. The last report was made in December, 1886. The whole work consists of five parts and of over 2,000 large pages. It covers the entire field of British trade and industry and their relations to other countries. The conclusions of these very able commissioners set forth in their final report on the causes of the depression and continued decline of British trade and industry should be studied by every free-trader.

I obtained this report in parts, as it was issued from time to time in 1886. I examined it with care. I wanted to find out why it was that the country to which we are always referred by college professors, Bourbon Democrats, Mugwumps, and other free-traders as the model of industrious and commercial prosperity admitted such a continued depression and languishing of its trade and manufactures as to require a special commission to expend much time and money in investigating the causes. The commissioners assign among others two special causes of the depression: the protective tariff which they say has built up the manufacturing industries of the United States, and to a large extent excluded foreign importations; and the protective tariffs of Germany and other European countries, which have not only excluded British goods, but have also resulted in large importations of manufactured goods into England from Germany, Austria, and other countries. They conclude that not only has England's foreign market been partially taken away from her by protective tariffs, but that her home market is being seriously injured by the foreign competition of nations whose industries have been built up by protective tariffs.

The commission says in its final report:

> We are disposed to think that one of the chief agencies which have tended to perpetuate this state of things is the protectionist policy of so many foreign countries which has become more marked during the last ten years than in any previous period of any similar length. The high prices which protection secures the producer within the protected area naturally stimulates the production and impels him to engage in competition in foreign markets.

The commission also speaks of foreign competition in their home market as one of the causes of depression, and says:

An effect of a similar kind, though less in degree, has been produced by the increased competition in our own market of foreign manufactured and partly manufactured goods, the importation of which appears to grow at a more rapid rate than population.

In dealing with the results of the depression the commission says:

We have observed above that the complaint proceeds chiefly from the classes who are more immediately and directly concerned in production, and there can be no doubt that of the wealth annually created in the country a smaller proportion falls to the share of the employers of labor than formerly. The diminution in the rate of profit obtainable from production, from agriculture and manufacturing, has given rise to a widespread feeling of depression among the producing classes. It is from these classes, and especially from the employers of labor, that the complaint chiefly proceeds.

Those, on the other hand, who are in receipt of fixed salaries, who draw their incomes from fixed investments, have comparatively little to complain of. Those classes of population who derive their income from foreign investments or from property not directly connected with foreign industries, appear to have little ground of complaint. On the contrary, they have profited by the remarkably low prices of many commodities.

Mr. Chairman, it is the capitalists, the monopolists, the importing merchants, and those who derive large fixed incomes from bonds and other investments who are and who have always been clamoring for free trade in this country. It is from the employers of labor, from the workingmen who produce the products and build up the industries of the country that the demand comes for a protective tariff. We can not quote further from this very able report or cite the testimony which supports its conclusions. When leading English statesmen and economists and manufacturers describe as two of the prominent causes of the admitted depression and declining state of England's trade and industries to be foreign tariffs and bounties and foreign competition with continental nations as the result of those tariffs, why do Democrats ignore these facts and ask for free trade?

We have also learned from this report that it is not alone English competition that demands a protective tariff in this country. If England, with her advantages as a manufacturing nation, and considering the condition of her laboring people as compared with that of the American workingman, is being injured by competition with the products of European and Asiatic labor through her free-trade policy, how can America open her markets to the manufactures and labor of Germany, France, and other European nations? If England suffers from free importations of the continental nations, what will become of America when subjected to the same foreign competition?

Sir Edward Sullivan, a member of the British Parliament, has written a very able and practical work upon the destructive effects which foreign competition by free trade has brought upon English industries. The English laboring classes occupy somewhat an intermediate position between the American and those of the continental nations of Europe. The result has been that large importations into England of the products of cheaper labor have greatly depressed English manufactures. Mr. Sullivan states this result as follows:

The labor problem in this country (i. e., in England) is easily stated; but its solution is another matter. A, B, C, D, E, and F are industrial communities, all having the same or nearly the same advantages of material, machinery, etc., but in B, C, D, E, and F wages are from 20 to 50 to 70 per cent. lower than in A; and moreover, the workmen in B, C, D, E, and F work much longer hours and are more thrifty than the workmen in A, and consequently most manufactured articles are produced cheaper in B, C, D, E, and F than in A.

If therefore B, C, D, E, and F are allowed to send into A's markets, duty free, anything they can produce cheaper than A can, it is evident they must undersell A, and the employment of A's workmen will be destroyed. There can be no mistake about this; it must be so and it is so. It is just what is happening. In France, Germany, Austria, Belgium, Holland, Russia, Egypt, and India the workers work for from 20 to 70 per cent. less wages and about 20 per cent. longer hours. * * * The result is that, all other conditions being equal, they can produce almost everything cheaper than we can. And this they are doing; and our free-traders, in illustration of the warning that a certain person "always finds work for idle hands to do," are working night and day to devise further means to enable them to deliver their cheap goods in our markets at the lowest possible cost, and their efforts are completely successful. Every year the delivery of foreign goods enormously increases, and every year the employment of our workers enormously diminishes; and this is very simple.

It would happen to France, Germany, etc., if they were fools enough to follow our example. * * * The less fitted our working people are by habit, by education, and example to hold the lists of cheap labor against the world, the more important becomes our duty to protect them. It is not indeed a question whether we wish to do so or not. We must do so. Our workers must have work. It is childish nonsense talking about theory and appealing to figures and returns in a case of this sort, when the wolf is at the door. There is the fact that is patent to all the world that there are half a dozen industrial communities who can all produce their goods cheaper than we can, and owing to bonuses and preferential railroad rates, advocated by our free-traders, can actually deliver them in our markets at less cost than we can produce them. Now, what are we to do? Are we to listen to the dictates of common sense, of self-preservation, of national duty, of natural affection, and protect the industries of our work-people and prevent them being pauperized and forced to leave the country, or are we to listen to the blatant folly of the free-trade popes and let the industrial interests of our workers slide? No one can come near your free-trader for selfishness and want of sympathy.

Mr. Chairman, this is the clear and consummate statement of an Englishman upon the blighting effects of free trade on the industrial interests of England in her relation to her continental neighbors. The same statement applies with greater force as to what would be the results upon this country of free trade with England, and in a greater degree of free trade between this country and the continental nations of Europe.

Mr. Sullivan says that in England there are 34,000,000 people—30,000,000 who are dependent on work, and 4,000,000 who are dependent on capital; that no doubt—protection to labor, that is, protection to the 30,000,000 who live by labor, will make things dearer to the 4,000,000 who live by capital. * * * But which most concerns the prosperity, even the existence, of the whole community of 34,000,000; that the 30,000,000 should be employed and able to live and thrive, or that the 4,000,000 should live in greater luxury and that the 30,000,000 should starve or leave the country? It is only free-trade enthusiasts who could entertain the question; but they do. * * * A duty of 10 per cent. on the production of foreign workers would give work to 30,000,000 of workers. "Perhaps," say the free-traders, "but then our poor capitalists would have to pay 20 per cent. more for their luxuries."

Mr. Chairman, some of our free-trade statesmen had better study the actual result of free trade in England before they try to impose its curses upon this country. The free-trade theorists say that we must have free trade to supply a foreign market. Do not these American free-traders know that the production of the world exceeds the consumption of the world; that the old countries of the world are overcrowded with the products of cheap labor; that if it were not for the protective tariff our country would be flooded with these products; that many classes of our manufacturing industries would cease, and our laboring people be thrown out of employment; that there would be no room for the hundreds of thousands of foreign immigrants to find work, and that our country would be filled with tramps to a greater extent than it was after the panic of 1873?

The protectionists in America, France, Belgium, Germany, and Austria, state as a premise that the production of the world exceeds the consumption of the world and therefore they must take steps to prevent their markets from being swamped by the surplus productions of the world. In other words, they must protect their industries against the foreign competition of the world. It is the first duty of a nation to protect its own laboring people and its own industries from the competition of the outside world. A nation that will not do it must suffer the consequences.

Mr. Sullivan again says:

In every industrial country in the world except England it is recognized that the first duty of a government is to promote the employment of the people; in other words, to protect their industries. In every other industrial country but England the industries of the people are protected. Is it so certain that all the whole world is wrong and England only right? In every country except England it is allowed that the interests of those who both produce and consume are greater than the interests of those who consume. In every industrial community out of England it is allowed that employment is of more importance than mere cheapness. In England alone it is maintained that cheapness is of more importance than employment.

Mr. Chairman, I commend this statement of this very able and learned English economist to the Democratic free-traders in this country. Will they learn nothing from the experience of other nations? Will they not recognize the fact here stated that free trade does not exist in any country except England and Ireland? Do they not know that the protective policy has been adopted by the statesmen of Germany and other nations of Europe as absolutely necessary to their industrial and material prosperity? Will they not recognize the fact that Germany, Austria, Russia, Belgium, and France have been watching and protecting the industrial and manufacturing interests of their countries, especially during the last few years, wherever they were likely to be injured by competition with others? Do they not know that so soon as the manufacturing and industrial skill and enterprise of America produce any particular character of goods so as to be able to compete in a limited degree with the markets of Germany, of France, and of Autstria, that when it is made known in those countries, such protective import duties and regulations are immediately adopted as to prevent the American foreign competition? This is the foreign policy which has been and is being adopted, and it should satisfy the free-traders that relying upon a foreign market exists only in theory and can not exist as a fact.

PROTECTION HAS LOWERED THE PRICE OF MANUFACTURED GOODS TO THE CONSUMER.

The free-traders are continually stating that import duties are a tax upon the consumer alone, and that all manufactured articles or raw materials which are protected result in advancing the price to the extent of the tax collected. The President, exhibiting his sublime want of knowledge upon this subject, states in his message that—

These laws (tariff laws) as their primary and plain effect raise the price to the consumer of all articles imported and subject to duty precisely the sum paid for such duties. Thus the amount of duty measures the tax paid by those who purchase for use these imported articles.

The gentlemen upon the other side of the House have stated and even assumed this to be true in the face of all the facts to the contrary. After the above statement by the President, we can not help but admire what he says shortly afterwards in the same message to the effect that—

This reference to the operation of our tariff laws is not made by way of instruction, but in order that we may be reminded of the manner in which they impose a burden upon those who consume imported articles and create a tax upon all our people.

It is fortunate that one who shows such an entire want of knowledge upon the subject does not make his assertions "by way of instruction" to anybody, because instruction from such sources could not fail to mislead all who relied upon it.

Many illustrations to show the error of this position can be made. I will refer to only a few.

Russian sheet-iron sold at 18 cents per pound in this country for many years before its manufacture in this country; under a protective duty of 2½ cents per pound manufactures for American sheet-iron were established and put into competition with the Russian. Russian sheet-iron has fallen to 9½ cents per pound and American sheet-iron is sold for still less. The skilled workmen employed in this industry are paid very high wages. The Russian workmen are paid very low wages. Thus, the American consumer saves 8½ cents per pound on every pound of sheet-iron he buys. But, according to the statement of the President and his followers, the 2½ cents per pound should be added to the price before the tariff and sheet-iron would sell for 20½ cents per pound. If the tariff tax were taken off and the American sheet-iron factories closed the product of the low wages of Russia would again flood the country and prices would advance, because there would be no local competition.

The lead-mining industry furnishes another strong illustration that the protection which builds up and prospers important industries, at the same time creates a competition with the foreign articles, which reduces the price to the consumer. The following table, from The Mineral Resources of the United States for 1886, shows the production of lead in the United States from 1825 to 1886:

1886	135,629	114,829	20,800	85.0

It will be seen from this table that the production was unimportant for many years. It was only 1,500 tons in 1825. It only reached 25,800 tons in 1872, and it increased to 97,800 tons in 1880, and to 135,600 tons in 1886. This wonderful increase in the production of lead caused by the great development of the mining and smelting industries in the Rocky Mountain States and Territories resulted in a great reduction in price to the consumers. Although the consumption has increased 300 per cent. in the past fifteen years, and although a very large proportion of the price paid by the consumers is absorbed by the railroad and transportation companies, the price has been reduced to the consumer about 30 per cent.

From this it will be seen that in 1870, when this country produced only 17,830 tons of lead, the price was $6.25 per hundred in New York, and in 1884, when the production was 139,897 tons, the average price in New York was from $3.65 to $3.57 per hundred. The consumption of lead has almost kept pace with the great increase in production. With the exception of 1878 and 1879, when considerable quantities of lead were sent to China, the export of lead has been small as compared with the home consumption.

The tariff on lead since the act of March 3, 1883, has been $2 per hundred on lead in pigs, bars, and blocks.

By the Mills tariff bill this is reduced to one and one-quarter cents per pound or $1.25 per hundred. The margin of profit on lead ore and smelting, and particularly on lead and silver ore which produces desilverized lead, is very small. This reduction of three-quarters of a cent per pound, $15 per ton, would enable the Spaniards with their cheap labor and cheap mining and smelting of lead to glut the American market and greatly cripple, if not practically destroy, the great lead industry of the United States.

The value of the lead production of the United States has increased from about $3,000,000 in 1872 to about twelve millions in 1887. This industry has been built up in a part of the United States that before was almost a desert. It has quickened and vitalized the agricultural, commercial, transportation, and other kindred industry of a permanent nature in the Western and Rocky Mountain country. Vast regions of the public domain would have remained undeveloped on account of inaccessibility and distance from seashore markets but for the building up of this great industry. It has added to the wealth of the nation. It is estimated that it has added to the wealth of the nation a sum almost equal to the principal which has been paid on the national debt. The lead industry supplies a better market for the products of the manufacturer, the farmer, and every industry west of the Missouri than any other interest. It has supplied to railroads and transportation companies an amount of freight traffic without which they could not have paid interest on their bonds. Forty dollars per ton is deducted in Salt Lake City from the New York price of lead, which the railroads and the Eastern refineries absorb. The following table shows the amount of transportation and freight created by the ore-producing lead and smelting industries in the Western and Rocky Mountain region:

A glance at this table shows that a great depression in or a partial destruction of the lead-mining industry of the Rocky Mountains would, in a great measure, destroy the prosperity of that region.

It has caused the construction of thousands of miles of railroad across the desert, through the cañons, and over the mountains. As the volume of the production has increased it is shown that the price has fallen. The average wages to miners and laborers in the lead mines of Utah, Colorado, and other portions of the Rocky Mountain country is $3 per day, while the lead-miners of Spain, with which the reduction of the tariff would bring them in direct competition, is about 50 cents per day.

It is not a raw material in any correct sense of the word. The ore from which the lead is smelted lies in the mountains as valueless as the ordinary stone until millions of dollars are invested in the sinking of shafts, the erection of mining machinery, pumps, and the costly plants of the great smelting works. The plants and machinery at the large lead and silver producing mines in Colorado, Utah, and other places cost more money than many of the greatest manufacturing establishments in the East. The great smelters of Denver and Pueblo in Colorado, of Salt Lake and other cities of the Rocky Mountains are among the most expensive establishments in the world. The United States consumed, in 1887, 164,000 tons of lead, which, at $70 per ton, amounts to over $11,000,000. If the proposed reduction of the tariff on lead is made a large portion of this sum would have to be sent abroad in gold, for the lead would be imported from countries with which we have little trade.

PLATE-GLASS.

In 1864 a duty was imposed on plate-glass of from 3 to 60 cents per square foot. It was a duty for revenue only because no polished plate-glass was produced in this country prior to 1870. The cost to consumers before this was from $2 to $2.50 per square foot for such polished plate as was generally used in this country. Between 1868 and 1875 extensive manufactories were established at New Albany, Louisville, Butler, Pa, and Crystal City, near St. Louis, and others, on account of this tariff. The home competition by the building up of this industry has reduced the price to consumers about $1 per square foot, or about one-half Still, the President asserts in substance that the duty on plate-glass must make it cost to the consumer over 50 per cent. more. Before the industry was created in this country the plate-glass trade was controlled by a few importers in New York, who, in combination with the foreign manufacturers, maintained a monopoly upon it. Mr. Sullivan, in his work on English free trade hereinbefore referred to, shows how the free importation of plate-glass from the Continent has destroyed that industry in England; and he points out how it is one of the most beneficial industries to any community or country.

IMPORTING CHEAP GOODS IS POVERTY TO THE IMPORTERS.

The theory that a country or people may prosper or profit by buying the products from foreign countries because they can be produced cheaper abroad is an absurd free-trade fallacy. The revenue reformer says: Why, if these foreigners can sell us their manufactured goods cheaper than we can produce them, we can profit by buying them and importing them. This doctrine ignores the fact that the more diversified the industries of a community or country are the more it will prosper and the richer it will grow. It ignores the fact that money sent out of a country to pay for imported goods, with a few exceptions, makes that country so much the poorer.

Suppose a community has been manufacturing and selling in the home market $1,000,000 worth of goods at a fair profit, because there was a protective tariff of 20 per cent. on the article. This tariff is repealed and the same million dollars' worth of goods is imported and sold for $800,000. The free-trader says that the community has saved $200,000 by purchasing these goods. Let us see. In the first case one hundred men were employed in the factories. This directly increased the population of the village over 300. Many small farmers in the vicinity prospered by furnishing these operatives with "garden stuff" and farm products. The erection of the factories in the first place doubled the value of their farms and additional shops of all kinds have been opened. The tailor, the shoemaker, and the bonnet-maker, and any number of trades prospered directly and indirectly by the manufacture and sale of this $1,000,000 worth of goods.

The owners of the factories, perhaps, live in the neighborhood, and their 10 per cent. profit of $100,000 a year is expended there; twenty-five thousand in living expenses and seventy-five thousand by investing in real estate, in building improvements or extending their factories, and in employing more labor. The owners and operatives pay a share of the taxes to support the village school, the county, State, and municipal government. Suddenly the free-traders repeal the 20 per cent. tariff. The operatives can not accept low enough wages to compete with foreign goods. The factories are closed, and one hundred men are thrown out of employment. The farmer has no market for his "truck." The tailor, the shoemaker, and the bonnet-maker shops are closed. The owners of the factories take what capital they can save from the wreck and go elsewhere seeking investment. The little farms depreciate 50 per cent. in value; town lots, houses, and shops are almost worthless. The community becomes suddenly bankrupt, its people scattered, and some of them tramps looking for an existence.

They complain that the repeal of the 20 per cent. tariff has ruined their industries and them. The free-trader says, "No; you do not understand the true principle of political economy or you would see that buying the million dollars' worth of articles that were manufactured in the foreign country actually saves to the people $200,000, because the million dollars' worth of goods now actually costs only $800,000 to the consumers." "But," says the intelligent American operative, "that $800,000 has gone to the laborers of a foreign land. We are deprived of the means of subsistence and the country is $800,000 poorer. You may say that we can buy these and other kinds of goods a little cheaper but we have nothing to buy with. We are seeking work at reduced wages and can find none." The free-trader says again, "You must seek employment in another trade or business where foreign competition and the low wages of other countries can not compete with and destroy your industries."

If the Democratic free-trader can succeed in reducing the tariff as they propose, it will overthrow and destroy the manufactures, the industries of our country, pauperize the laboring classes, and impoverish the whole country in the same manner as when applied, by illustration, to this little community.

FREE TRADE IS SIMPLY FOREIGN COMPETITION.

As Mr. Sullivan says in applying the subject to England:

Freed from the cloud of words, the platitudes, theories, and sophisms by which it will be assailed, the question before the country is simply this: Can a manufacturing country like England, whose products are excluded from the markets of Europe and America, continue to admit, duty free, the manufactured products of those countries without interfering with the general employment of our people? * * * The bankers, the merchants, the brokers, the agents, the shippers, and those who deal with money and with exchanges in the sale and transportation of foreign goods will say "yes;" and so will those with realized and fixed incomes, the drones of the community, the consumers of silks, of satins, and light wines and a thousand and one articles of luxury that we get from abroad. But if you ask the great body of producers, the capitalists, who have invested their money in manufacturing and similar enterprises, the great employers of labor, the operatives, the toilers and moilers, the working bees of our teeming hives of industry, they will say "no."

This statement is specially applicable to the condition of America. Can we, after having under the protective policy built up manufacturing industries and when our products as fast as they come into competition with the products of other nations in foreign markets are excluded therefrom by the protective tariffs of those countries, admit, duty free, the products of those countries without interfering with the general employment of our people? The prosperity of a community must depend upon the general employment of its people and the rate of wages paid. As said, general employment and good wages mean contentment, sobriety, self-respect, and the general progress and improvement of the working classes. The want of them mean the reverse of all this. General employment at good wages is what creates industrial prosperity and adds to the wealth of a country. It is far more important to a community than cheap goods of any kind.

The destruction of a few great manufactures by repealing the tariff on their products causes many other industries to languish. The prosperity of a few great industries causes many others to prosper. The industries of a country are so closely connected and interwoven that you can not injure a few of them without injuring a great many of them. Any system or policy that will injure the manufacturing interests will injure the agricultural interests, the mining interests, and the great trade of internal commerce. These great industries must stand or fall together. By free trade and foreign competition they will fall.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] made the statement that the question narrowed itself to a contest between the drunkard's appetite and the poor man's back, attempting to convey the idea that the poor man had to pay a higher price for a suit of clothes than before the tariffs of 1861-'62, but that the tax on distilled spirits was not a tax on the poor man. He ignores the fact that of the sixty millions of tax paid on distilled spirits every year, it is estimated that about thirty millions is for alcohol and other spirits used in the industries, fifteen millions of which is consumed in chemical manufactures. Here is a tax on raw material used in domestic industries larger than the total duty paid on all foreign raw material. There is no doubt that the consumer pays this. England takes the tax off of spirits when used in the industries. Germany refunds it all, and France a part, when it is used under the same conditions. Industrial alcohol is used free in Italy and Austria.

But the American free-trader requires these useful industries to pay over $95 for a barrel of spirits, more than four times its intrinsic value, which would be less than $20 if the tax was removed from this raw material. The poor man pays this when he buys anything at the family drug-store. The principle of taxing liquor which is used as a beverage is not opposed; but no one but a blind free-trader bent upon ruining the manufacturing industries would insist on continuing the tax on alcohol and other spirits used in the arts and industries. The poor man pays less per yard for a good class of American cassimeres to-day than he did for a poor quality of English cassimeres before the tariff. A stated and balanced account will show that the wages of a laboring man would buy him and his family 50 per cent. more of the necessaries and luxuries of life in the American market than they would in 1859–'60. The same account stated and balanced correctly shows that an equivalent amount of farm produce will purchase for the farmer and his family 50 per cent. more of the necessaries and comforts of life than it would in 1859–'60. Such statements as those made by the gentleman from Tennessee are only calculated to deceive.

THE PROTECTIVE TARIFF BENEFITS THE FARMER.

Mr. Chairman, it is continually stated that the farmer gets none of the benefits and bears an undue proportion of the burdens of protection. The President, in his annual onslaught on the tariff, by courtesy called his annual message, attempts to sympathize with the farmer. He says:

> The farmer and agriculturist, who manufactures nothing, but who pays the increased price which the tariff imposes upon every agricultural implement, upon all he wears, on all he uses and owns, except upon the increase of his flocks and herds and such things as his husbandry produces from the soil, is invited to aid in maintaining the present situation.

The free trade that first existed, which it was supposed would benefit the farmers, was the repeal of the tariff on wheat, corn, and provisions by England, known as the corn law. Every free-trader and Cobden Club man in England said that this would greatly benefit the laboring man, thereby giving him a cheap loaf, and every one of their blind followers in this country said that it would prove of immense benefit to the American farmer by enhancing the price and furnishing a foreign market for his grain and provisions. It did open the markets of England and Ireland free to the products of the American farmer. What has been the result? During the last ten years there has been a continual decrease in the amount of wheat exported and the export price has continually depreciated. The following table from the report of the Bureau of Statistics shows the number of bushels of wheat exported from the United States and the export price for the seven fiscal years from June, 1879, to June, 1886, inclusive:

Years.	Bushels.	Value.	Average price per bushel.
1879–'80	153,252,795	$190,546,305	$1.244
1880–'81	150,565,477	167,698,485	1.114
1881–'82	95,271,802	112,929,718	1.185
1882–'83	106,385,828	119,879,341	1.127
1883–'84	70,349,012	75,026,678	1.066
1884–'85	84,653,714	72,933,097	0.862
1885–'86	57,759,209	50,262,715	0.870

Our decrease in exports during this period, according to the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, is as follows:

Years.	Bushels.	Value.
1879–'80	159,565,477	$167,698,485
1886	57,759,209	50,262,715
Decrease	92,806,368	117,435,770

So that the free-trade policy of England which was to create an unlimited market for the wheat of the American farmer and advance its price has proved untrue. In seven years our exports of wheat from this country decreased over 92,000,000 bushels and the value of the exports fell off over $117,000,000. In other words, the farmers of the United States received $117,000,000 less for the wheat exported in 1886 than for the export of 1879. This was a loss of over 61 per cent. in the amount of wheat exported, and of over 70 per cent. in the value of the exports. The export value of a bushel of wheat in 1881 was over $1.24 and in 1886 it was only 87 cents.

During this time there has been no export duty in this country or import duty in England on wheat. Absolute free trade has existed between these two countries so far as grain is concerned, and the resultant facts are apparent to every one.

This ought to show the American farmer that British free trade and Cobden Club laws have not and will not furnish him a foreign market or a high price for his products. What is the special cause of this falling off in the amount of exports and the depreciation in the export price of wheat? It is that England, by her policy towards her colonies, has imported her wheat from India instead of from America. England has expended almost hundreds of millions of money in building up the agricultural industries of her possessions in India. She has built thousands of miles of railroad and aided in the construction of hundreds of miles of irrigating canals, which has resulted in a very large increase in the production of wheat in India. The Indian ryots, as the small wheat farmers of India are called, who work for about 10 cents per day, are brought into competition with the labor of the American farmer to such an extent that they can produce wheat cheaper than the American farmer, notwithstanding the great advancement in agriculture and agricultural machinery in this country.

The following table, from the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics for 1886, shows the amount of exports of wheat from India and the export price from 1879–'80 to 1885–'86, the same period covered by the table above showing the exports of American wheat:

Year.	Bushels.	Value.	Average price per bushel.
1879–'80	4,109,495	$5,396,491	$1.313
1880–'81	13,896,168	15,952,105	1.148
1881–'82	37,078,571	41.871,765	1.129
1882–'83	26,402,893	29,534,467	1.122
1883–'84	39,118,791	43,202,651	1.105
1884–'85	29,550,741	30,703,430	1.040
1885–'86	39,312,969	38,943,436	.991

From this it will be seen that while the exports of American wheat for seven years have fallen off from 153,000,000 bushels in 1879 to 57,000,000 in 1886, the exports of wheat from India have increased from 4,000,000 bushels in 1879 to over 39,000,000 bushels in 1886. The American exports of wheat have declined over 69 per cent. The India exports of wheat have increased over 900 per cent.

The American farmer can not rely in the future upon a market for his wheat in England. The continued decline of exports from this country and the continual increase of exports from India will drive the wheat of the American farmer entirely from the British islands during the next decade.

Mr. Sullivan, in the work referred to, has pointed out the great decline in English agricultural interests since the imports of wheat from India began under her free-trade policy. He has incontrovertibly shown that the agricultural interests of England are being destroyed by this policy, but the moneyed classes and the capitalists of the British Empire of England and of India are being benefited. The English free-trade policy is governed by the money princes and capitalists of the world. Their policy is to build up a foreign commerce and a foreign import trade, because from it they accumulate their millions. In conceiving and originating legislation they adopt and enforce a policy which they think will advance the interests and increase the accumulations of these classes. I believe that if the policy of England, which has been somewhat destructive of the agricultural interests of Ireland and of England, had not been compensated for, in the eyes of English statesmen and capitalists, by the trade and commerce created by the imports of wheat and other products from India, the tariff on American wheat would have been readopted in England years ago.

If the American farmer can not depend upon England as a foreign market for his wheat or produce when his home market is destroyed by the decline or overthrow of the manufacturing interests and the increase of agricultural products, where can he look? In what part of the world must he seek a market?

Mr. Chairman, comparatively a small amount of wheat has been imported into Germany and other continental nations. At different periods, when there was a foreign war, or a drought around the Baltic or upon the plains of Russia, there would be a demand for some American wheat, and America would supply the deficiency. During the last few years, since the export has so greatly diminished, some wheat has been exported to South Germany. What is the result? A short time since, to cut off this import of wheat from America, a new tariff was established on wheat in Germany. This new tariff is $1.19 on 220 pounds, or about 30 per cent. ad valorem. The New York Nation, in commenting upon this action of Germany, says:

> The object of it is to exclude American wheat from South Germany and to compel Bavaria, Baden, and the Rhine country to buy Prussian wheat exclusively. But it is much cheaper to supply the South German people with American wheat from London. Moreover, the South Germans are accustomed to American wheat; they even like it better than Prussian wheat. On the other hand, Prussian wheat is very conveniently situated for the English market, and very inconveniently for the South German market. Accordingly, a bill has been introduced in the Reichstag to enable North German merchants to export wheat to England and to import an equivalent amount of American wheat to South Germany free of duty. In order to make the swap easy and frictionless, it is proposed that the exporter of North German wheat shall have the right to sell his permits of importation just as he would sell a bill of exchange. The drollery of all this circumlocution, by which the consumer is sacrificed to the producer, has not penetrated the German mind to any great extent, but there is much suffering in South Germany in consequence of the deprivation of American supplies of food. Why do not some of our high-tariff men, who are such fast friends of the American farmer, propose a measure of retaliation?

What a prosperous time the American farmer will have when by such devices he is entirely shut out of foreign markets, and our Secretary of State, a member of the Cobden Club, is trying to enforce retaliatory measures in his behalf.

The Nation is a very high-toned free-trade organ, but it has here stated a few facts showing the extreme measures the German Government has resorted to to exclude American farmers from German markets. Germany has lately adopted custom-house regulations and tariffs, as I am informed by men who have been exporting meats and the products of animals, which practically prohibit the importation of American food-products into the German Empire. Still the President and his free-trade followers point out how the farmer is injured by American protection and how a free-trade policy in this country would be to his benefit.

We now import annually over $60,000,000 worth of food supplies, and this bill proposes to add more of these agricultural products to the free-list. If the object is, as avowed, to protect the American farmer, why does not this bill provide for protecting the farmers' products against foreign competition? It is building up a home market by manufacturing and diversified interests that will advance the farmers' produce and add to the value of his real estate. In 1771 Dr. Franklin wrote from England, where he had been watching with his masterly mind the growth of her industries, and said:

Every manufactory encouraged in our country makes part of a market for provisions within ourselves and saves so much money to the country as must otherwise be exported to pay for the manufactures he supplies. Here in England, it is well known and understood that whenever a manufactory is established which employs a number of hands it raises the value of land in the neighboring country all around. It seems, therefore, the interest of our farmers and owners of land to encourage our young manufacturers in preference to foreign ones.

The first and greatest statesmen of the Republic wrote to the same effect, that it was only by building up a home market that the American farmer could look for prosperity and wealth. Why is it not proposed by the bill to remove the tax from tobacco? Has not the farmer as much right to conduct a tobacco farm as a corn or wheat farm? Such inconsistencies in this Mills bill, the authorship of which remains in mystery, shows that its object is free trade, pure and simple. Disguise it as they may, this bill means free trade and unrestricted foreign competition.

This bill puts wool on the free-list. This is an unjust blow to one of the most important agricultural industries in this country. The President in one paragraph of his message pretends to sympathize with the farmer. In another he recommends taking the tariff off wool, because, he says, it is raw material. It is the finished product of the farm. Ask the farmer who has invested all his means in a sheep farm which is still encumbered by a mortgage if it is raw material to him. He has watched his flocks grow and increase by expending all his time and energy and that of his family in herding them in summer and feeding them in winter. During an unexpected hard winter he has run in debt to buy grain to save them from the severities of the storm.

The following extract and table show how the wool industry has been injured by the reduction of the tariff in 1883:

The wool-growers have especial reasons at this time to appeal to their brother farmers for support. At a time when their industry is depressed as it hardly ever has been before by foreign competition, permitted by a reduction of duties in 1883, by Treasury rulings since, and by systematic frauds in foreign ports, the President proposes in his annual message the repeal of all duties on wool. In the two years before the change of duty, and in the past two years, the imports for consumption were as follows:

Year.	Quantities.	Duties.	Year.	Quantities.	Duties.
		Cents.			Cents.
1881	67,416,967	7.20	1886	107,910,549	4.75
1882	63,016,769	6.11	1887	114,404,174	5.16
Average	65,216,868	6.65	Average	111,157,361	4.95

Under efficient protection the production of wool rose from 60,000,000 pounds in 1860 to 308,000,000 pounds in 1884, the year after the change of duty. It has since declined to 285,000,000 pounds in 1886, and according to estimates of the Agricultural Bureau to 265,000,000 pounds in 1887. Meanwhile the stocks of domestic wool unsold at the close of 1887 are greatly increased; 31,974,000 pounds are on hand, an increase of 6,620,157 pounds at Boston alone. To the mischief done by reduced duties there is added, first, the great fraudulent importation of Donskoi and other washed wool, under pretense that it is unwashed, a systematic fraud by which the United States consul at Odessa reports to the State Department that the Government has been defrauded for years out of more than $15,000,000 in duties. Each pound of foreign wool thus fraudulently imported, already scoured and shrunken, takes the place of 2 to 4 pounds of American wool in natural condition.

The importations of wool have nearly doubled, while the American wool-growers have been going to bankruptcy to aid the Australian wool-farmers. The wool-growing industry, as is well known, can not exist in the United States to any considerable extent in open, unrestricted competition with wool production in Australia, South America, and other countries. In 1883 the wool-clip of the United States was 320,000,000 pounds; in this year only about 260,000,000.

The agricultural interests must stand or fall together. The Australian and other foreign wool-growers are now brought into direct competition with the American wool-growers. The American wheat-farmer is brought into competition with the Indian ryot, who hires his labor for 10 ten cents per day. Many large wheat-farmers will be compelled in a few years to diversify their industry by keeping flocks of sheep to fertilize an impoverished soil. There are large tracts of land in the West and Rocky Mountain country fit only for raising sheep. Shall this great industry be destroyed or shall it be protected, so that America will grow all the wool required for American manufacture.

As has been so well said:

Price is one thing, ability or means with which to pay is quite different.

Diversified industry gives prosperity and means to purchase necessaries for all. Low prices and cheap goods are only a mockery to those whose business has been so depressed by foreign competition they have no means to buy at any price.

Destroy the sheep industry of this country, turn 200,000 people out of employment and the million dependent on them for support; then the foreign wool-growers will put up the price, American manufacturers will have to buy their wool abroad, woolen goods will advance, and we shall have another practical illustration of free-trade theories.

WE SHOULD HAVE A NATIONAL REVENUE POLICY.

Mr. Chairman, I am for what Henry Clay called the American system. I am as much opposed to importing any revenue or tax system from England or other European countries as I am to importing their products of cheap pauperized labor. I am for a national as opposed to an international system of political economy. This is in accord with the progress of the times as well as with the distinct and peculiar condition of the material and political institutions of our country. Since Germany has adopted her national system of protection to her own industries and products, as against the former free-trade policy, she has built up her own industries as against England, in spite of all her difficulties. International free trade is not only impracticable, but it is impossible. There can be no such a thing as universal free trade except by reciprocity treaties between the commercial nations of the world. Every country in the world except England is now pursuing to some extent the policy of a national protective system.

The royal commission on the depression of British trade find as a fact that the protective policy which has been adopted to a great extent by the continental nations of Europe during the last ten years is one of the great causes of England's industrial decay.

During the last few years, whenever it is discovered by the statesmen of Germany, France, Austria, Russia, and other nations that the imports of any particular class of products by foreign competition are destroying the profit of their own industries, they immediately proceed to legislate or pass decrees which prohibit such foreign competition. Germany has within a short time practically excluded our wheat, our meats, and other provisions from her market. Prominent witnesses who testified before the royal commission said that the policy of other countries had become such that they saw no other way for even England to protect her industries except by a protective tariff against the importation of goods from the continental nations.

I have no time here to refer to the testimony or to the conclusions of the able commissioners upon this subject; but it can not be denied that the general tendency throughout the commercial world during the past two decades is to establish a national as distinguished from an international system. It is what the able German writer, Frederick List, calls the national as distinguished from the cosmopolitical economy. He says that—

The actual workings and results of a national protective policy as distinguished from the international free-trade policy are being adopted the world over.

Notwithstanding the dogmatic and theoretical assumptions, the free-trade system is necessarily built upon the basis of international reciprocity.

How can there be such a thing as free trade when nine-tenths of the nations of the world are adopting and enforcing a national protective policy? J. B. Say demands as a premise for the comprehension of his free-trade theories a universal republic and peace the world over. The political economy of Smith, Say, and others means cosmopolitical or world-wide economy. The theories of the advocates of free trade in America are built upon this international system; that is, they are built upon a myth. They ignore national boundary lines. It is not necessary to discuss whether universal free trade, by the abolition of protective tariffs and revenue laws the world over and the blotting out of all national boundary lines, so far as trade and commerce are concerned, would be beneficial to the human race. Such a thing is impossible. If a free-trade policy were adopted by us, and by the importation of cheap raw material and cheap laborers from China and Europe the price of labor greatly reduced, and goods were manufactured so cheap that we could compete in the foreign markets, the protective tariffs of other countries would prevent their exportation from this country, but could not prevent the flooding of this country with the cheap goods of foreign nations and the closing of American factories.

SOUTH AMERICAN TRADE.

Mr. Chairman, I would, as a part of this system of American political economy, reach out after a foreign market and build up a foreign trade where practicable. We ought to be able to build up a large South American trade. If the proper policy was pursued we could soon export large quantities of manufactured goods to our South American neighbors. They are our natural commercial allies. If we should pursue the policy of England and Germany towards these South American countries, we could in time take from them a large portion of the trade. They built up this trade by paying large subsidies to the lines of ships that created it. Here is the one opportunity we have where it is practicable to build up a foreign market, and the Democratic free-traders prevent it. The Republicans have many times attempted to subsidize steam-ship lines between America and South American ports to build up this trade, and such subsidies have been as many times defeated by the free-trade Democrats. They have even refused to vote liberal pay for carrying the mails to incidentally aid in building up this American commerce.

Mr. Chairman, our political institutions, the future material welfare of our country, the freedom and equality of our citizens all demand the permanent establishment of a national system of political economy entirely free and independent from the commercial and industrial as well as from the political institutions and policies of other nations. I would make the protection of American labor from foreign competition he keystone in the arch of this American industrial system; I would extend the ægis of that national protective system to all the industries and productions of our broad land; I would protect from foreign competition the cotton, rice, fruits, sugar, oranges, peanuts, and bananas of the Southern planter, as well as the corn, wheat, meats, and other provisions of the Northern farmer; I would protect the almond, the olive, the grape, and raisin culture of California, as well as the lumber and other interests on the Northern boundary; I would protect the great lead, iron, coke, and coal-mining interests of the South, of the Rocky Mountains, and of the Middle States; I would protect the great manufacturing interests everywhere, South as well as North, East as well as West; I would proclaim to the world that we propose to protect our home markets and our home labor from the competition of cheap foreign goods and pauperized labor everywhere. And, sir, I would henceforth protect our laboring men and their families from the importation and immigration of contract and pauperized laborers as well as from the importation of the products of their work. I believe the time will come when this will be imperatively necessary. As President Garfield said:

> It is our glory that the American laborer is more intelligent and better paid than his foreign competitor. Let Americans devote themselves to the welfare of America.

Mr. Huskisson, in the England Parliament, said:

> To enable capital to obtain a fair remuneration labor must be kept down.

We say, to enable labor to obtain fair remuneration wages must be kept up.

Lord Brougham said in Parliament:

> England can afford to incur some loss on the exports of English goods for the purpose of destroying foreign manufactures in their cradle.

The protective policy has prevented the destruction of our manufactures against the wish of American statesmen. The law prohibiting the importation of Chinese labor has assisted in preventing the degradation and poverty of the American workingmen. Many quotations could be made to show the irreconcilable differences between the English and the American policy. The English capitalist and statesman indorses and approves the President's message and his free-trade policy. Others during this discussion have cited from the comments of the English press and statesmen in favor of that un-American document. The intelligent American laborers of this country are protesting against it and the industrial policy it advocates. These American workmen will put their protests into practical form next November, when they will deposit their ballots "as silent as snow-flakes in the valley at midnight." But they will establish the permanent policy of national protection, and they will remove from positions of power and influence the free-traders and the authors and advocates of free-trade bills.

The American nation is devoted to industry. Its origin and history have been industrial and not warlike. Its conquests and advancement have been made through the arts, sciences, and industries. The American armies are armies of workingmen. On their banners are not written the names of cities sacked, "countries pillaged to enrich our own," but the names of inventors, civilizing influences, labor-saving machinery, and the independence, education, and elevation of the laboring man.

Mr. Chairman, the blindest policy of all is the attempt to array the West and South against protection. The West and South need a protective tariff more than the East. The New England States, even with the vacillating protection they received before 1861, built up a manufacturing and diversified industry and accumulated wealth that gave them a commanding position over the Middle, Western, and Southern States. When the high tariff of 1861–'62 was enacted the manufacturing industries crossed the Alleghany Mountains and spread over the great Middle and adjoining Western States. It diversified their industries and built up their manufactures until they exceeded those of New England. Commerce and the wholesale trade followed the manufactures until the great cities of the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys and the Lakes far exceeded those of New England in wealth and commerce.

Next came the efforts of the Democratic party in the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, and now in the Fiftieth Congresses, to break down the protective system. The persistent and able opposition of the Republican party, aided by a few Democrats, defeated the passage of the free-trade bills in the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-eighth, and Forty-ninth Congresses. This defeat caused the manufacturing industries to advance across the plains and mountains of the far West, and to penetrate and invade the Southern States. The result is we see the iron and steel and lead mining and manufacturing industries of Colorado, Alabama, and Tennessee. We behold the trade and commerce and manufactures of Kansas City, Omaha, Denver, Pueblo, Atlanta, Birmingham, and other cities fast growing ahead of their rivals in the Eastern and Middle States. I speak of the South in connection with the West because their interests in this industrial advance are identical. The Eastern and Middle States with their enormous capital and accumulated wealth can do much better without protection than we of the West and South.

> Westward [and southward] the course of empire takes its way;
> The four first acts already past,
> A fifth shall close the drama with the day;
> Time's noblest offspring is the last.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, the last and noblest drama of industrial offspring will be that of the West and South. And when this free-trade bill shall be defeated, and the people put their seal of condemnation upon it next November, then will begin an era of manufacturing and commercial growth in the South and West before unheard of. One of the ablest of European writers on economies and protection relates the fact that Washington, on the day of his inauguration, wore a suit of home-manufactured cloth, in order, in the simple and impressive manner so peculiar to this great man, to give all his successors in office and to all future legislators a memorable way in which the welfare of this country is to be promoted.

How this lesson has been lost upon President Cleveland and the Democratic party.

Mr. Chairman, I caution any gentlemen or any political party not to attempt to overthrow the American protective system. He who supposes that system had its origin or continuance in legislative statutes is ignorant of its history or does not grasp its import. It is the result of a growth. It is the crystallized sentiment and opinion of the American people. It has been evolved from the necessities and conflicts of our industrial system as much as our national unity has been evolved from the necessities and conflicts of our political system.

Mr. FUNSTON. Mr. Chairman, the discussion of the tariff question has already been long drawn out, the mine has been thoroughly worked, and there is but little that can be added on either side of the question without repeating what has already been brought to the attention of this House. Were I an attorney in the case I would certainly be willing to rest the cause of protection on the evidence already adduced. This, however, is a case in which not only the cause at issue is being tried, but the litigants themselves are expected to go on the stand and give the reason for the faith that is within them. This is my only apology for my appearance at this time. I am for American interests as against the balance of the world.

> If any provide not for his own * * * he is worse than an infidel.

However much my heart may go out for the unfortunates in the Old World, my first duty is to my own countrymen. Therefore, I am a protectionist in the full sense of the word. I would protect our country against foreign invasion, whether it be armed troops to lay waste our happy land or the manufactured products of half-paid labor to cripple our industries and destroy the occupation of our laboring people. Mr. Chairman, I am not here to-day to plead for the protection of any special class or interest as against any others that are equally worthy. The policy of the friends of protection should be to build up and maintain a system which reaches out and includes every man, whether rich or poor, whether living on the plains of the West or among the hills of New England; whether on the lakes of the North or the orange groves of the South; a system which builds up and sacredly protects every honest industry in which an American citizen secures employment or invests a dollar; a system which benefits not only those who are directly engaged in the protected industry, but all others who have the good fortune to be American citizens.

A tariff bill based on any other principle is one-sided and disproportioned, and ought to be honestly adjusted, or otherwise permitted to perish in its own narrowness and selfishness. Protected coal for Virginia and free wool for Ohio is not a protective system. Protected sugar for Louisiana and free salt for Michigan is not a protective system. Protected rice for South Carolina and free lumber for Oregon is not a protective system. Protected wheat for Minnesota and free fruit for California is not a protective system. Such a scheme is little-souled, narrow-minded, partisan and sectional, and unworthy of a place among the plans of statesmen. Such is, indeed, the character of the bill which we are called upon to consider at this time. It bears the ear-marks of the politician in its partiality to those States the Democratic party hopes to carry at the next Presidential election. It exhibits the accustomed contempt of the Democracy for the interests of the agriculturist and the mechanic by placing many of the productions of their toil on the free-list, while, by reducing the duty on many articles only just enough to increase their importation and keep up the revenue, it blunders as to its method of reducing the surplus.

Whatever may have been the design of its framers, the sure result can only be the destruction of many of our industries in which thousands of laborers find honest employment and great amounts of capital a legitimate investment. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL], whom I do not see in his seat, well says in his speech of the 29th of April.

> We are going in the same track that our predecessors followed in 1857 and 1871.

The gentleman doubtless spoke more wisely than he knew. I agree with him fully, and to assist him in proving his case I will read an extract from President Buchanan's message to Congress dated December 8, 1857, in which he says:

> We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in rich abundance, and yet notwithstanding all these advantages our country in its monetary interests is at the present moment in a deplorable condition. In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions and in all the elements of natural wealth we find our manufactures suspended, our public works retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want.

The able gentleman from Massachusetts speaks for his party when he says "we," and he utters the fact, whether he knows it or not. There can be no doubt of the intentions of the Democratic party to return to their old beat of 1857. The same sad prospects, the same outlook of social misfortune and industrial desolation await the unfurling again of their free-trade banner. It brings to us a vision of the past—the silent wheels, the smokeless stacks, the deserted workshops, the widespread want of 1857. [Applause.] These calamities seem to have a charm for the average Democrat equaled only by the charm of wild-cat banks, half-paid labor, and cheap foreign goods. As to the question of labor in these halcyon days of Democracy, I speak from personal knowledge when I say that the strongest and best of laborers were hired on the farm in those days at $125 to $150 per year, and boarded themselves, and the same class of hands are to-day receiving from $250 to $300 per year.

What is true of farm laborers, as relates to increase of wages, is true also in all other branches of industry. No man who has the least knowledge of the fact will deny that the laborer of to-day is paid an increase of from 40 to 65 per cent., according to occupation, over what he was paid in 1857 to 1860. I desire here to submit a table, which is the result of careful study and investigation by the Springfield (Mass.) Republican, showing the per cent. of advance of wages of employés since the period before the civil war to the present time: Railroads, 35 per cent.; cotton, 50 per cent.; woolen, 65 per cent.; paper, 55 per cent.; buttons, 55 per cent.; cigars, 50 per cent.; whips, 44 per cent.; domestics, 65 per cent.; iron, 64 per cent.; wool, 64 per cent.; day labor, 40 per cent; average of the whole, 52 per cent. But the eloquent and able gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] would tell us, as he did in his address to this House on the 26th of last month:

> That labor is as much a commodity selling in the market as the materials to be worked up. If the demand is great wages will go up; if the demand is small wages will go down.

Does the gentleman stop to reflect that it is protection which creates the demand for the labor?

No one, even of the most radical free-trade convictions, has asserted on this floor that protection does not build up and sustain manufactures and other industries which demand the labor of many thousands of men. It is the creator of demand for labor, and therefore the creator of wages, high or low, as the tariff itself is high or low. No one who admits that demand regulates wages and that a tariff creates the demand can arrive at any other conclusion. There is but one side, then, of this question for the laboring man, and that is the side that gives him the wages. That free trade or a duty for revenue only will create a demand for labor no one upon this floor has had the temerity to assert. That point has been studiously avoided by all who have maintained the free-trade side of this question. It is the missing link in their chain of argument.

What is to become of the laboring man when the demand for his services is superseded by foreign labor expended upon imported goods is a question of graver importance than that of a few cents on a bolt of cloth or a barrel of salt. The labor question has become a most important factor in our system of government and no innovation should be made which in any way affects this question without carefully ascertaining beyond a peradventure that the change will be in accord with the labor interests of the country. Yet it is proposed by this bill now under consideration to remove the protective duties in whole from many important industries in which thousands of our countrymen are employed, and to materially reduce protection on others, the inevitable result of which will be the destruction of those industries and shutting out of employment thousands of men who are now earning a comfortable living. As a reimbursement for all this loss and industrial disturbance they are told that a limited number of manufactured articles which they may desire to buy can be purchased a few cents cheaper in consequence of the adoption of free-trade principles.

Do gentlemen ever reflect that the question of cheapness is not the all-important question with the laboring man? The question of employment at good wages is of far greater importance to him. None are less inclined to higgle over prices than he. None are more willing to live and let live than he. Something to buy with is what concerns him most. Goods may be cheap, they may be offered at half price, but what advantage is that to the man who is out of employment and out of money? The fact that goods are cheap only adds to his aggravation. No gentleman on the free-trade side of this question, who has referred to the protection on farm products, has failed to assert that the duty on them does not add to their market value, except in the single case of wool. If this be true, then the laboring man can expect no reduction in the prices of articles that go upon his table. If this be true, beef and pork and bread and butter and all other articles of like kind, which make up the most expensive part of his purchases, will remain the same as to-day, while, if the most that is claimed for free trade be true, he may expect to obtain his wearing apparel a few dollars cheaper per year than under protection.

But this can not apply to cotton goods, for they are already cheaper in this country than in any other part of the world. In any event, the proposed reduction must be confined to woolen goods. Now, if it be true that free wool is the panacea which shall cure all his ills, the sovereign and only remedy provided for his relief, let us see how great that relief will be. The present duty on wool is about 10 cents. In a suit of woolen goods there are from 3 to 7 pounds of wool. If all be true that the free-traders say, the suit costs about 50 cents more than it should under free trade. Allowing two full suits each year, $1 would be saved to the laboring man by free wool. And to save this $1 he is asked to join in a crusade against the manufacturing interests of the country, by which his wages will be reduced at least one hundred times that amount, and most likely he will be thrown out of emploment altogether.

It has been uniformly urged on the other side of this House that the manufacturer absorbs all the benefits of protection and that he does not permit them to extend to the laborer. Might we not right here urge with equal force that in case the duty is removed from wool the manufacturer will absorb all the benefits and that he will not permit them to extend to the purchaser, so that after all the $1 to be saved may prove to be only a myth? While I do not want to be understood as saying that free wool alone would bring about this reduction in wages, I do want to be understood that whenever you strike down one of the great protected industries of this country all others must go with it.

The American system of protection is one wherein every industry is interrelated with and interdependent upon every other. Each industry stands as a pillar in a structure. Let some free-trade Samson pull down one of these pillars and the whole temple of American industry must fall. When this American system is destroyed labor in Europe and in this country must stand on the same level as to wages.

In this connection I submit a few tables taken from a most valuable book, entitled "Wages, Living, and Tariff," by E. A. Hartshorn, to show what that labor level will be. The current wages paid in flax and hemp spinning mills in Great Britain and in this country are:

Mr. Chairman, I hardly need follow this branch of my subject further, only than to anticipate the charge which may be made that in the last table the industries mentioned are but little, if any, influenced by the tariff. That is true so far as relates to a direct influence, but the indirect influence of the protective system is in many instances greater than the direct. As an illustration: A woolen mill is started and a thousand men employed at good wages. Their benefit is direct, because that industry is protected. But the butcher who feeds them finds a ready market at good prices, and he too is benefited, though his business is not enumerated on the tariff schedule. So, also, with the carpenter who erects the building, the workmen who dig the foundation, the artist who does the painting, the blacksmith who repairs the tools, as also the baker, the grocer, the hotel-keeper, and hundreds of other avocations not mentioned in the tariff list. These all receive an impetus because of the men employed, and their benefits are indirect. Nor do the benefits of that woolen mill just mentioned stop with those who are benefited secondarily. It continues to others who move up and take the places of those employed, and so on until many thousands are favorably affected.

When three hundred thousand mills and manufactories of all kinds, as there are to-day all over this great country, are put in motion, the effect is felt in the most distant parts and becomes the nourishing life-blood of the whole people. Nor are the benefits confined to those who perform manual la or. The school-teacher is better paid, because so many find employment in other business than his. The doctor finds a wider scope for his practice, because so many have chosen callings other than his. The lawyer and the preacher the same; and all are better paid, because so many others have something to do and something to pay with.

Mr. Chairman, after all we have heard from the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber about the deplorable condition of our people under what they have chosen to call a robber-tax, we instinctively turn to them and survey their condition. We find a greater number of the laboring people owners of their owns homes than in any other country upon the face of the earth. They wear better clothes and are supplied better at their tables, and are better educated and paid than the laboring people of any other country. We can not exaggerate by saying that the American laborer has the comforts of life as well as many of the luxuries in larger quantities than any other working people. When their families are encountered in the churches or in the schools or in any of the walks of life no one can determine by their appearance to what class they belong—whether poor or rich. They do not look like a people who were robbed. They themselves know to the contrary, as their votes in the industrial States have always testified. And when we behold the nation's progress in wealth and all the elements of civilization during the last twenty-five years we are indeed lost in amazement.

I shall not attempt to repeat the facts here; suffice to say that even within the last eighteen years it has been more than double that of any other nation in the world. And all this has been done notwithstanding the so-called robber-tariff tax of which we hear so much. The gentleman from Texas, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, says it has been done in spite of the tariff. Does any man, even the gentleman from Texas himself, believe it? Does any man believe that without protection the mining interests of iron ore would have increased 110 per cent. since 1870, coal 66 per cent., and many other industries in like proportion? Does any man believe that under free trade any judicious business man would have put a dollar into manufacturing enterprises in this country while he could have carried on such industry in England at a labor cost of 25 per cent. to 100 per cent. less than here? The cost of ocean transportation can not be offered as an obstacle in the way of English competition. If I have been correctly informed, the rocks that pave the streets of New Orleans were brought from England as ship-ballast in ships used in the cotton trade.

I have no doubt that the English manufacturers would gladly lay down their goods in our country free of the cost of transportation. They could well afford to do it, for the monopoly of the American market would amply reimburse them. Every American citizen should spurn it. I for one do not want it. I would rather see the skies of Tennessee and Pennsylvania darkened with the smoke of their furnaces; I would rather hear the clatter of their machinery and behold their industrial classes employed at good wages than to have English goods thrown upon our shores at any price, however cheap. And now, Mr. Chairman, as to the farmer, who seems to be made the burden of complaint by the gentlemen on the other side. Why all these tears for the farmer? Why this lamentation, while at the same time you persist in removing the duty on foreign wool? Wool is the only farm product which you admit to be enhanced in value by the tariff. I want to say to you, gentlemen, that the farmers are asking none of your sympathy. They know your hands are against them, and the only favor they ask of you is not to insult their intelligence with the specious assumption that they are so ignorant as to believe in your theories or trust to the promises which you hold out to them with one hand while you tear down their industry with the other. Put up the duty on wool instead of taking off what it now has, and you will give them some reason to believe in your wisdom and sincerity. The farmer is not dead to his interests. He knows better perhaps where they lie than the men who are assuming to champion his cause. But little if any complaint comes from him of the high prices alleged to have arisen by reason of the tariff.

Of all the petitions which have reached my table in the last four years, not one has come from a farmer asking for the reduction of the tariff on wool or on any other article. He knows there is not an article of clothing or machinery or tools for the farm that is not cheaper to-day than it was in the free-trade days of 1860. He knows, too, that there has been a gradual and continuous cheapening of goods and manufactured articles of all kinds from 1860 down to the present time. He knows that the lives of our fathers and mothers, which were so full of toil at the loom, the spinning-wheel, and other tedious, dreary forms of labor, have, through the fostering care of our protective system, been rendered comparatively happy and easy, so that where once was heard the monotonous clinking of the shuttle are now heard the sweet tones of the organ and the piano. Books and newspapers have taken the place of knitting-needles and spinning-wheels. The farmers of the country have taken their places upon a higher and better plane of culture, from which they do not propose to be lured by the siren notes of the free-trader.

We hear but little complaint from them of high prices of things which they have to buy.

A first-class double-spring-seated farm wagon finished, in better style than were the carriages of our fathers fifty years, ago now sells at $65 retail; Fitchburg cassimere, 85 cents per yard; cashmerets, 35 to 38 cents a yard; best standard sheeting, 8 cents per yard; good calicoes, 4½ to 6½ cents per yard; nails, 3 cents per pound, and all others of the real necessaries of farm life at the same low rates. Thanks, gentlemen, restrain your sympathy; bestow it where it will be more appropriate and better appreciated. What the farmer most desires is a good market. What he has to buy is not a question so serious with him as what he has to sell. If you will only give him a good market in which to sell his products, make his market as easy of access and as convenient as are his places of purchase, he will ask no odds in the battle of life. This is fast becoming the case now under the benign influences of the American system of protection. The great cities of Chicago, St. Louis, and Kansas City are fast becoming the leading markets of the world.

The great State of Illinois is one vast work-shop. Missouri, with her rich mines of iron, coal, and zinc, is only held back by the mirage of free trade. Kansas is rapidly following with her smelting furnaces, glass factories, foundries, and machine-shops. The farmer of the West welcomes them as the best friends of his interests. In them he sees a market which is far preferable to that of London, 4,000 miles away. Engaged in these industries he sees thousands of consumers employed who are his customers, and who, if not so employed, would be his competitors in agricultural pursuits, thus doubling the productions of the farm, which must necessarily result in an over-supply of the home market of all such commodities as the farmer produces. Thus his home market is destroyed, his production doubled, and he driven to markets beyond the sea, where with a vast surplus he must come into competition with the cheapest labor of the world. Gentlemen tell us that the London market governs the price of our farm products. London can fix the prices of our products only so long as she pays more than is paid in America.

The American market has to gain but 4 per cent. on the farm productions of the country to make the home demand equal to the home supply, and then not London but our own home demand will control the prices of all home products. The farmers of this country want to hasten that time. Every interest impels them to it. Every patriotic impulse urges it upon them. They want neither English markets nor English goods, and will hail with delight the day when we shall have only American markets and American goods. [Applause.] I for one am ready to put up the fences around the outside and nail up the gates. Gentlemen have talked upon this floor about giving the farmers the world's market as if our protective tariff had shut them out from the markets of the world. Such talk is absolutely silly. We have no export duty. The products of this country can leave our shores without the least obstruction. The markets of the world are before them, such as they can get into.

But we find an economic system much like our own surrounding every country in Europe except England, and even she is not absolutely free, for she collects $100,000,000 annually. Were we to adopt absolute free trade not a single market of the world would be freer to us than it is to-day. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], in his remarks on this floor on the 26th of April, declared that our tariff rendered manufactured products so expensive that we cannot sell them at competitive prices in foreign markets. Is the gentleman aware that many of our most valuable products, such as steel, etc., are taken in the raw state from the mines and that nothing but labor is employed to convert them into manufactured products, and the fact that the articles when manufactured have protection does not prevent them being sold in foreign or home markets just the same as if unprotected?

To be more explicit, if a home manufacturer have a crate of pottery worth $90, and there is a duty of $10 a crate on pottery, which added to the $90 would make the selling price $100, that would not prevent the home manufacturer selling his crate in a foreign market at its actual value, which is $90, if he chose to do so. The gentleman's argument is in a great measure fallacious, for it can not apply to those products into which nothing but labor enters, nor can it apply to goods manufactured from cotton or other materials of which we are exporters, as the duty on such materials does not affect the price. Mr. Chairman, England is the only nation in Europe that makes any pretense to free trade. Does any one believe she adopted that policy through any feeling of brotherhood for the balance of the world? Does any one believe that she did so through any feeling of brotherly love for America? To say so would be to stultify the history of that people in their relations to this country.

For eight hundred years England maintained the most inflexible barriers of protection; and not protection only, but in many articles their exclusive policy amounted to prohibition, preventing entirely the importation of such things as came in competition with her own industries. Even while the American colonies were dependencies of Great Britain she prohibited the exportation of American sugar except in English vessels, which were compelled to discharge their cargoes in English ports; and so jealous was she of her own colonies that she made it a capital offense to transport sheep from England to America, in order that she might keep down the American wool industry.

Skilled mechanics were prohibited under penalty of death from emigrating to America. The shipment to America of looms and other machinery for manufacturing the various textiles was prohibited under heavy penalties. Lord Chatham declared at one time that the Americans ought not to be permitted to manufacture even so much as a boot nail; and the English Parliament, that great body to which Englishmen delight to point, came within three votes of passing a bill by which every American industry was to be laid waste by English soldiery, and all this while the American colonies were still British possessions. Does any man believe that a nation guilty of these flagrant outrages against her own colonies would have her conscience aroused with sentiments of benevolence and philanthropy after those colonies had become an independent power and had stricken off the galling restrictions and prohibitions of the mother country? Are gentlemen so stupid as to suppose that England has changed her policy as a measure of brotherly love for us?

England does nothing for love; she does all things for money or other substantial gain. When she had finally converted her whole island into a workshop; when she had become an industrial giant, capable of competing with the balance of the world; when she discovered that she must import food products valued at $800,000,000, and raw material for manufacture to the amount of $650,000,000; when she became aware that she needed a market abroad of $1,200,000,000 annually for her manufactured products; when she knew that to ship manufactured products to England would be like "carrying coals to Newcastle," then it was, and then only, Mr. Chairman, that she found it to her interest to abolish her protective system and ask the balance of the world to do likewise. England accumulated her wealth and strength under a protective tariff régime. Free trade as yet is not her settled policy. It is but an experiment, and it is one, too, against which many of her wisest statesmen are opposed. Sir Edward Sullivan a few years ago said:

> Thirty years ago England had almost a monopoly of the manufacturing industries of the world; she produced everything in excess of her consumption, other nations comparatively nothing. The world was obliged to buy from her because it could not buy anywhere else. The discoveries of gold and steam immensely increased the demands and the purchasing power of the world, and consequently the demand for the products of England. Her wealth increased by leaps and bounds that were bewildering; she was intoxicated with success; with her immense accumulated wealth, her machinery, her coal, her iron, her insular position, she thought herself unassailable; she laughed at the possibility of foreign competition; she offered to fight the rest of the world with her right hand tied behind her back. She said to the world, "I will receive anything you can send me without duty," adding at the same time an expression of hope that they would in turn receive her goods. But they said, "No; we gladly avail ourselves of your kind offer of admitting our goods; certainly we will send you all we possibly can. At present, unfortunately, we have nothing to send; we can not yet supply our own wants, but when we have more capital and your machinery and workmen, we hope to have a large surplus to send you." Well, that was thirty years ago. Now, France and America and Belgium have got our machinery and our workmen and ample capital, and they are sending us a yearly increasing surplus that is driving our own goods out of our own market, and every year they are more completely closing their markets to our goods.

The language of Lord Sullivan is the language of thousands of other Englishmen who believe that England's interests require the readoption of a judicious protective policy in order to maintain the industrial supremacy which she has achieved.

And now, Mr. Chairman, about the so-called robber tax on the poor man's blankets. If there is one thing in this discussion which has received more attention than another by the Democrats of this House it is the tariff on blankets. They have abused it more than the tariff on any twenty other articles on the schedule. The opprobrious epithets of the English language have been exhausted in denunciation of that tariff. One would suppose to hear this tirade that a Democrat regards such tariff as surpassed in enormity only by outright murder. But when we turn to the bill under consideration, which comes from the Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee, and which they ask us to vote for, we find they have placed a tariff of 40 per cent. on blankets. If the tariff on blankets is robbery, why this robber tax of 40 per cent.? Why does this Democratic committee put but 50 cents on a gallon of wine and $1 on a $2.50 blanket?

This shows the insincerity of their pretensions. It shows either that they do not believe what they say, or believing they themselves are the willing robbers. Why did they not take all the duty off blankets and put it on whisky and tobacco, if they are sincere in their assertion that those articles should bear the burden of taxation?

Mr. Chairman, we have heard so much about tariff taxation upon the people one would almost suppose that all our State and school and road taxes were the result of the tariff, while the fact is, there is not one penny levied upon any man or his property by the tariff outside of the importer of foreign goods. You may say the results are the same as a tax on the people, but it is not a tax on the people; and we think we are prepared to show that neither the results nor principles involved are the same as a tax. No one, I presume, disputes the right of the Government to levy a duty upon imported goods for purposes of revenue, for the protection of American manufactures, for the regulation of commerce with foreign nations. The first and second divisions of these propositions are sanctioned by the plain language of the Constitution and by acts of Congress passed during its first session, while nearly all were yet living who had been members of the constitutional convention that framed our present national compact, while many of these makers of the Constitution were also members of Congress, and, too, while Washington, who had been president of the constitutional convention, was also President of the United States.

Surely in this presence the institution of the protective system which has been fortified by legislative enactment from the inception of our Government down to the present time, can not fail to be in accordance with the very genius and spirit of the American institutions.

In connection with the third division of this proposition it is important to note a valuable item of history, cited by Hon. John A. Kasson in a recent article in the Forum, according to which, in the year 1766, Benjamin Franklin, when before a committee of the English Parliament, said:

I never heard any objection made in America to the right of Parliament to levy duties to regulate commerce.

Again:

The payment of duties to regulate commerce was never disputed.

These early constitutional and legislative predilections show that the principle was fundamental in our organic compact, and that the origin and development of the foreign-commerce clause of the Constitution were perfectly normal and necessary. I may say, however, that the right under the Constitution to levy duties is not now and here a disputed question.

This right is reinforced by a principle which obtains in many of the States and nearly every incorporated city. The corporate authorities of the city say to all outsiders, "We have built the city at great expense; these streets have been paved at the expense of our people; these magnificent halls and parks are the fruits of the taxation of our persons and property; everything you see comes from our toil; our merchants and citizens have borne their share of all this expense; thousands of people are located here; it is unsurpassed as a market; but before you can drive in your wagon loaded with the same kinds of goods that are produced by our artisans or sold by our merchants, and before you can be permitted to run up a red flag in front of their doors you must pay money into the treasury of this city for the acquisition of privileges which we only have secured at great sacrifice, labor, and expense."

Mr. Chairman, this is protection for the city and for the citizens of the city, and for the arts and artisans of the city. No one questions this right; no one regards it as a tax on the people of that city. The Republican party of America stands precisely in the relation of the city and its citizens to the outside world. It says to Europe and to all cheap-labor countries, "We have here the best market in the world. It was established through the toils and hardships of our fathers. It has been built up and is now maintained by the magnificent pluck and energy of our people. We make more money and spend it faster than any other nation of equal magnitude on the face of the earth. But before you, who have no interest whatever in our country; you, whose hands are rather against us than for us, before you can be permitted to run in your cheap foreign goods and compete with our own citizens, you must pay money into the Treasury of the United States." This, Mr. Chairman, is protection to our citizens and to our industries. Do you call that a tax on the people?

But you say "The amount paid for the admission of the goods is added to the price of the goods, and that the consumer pays it, and this is a tax."

I know a certain county wherein the farmers believed they were paying too much for goods. They organized a co-operative association, rented a house, hired a foreman and clerk, and obtained their goods at a price a large per cent. below what they had been paying for them. Dare any one say that because the hire of the foreman and clerk and the rent of the house were computed in fixing the selling prices of the goods those items were a tax on the stockholders? Any business man would say that those items were a part of the expense in a business transaction for saving or making money. In 1861 the people of this country, through the National Government, entered into a business arrangement wherein they proposed to lay duties on all foreign goods which came into competition with our own productions.

Under that system such goods have gradually grown cheaper, year by year, until an average reduction in prices of 28 per cent. has been reached. Our own manufacturing enterprises have been stimulated and developed, a higher degree of skill has been attained in every department, and as a result of this American system we have this magnificent reduction in the prices of our own home manufactures. Dare any man call that a tax? It would be the sheerest nonsense, and I have no better name than twaddle for such tirade. It falls beneath the dignity of argument. We are told, however, that the reduction in the prices of goods is due to the invention of machinery. Do gentlemen stop to reflect that the progress of invention is the result of a desire to cheapen production rather than to secure a patent? The protective tariff is as great a stimulant to the inventor as it is to the manufacturer.

Will any man assert that the recent discoveries and inventions for the manufacture of sugar from sorghum would have been made had there been no protection on sugar? I know something of the gentleman to whose efforts we are indebted in a great measure for the development of the sorghum-sugar industry. I know that he spent a fine fortune of his own and risked all that he could get from others, and as a last resort came to Congress and through the committee of which I am a member got further assistance. Will any one tell me that that man would have done and risked all I have mentioned had sugar not been on the protected list? It was because it was there and because he had faith in his countrymen that it should remain there; in other words, because he believed that there was a fortune for him in the manufacture of sugar, that this work has been accomplished. Thus it will be seen that a protective tariff stimulates invention. Under its influence the greatest proficiency has been attained in machinery and saving methods.

Mr. Chairman, men have almost recklessly invested their money in manufacturing enterprises during the last twenty-five years. They have done so because of their belief that they would have not so much a high market to sell in as a fair and steady market, and that their Government would stand over them with the shield of protection by which at no time could designing capital of Europe crush them by a combined movement. Under this benign influence millions of dollars have been invested and millions of men employed directly and indirectly. One invention has been added to another, waste and loss have been reduced to a minimum, and by the progress of invention every particle and fragment have been utilized for some beneficent purpose. Competition has sprung up on all sides. Wages have gone up and prices of goods have gone down. As a manufacturing people we are to-day making such rapid strides that unless some untoward misfortune, such as is implied in the Mills bill, overtake us we shall within a decade lead all the nations of the earth.

That a frightful surplus is accumulating in the Treasury no one will deny. So far as it has accumulated through the duties on foreign imports it is the result of our natural relations to the balance of the world. It could not be otherwise unless we choose to forego all advantages arising from our isolated condition, the value of our country to foreigners as a market, and the the general prosperity of all who trade with us. To stop the flow of money to the Treasury would be like stopping the flow of blood to the heart and the result much the same. The remedy for the accumulation of a great surplus is in sending it out again through proper channels to perform its functions among the people; not by spending it like silly children, but by wise and judicious investments. What would a good business man do were he so fortunate as to accumulate in his safe a few thousand dollars more than he needs for current outlay? If he were doing business in a rented house he would probably put up one of his own which would be an honor to himself and an ornament to his town and the erection of which would give employment to the laboring men of his community.

The Government is to-day doing business all over the land in rented post-office buildings, many of which, even in cities of great importance, are inferior wooden structures, liable to burn down at any moment, and for which, too, exorbitant rents are often demanded. The Government should at once begin the erection of suitable buildings for post-offices and other Government purposes in every town where the Government business has attained any considerable magnitude.

Fortifications should be erected on our seacoast to protect our cities in case of war. I do not believe in war, and as a means of discouraging war I want to put ourselves in such condition that no nation will consider it safe or profitable to make war upon us. I would build a navy worthy of the great people that we are, and I would be prepared to demand that all international differences be settled by peaceable arbitration. I would encourage and foster the merchant marine by granting bounty for every league steamed or sailed in carrying the United States mails. I would make the bounty sufficiently ample to carry our mail and establish our trade in every nook and corner of the earth. I am sick of this cant about the tariff destroying our carrying trade and thus our merchant marine. Our carrying trade to-day is, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, $1,400,000,000 annually, whereas it was but $500,000,000 in 1860, an increase of nearly 300 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, the carrying trade is all right. The only trouble is that it is carried in British vessels. The British built and armed and equipped rebel privateers during our civil war, and under the guise of Confederate cruisers and under the protection of the Confederate flag they burned, or drove under foreign flags, the whole of our merchant marine; and they are now exacting from this country $150,000,000 annually for having thus successfully usurped our carrying trade. Mr. Chairman, I want to see the national Treasury respond liberally to the demands made upon it to build up and foster our merchant marine, which, by proper encouragement, would be able to do its full share of the world's traffic and secure its full proportion of the world's wealth and lay it down at our doors.

I would see every soldier who served our country in the hour of her dire distress, or his widow, placed upon the pension-roll at fair rates for the remainder of life. [Applause.]

After what I have now enumerated, or even half of it, in the way of appropriate expenditure has been provided for, there will be no occasion to destroy our great economic system to get rid of the surplus as the Democrats of old burned their barns to get clear of the rats. Every dollar will be placed in circulation among the people, and that, too, through the hands of those who work for wages. All business will receive a new impetus and all departments of industry will flourish with new-born prosperity.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the time is near at hand when every American will fully realize the importance of maintaining our American protective system, and when the laborer, the capitalist, the farmer, and the banker, the merchant, and the manufacturer may all unite to work out the great destiny of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. Mr. Chairmon, I have listened with some pleasure, and I am glad to think with some profit, to the discussion which has taken place on the pending bill. Freely, frankly, and gladly I say this. At the same time I must confess that often, very often indeed, have I been amused at the arguments made and ideas entertained by gentlemen upon the subject of tariff taxation. When I hear gentlemen say they would protect the wheat-grower, the corn-grower, the beef and pork fattener, and many other things equally foolish, my face involuntarily becomes wreathed in broad smiles, which are beyond my power to suppress. The voicing of such ideas leads me to believe that nothing in the world so much confuses and confounds the average mind as the effort to solve the effect of reciprocity privileges in matters of trade.

Sirs, in the industries of this country we have those producing commodities which can not in the open markets of the world compete with similar commodities produced elsewhere. We also have those who produce commodities which in the open markets of the world can compete. Both these classes of our citizens produce commodities that enter into the traffic and commerce of our people, and are sent from locality to locality, from State to State, and those of one class from country to country, as the wants of the people of those localities, States, and countries may demand, always limited, however, by the ability to buy.

Besides these we have still others, and these constitute a very large per cent. of our people, performing that kind of labor which can only be performed in the locality where performed, and with which there can be no competition except by persons living in the locality where such labor is required.

All our people are consumers. The man who, by his labor, produces an article which, regardless of competition, can be sold in our own or shipped and sold in another country, needs no protection. To talk about protecting him is the sheerest nonsense. After you have protected him all you can he is still unprotected. All such men are interested in an unfettered and uninterrupted commerce.

The man who, however, produces that which can not compete, even in the markets at home, wants protection. If we are to have the benefit of the products his industry produces he must be protected. But how much ought he to be protected? More than is necessary to enable him to compete with the foreign producer? Not at all. He should be protected, if at all, to such an extent as will enable him to compete in the home market. If he can compete in foreign markets he needs no protection.

In all our legislation we must remember that all our people are consumers; that their rights and interests are to be considered. We must remember that a large per cent. of our people are producers of those things which sell in the open markets of the world—at home and abroad—and that their interests are not to be ignored.

Consumers want the widest market in which to buy. Producers who produce those things which sell in open and even-handed competition, want the privilege of the widest market in wh...h to sell. If the wants of the consumer are to be curtailed, if the privileges of the unprotected producer are to be abridged, curtail and abridge those wants and privileges enough, and only enough, to protect the man who needs protection. Levy a tariff high enough to afford him such margins as will enable him to make and sell his goods. Do not make it so high as to cut off foreign competition. When you cut off reasonable competition you make of him a monopolist. When you have made of him a monopolist, with all the human nature inherent in the poisoned adder warmed into life, he turns and smites the hand that furnished the meat upon which he fed and thereby grew into strength.

"Competition is the life of trade." I would never lose sight of competition. As a protectionist—and I claim to be one—I would make my tariff high enough to enable our own people to compete. As a free-trader—and I claim to be one—I protest against making the tariff so high as to destroy competition from abroad. To deny protection at home builds up monopoly abroad; to prevent competition from abroad builds up monopoly at home. Trade and commerce give employment to labor, and the most profitable employment that can be given. To obstruct commerce is a detriment to every consumer. If all are consumers, then it is a detriment to all. To obstruct commerce is not only a detriment to every consumer, but is an additional detriment to every man who produces a surplus of that which is able to stand competition in the open markets abroad—that which could, and otherwise might, find its way to another land.

I belong to that numerous class of American citizens who believe in the greatness of our country, and in the greatness of her opportunities—in many, very many, yes, in the great majority of things, surpassing all the balance of the world; with her energies and efficiency unshackled capable of producing the grandest results.

In the production of all those things wherein we surpass all the rest of the world we should give ourselves the utmost freedom: while in those things wherein others surpass us we need not fear the hurtful influence of giving them a reasonable show of freedom.

With the capacity of producing, and with profit, much that is needed abroad, we simply fetter our ability to sell by paralyzing their ability to buy. The man who has a thing for sale wants to find a buyer. The man who wants to buy looks for the man who has for sale. A sale and a purchase are the counterparts of each other. A sale is the mate of a purchase, while a purchase is the twin of a sale. Every device that denies us the right to buy from abroad anything that can be bought cheaper there than we can produce it here, only tends to prevent our selling abroad an equal amount of something that we can produce cheaper here than it can be produced abroad.

An individual, a single individual, if he has it to sell, can easily sell for money more than he buys. Why? Because all he has for sale is so incomparably small in proportion to the ability of the balance of the world to buy and pay money that he sells with comparatively little difficulty. The people of a great nation aggregating sixty millions of people, producing a great surplus and capable of producing a greater, find it difficult to fall in with persons able to buy. While an individual may sell more than he buys, if he buys more than he sells he must have funds to draw from, a credit to appeal to, or something that will be accepted in payment.

If he has no money, no credit, no property to exchange, but has labor to sell, he may sell his labor and buy. Labor being the only thing he has to exchange for the necessaries of life, refuse to take his labor and he is unable to buy your goods, unable to buy your spare bread; refuse to take his labor, and his wife goes without the necessary raiment to keep her comfortable; refuse to take his labor, and his children cry for bread to appease their hunger. With want and starvation staring him in the face, he is ready to work at half price. Yes, rather than suffer his loving wife to shiver, rather than see his children starve, he works at quarter price.

With all his labor sold at quarter price he can not buy so very much. His inability to buy leaves you with an overproduction. Ay, the overproduction is not an overproduction; it is an underconsumption. Plenty of people to consume all that is made and a good deal more if liberally supplied, and plenty to make more if a price was found for the labor. The employer can not employ when he finds no market for his goods. An unnatural condition of things is brought about by an unnatural effort to build up something by legislation, instead of allowing it to be built by reason of the natural demand for it. By such methods, business, trade, and everything else is depressed because of the obstruction to natural laws.

The overcrowded populations of Europe, hemmed within circumscribed limits, handicapped for the want of opportunities, are suffering and starving for the indispensable necessaries of life, and yet within easy reach of all those necessaries if a sale for their labor could only be found. All to gratify the greed of the American cormorant, who is only interested in shackling labor that he may "corner" some commodity and give thereto a price higher than it would otherwise command, an unnatural selling price.

After thus philosophizing, Mr. Chairman, let us inquire how it is that the people of one country trade with the people of another country, and what are the ordinary means and usual methods of carrying on this trade. The merchants of one country buy from and sell to the merchants of the other country. Each buys what his customers need and are able to pay for; not just what their customers want, but what they are able to pay for. Tell me, sirs, that money is so plentiful in any country that the people can ad libitum pay money! If they can not pay money they must go in debt or sell the product of their labor.

The people of one country rarely become in debt to the people of another country for the little current trade thus taking place from day to day, from week to week, and from year to year, by sending back and forth the things as needed. These little balances are paid and settled without passing money. No indebtedness is suffered, except for short intervals. If any considerable indebtedness is incurred, it is by reason of the fact that the wealthy people of one country make loans for the purpose of making public improvements in the other country, or for the purpose of enabling the people of the other country to carry on war, or by making investments in such other country for their own individual purposes.

In making these loans the money is not sent over, but the material is bought and sent over with which to make the improvement, or the supplies to carry on the war are likewise bought and sent over.

England, by reason of her great wealth, in this way has made loans to many of the people elsewhere. And, generally speaking, not exactly loans, but they invest in stocks and become themselves the owners of the foreign properties. A few years ago we were importing more than we were exporting. All arising out of the fact that foreigners were taking stock in our railroads then being built. Now they are receiving their dividends by an excess of exports being sent them by us.

By reason of these investments England sent for long years more exports than she brought home imports. Now, by reason of the payment of interest and of dividends, and of the receipt of incomes from foreign properties, she is importing largely more than she is exporting. Since 1871 her imports have exceeded her exports more than $400,000,000 per annum, and yet, in the face of all this, she has during the same period of time imported more gold and silver than she has exported by more than $100,000,000, or an average of more than $5,000,000 per annum.

I mention this because the great idea of business with many people is to sell, and sell for money only; take nothing in exchange but money. Confine trade to such narrow limits and it is gone; it comes to a dead standstill. The history of trading between all nations shows that countries that do not produce the precious metals, gold and silver, and countries that produce less of these metals than their proportionate part based upon their wants, needs, and capabilities, as compared with the wants, needs, and capabilities of other countries, always import more gold and silver than they export, while countries that produce more of these metals than their proportionate part, considering their wants, needs and capabilities, always export more than they import. The United States, prior to 1849, the date of its becoming a precious-metal-producing country, imported more than she exported, while since she has exported very much more than she has imported. To give exact figures—taken from the American Almanac—the United States, for the twenty-five years ending June 30, 1849—

Imported (gold and silver)		$258,820,276
Re-exported (foreign)	$165,565,529
Exported (domestic)	24,300,529
Total exported		189,865,058
Excess of imports (twenty-five years)		68,955,218

Excess averaging more than two and three-fourths millions per annum.

From June 30, 1849, to June 30, 1887, we imported gold and silver		$937,450,431
Re-exported (foreign)	$322,541,197
Exported (domestic)	1,818,631,834
Total exported		2,141,173,031
Deduct total imports		937,450,431
Excess of exports		1,203,722,600
Average annual exports		56,346,658
Average annual imports		24,669,748
Average annual excess of exports		31,676,910

I present these figures simply to show, if we are capable of producing large quantities of "stuff" that might be sold abroad but we refuse to so sell unless we are paid money, we are simply shutting the doors of commerce in our own face. The fact is that we are producing more than 30 per cent. of all the gold produced in the world and more than 40 per cent. of all the silver so produced—from seventy to one hundred million of dollars per annum out of about two hundred millions. What we do not produce is mostly produced in Australia, Mexico, and the South American countries. The European countries, countries in which we find the most and best market for our surplus, are not money-producing countries, and consequently are unable to buy with money. This makes it impossible to sell to them for money. They are money-importing and not money-exporting countries. The fact that we produce such a large per cent. of the gold and silver produced in the world makes it impossible for us to import more gold and silver than we export. The inevitable laws of trade decree otherwise. For short seasons, sometimes for two or three years at a time, this rule may be reversed, but it will later on average itself up. You had just as well try to dam up the Mississippi River at flood-tide with the grasses that vegetate upon its banks as to change the current of this natural law. If, therefore, we would sell our products abroad we must not be afraid of buying from abroad, because the only thing with which most foreigners can buy is with the product of their labor.

I have taken from pages 110 and 314 of the American Almanac certain figures from which I have formed the table marked Table A and made a part of my remarks. In said table is shown in one column the amount of money, gold and silver, in most all the countries of the world, and in another column the imports of said countries for the period of one year. By comparing these two columns together it will be seen that with the exception of Japan, British India, Spain, France, Mexico, and Portugal not a single one of the rest could buy at the rate they bought for the year reported for a whole year if compelled to buy with money only. The money—

	Months.
In Germany would last her	7
In Belgium	5½
In Great Britain and Ireland	5
In Italy	5

In all others less than five months, aside from those above excepted. And in those the money would last longer simply because they do not buy so much. Japan especially is a very exclusive government, never exactly fencing herself in by walls like China, but almost as exclusive in her intercourse with others.

The following is Table A, to which I have referred.

TABLE A.

Name of country.	Amount of imports.	Amount of gold and silver.	Amount of gold and silver per capita.
Argentine Republic	$117,123,120	$9,000,000	$3.54
Australasia	298,663,465	70,000,000	25.01

Our best market is England, to which we sell more than 50 per cent. of our exports; to Germany, France, Belgium, and other European countries fully 30 per cent. of the other 50. Yet there are men on this floor following the lead of the Plumed Knight, who would break down our trade with these countries, and at the expense of so doing make strained efforts at reciprocity treaties with South American and other new countries, so as to enable their constituents to exchange their manufactured products for the agricultural products of such new countries.

All that portion of our people who produce that which will sell, not only in our own markets, but in the markets of other countries, are interested in removing all obstacles that shackle commerce and trade. If we have those among us who produce that which can not be sold abroad, ay, that which in the open markets at home can not even stand the competition of foreign goods, they are of course interested in placing obstructions in the way of competition from abroad. So at last it depends altogether on where we live, and in what business we are engaged, whether in Pennsylvania or Indiana, in a locality that must needs beg quarter for their goods or in a locality that sends its goods into the broad markets to compete with everybody, as to whether we are interested in fettering trade. If that which Indianians have for sale can stand the competition not only at home but abroad, she wants an open field.

If that which certain individuals in Pennsylvania produce can not compete abroad, nor even at home, without fettering commerce, those individuals are of course interested in fettering commerce.

If we would sell to England, France, Germany, Belgium, and other European countries, we must make them able to buy. In the very nature of things they can not buy with money. They use gold and silver in the fine arts, and then there are "wear and tear" in that they have. Not being precious-metal-producing countries, they are compelled to buy their money.

In the fine arts gold and silver are used in making watches, jewelry, plated ware, and many other things. Pages 78 and 79 of the report of the Director of our own Mint shows that in 1885 we used in the fine arts $11,152,120 of gold and $5,198,413 of silver. Some years we use as much as $20,000,000. The loss annually of gold and silver by friction and by use in the fine arts is almost equal to the annual output of all the mines of the world. The increase of output does not more than keep pace with the increase of wealth, population, and of business necessities. An unusual output has more of a tendency to go into the fine arts than to swell circulation.

My distinguished colleague, who has so long and so ably represented the Sixth Indiana district upon this floor [Mr. BROWNE], told us a few days ago that "free trade is only safe between nations having equal industrial conditions. The nation possessing industrial advantages always destroys or cripples the trade of its weaker and less fortunate rival." In my judgment the industrial conditions in our own country are inferior to none, and on his own theory we ought to court free trade with every nation, but I deny that free trade with each other hurts either, so long as the weaker is not yoked to the stronger, and compelled to do its trading there. If there be other places with which it can trade and is denied that right and compelled to trade with the stronger, then the stronger puts the weaker to the wall. What is true between nations is equally true between States. The mere fact of the jurisdictional line dividing the two being in the one case a line between nations wholly separate and independent of each other, or a line between States only partially separate and independent of each other, makes no sort of difference whatever.

Pennsylvania possesses superior advantages to Indiana in some things—coal and iron ore—and may be said to possess superior industrial advantages, and by reason thereof to be the superior of Indiana in "industrial relations." The fact that free trade exists between Pennsylvania and Indiana hurts neither, but it is the yoking of Indiana to Pennsylvania and compelling Indiana to buy Pennsylvania's iron, instead of allowing Indiana the unobstructed privilege of buying elsewhere. Pennsylvania has iron ore, coal, timber, good soil, and substantially everything we have in Indiana, her coal and iron ore being of a superior quality and more cheaply mined, and because of this far surpasses Indiana in her ability to make cheap iron, and she is the equal of Indiana in all the other items. Such being the case, she comes to Indiana and says:

"Let us form a compact; let's develop our resources and diversify our industries. If you will agree to pay us a little more for iron than you can buy it of England, that will enable us successfully to go into the business and develop the trade. But after being developed you must still continue to buy our iron."

Indiana says: "Well, you buy our wheat, beef, pork, and agricultural implements, and we will do it."

"Oh," says Pennsylvania, "we can't do that. We can raise all the wheat, beef, and pork, and make all the agricultural implements we want."

"Well," says Indiana, "unless you take our wheat, our beef, our pork, and our agricultural implements we will not have anything with which to pay you."

"Never mind, never mind," says Pennsylvania. "You sell your wheat, your beef, your pork, and agricultural implements to the fellows in Europe for money; this will enable you to pay us money."

"Yes," but says Indiana "those fellows in Europe, I am afraid, have no money; I understand they have none, but plenty of labor to produce the iron, and you know at last it is simply swapping labor."

"Oh, oh, oh, come," says Pennsylvania, "I see you don't understand this question. The fellows in Europe can sell their iron some place else and get the money."

"But," retorts Indiana, "where is she going to find a market for her iron?"

"Oh, pshaw!" says Pennsylvania, "that don't make any difference. She will find some place. Give yourself no trouble about that. Come, come; we will pile up the money here at home; that is what we are after. It will do us all good. We are ready to do the fair thing."

Yes, the proposition of the white man to the Indian to divide the game was equally fair when he said, "I will take the turkey and you may have the buzzard, or you may have the buzzard and I will take the turkey."

And here is the unequal contest to which the gentleman of pig-iron fame from Pennsylvania invites my colleague [Mr. BROWNE], whose district is an agricultural district and also a manufacturing district, but manufactures only that which will stand competition, not only at home, but also from abroad. The clever, whole-souled, good fellow that my colleague is, because of his enthusiasm on the subject of diversifying our industries and making our country great, walks right up to the yoke made to work on him, and allows his Pennsylvania friend to place it upon his neck, and then, like a dumb driven ox, submits to its galling influence.

My distinguished colleague further says:

The intelligent farmer knows that the policy that gives the country an extended and diversified industry is beneficial to him.

Yes, when the Revolutionary war closed and we became a separate and independent power on the face of the earth, the thirteen colonies, with the territory ceded therewith, aggregated about 800,000 square miles. Soon thereafter, in 1803, that far-seeing statesman, Thomas Jefferson, made the famous Louisiana purchase, by which we acquired 800,000 miles more of territory, thus enlarging our opportunities for extending and diversifying our industries.

In 1819 we took in Florida with 60,000 square miles adapted to orange culture, by which our industries were extended and diversified. Again in 1845, Texas with her 265,000 square miles became an easy acquisition; then by the Ashburton treaty our claim to the Oregon territory with its 310,000 square miles was acquiesced in—both largely extending our ability to diversify our industries. Then, as a result of the Mexican war the Rocky and trans-Rocky Mountain country, with its auriferous and argentiferous products came to us, containing over 500,000 more square miles of territory. Then New Mexico with its 56,000 square miles was purchased. Here was cheap land, and that gave us not only gold and silver, but cheap wool; then came Alaska giving us the seal fisheries, etc. But what more benefit was all this than it would have been under a foreign government, with the privilege granted and permanently secured to us of free ingress and egress and right to occupy and own the soil and trade back and forth without let or hinderance?

If diversified industry is a thing to be acquired by legislation, then the more legislation the better. The nearer brought home to our own doors the better. Let us change our Federal Constitution and allow States to obstruct the right of its citizens to purchase from other States. Let the States so amend their constitutions as to allow counties and townships the right to obstruct the purchase of things not made within their own little narrow limits. While my people have more interests in common with the people of Pennsylvania than with Europeans, they have more interests in common with other citizens of Indiana than with the citizens of Pennsylvania; and while they have more interests in common with other citizens of Indiana than with those of Pennsylvania, they have more in common with those found within the confines of the counties in which they live, and still greater when narrowed down to township limits.

Indianians have a common interest in their State government and in the raising of funds to carry on the same. The residents of the county have the same interest, and a still further interest, in common in their own county affairs and in the raising of funds to provide for those affairs; and the citizens of the township have those same interests and also have still the further interests in common in township and municipal affairs and in the raising of funds to supply the sinews of war right at home.

We do not so much object to paying taxes for the general good of Indianians, and less to paying taxes for the general good of those residents of the county, and still less to paying taxes for the general good of those residing in our township or city. But the Lord deliver us from paying taxes to build up and diversify Pennsylvania industries, and to put shekels into the pockets of a few dozen barons rich in a few hundred furnaces. Will my distinguished friend from Indiana offer a proposition to so amend the Federal Constitution as to give States the right to collect customs duties, and invite his Pennsylvania brethren to contemplate the change?

While we are greatly interested in wishing Pennsylvania well, my people are more concerned about where they can get their iron cheaper, and still more concerned about where they can the better exchange their own labor therefor, because at last if they can not swap their labor they are unable to buy. If they can swap a dollar's worth of labor for a dollar's worth of European labor, they are not entirely satisfied to give a dollar and a half's worth of labor to Pennsylvanians for what ought to be worth only a dollar, and if they can not even swap the dollar and a half's worth to Pennsylvania for the dollar's worth, because Pennsylvania does not want and has no use for the dollar and a half's worth, they are without the means to buy.

My distinguished colleague further says:

Duties should be increased, and particularly on rye, wheat, and potatoes, cabbage and other vegetables.

If my colleague thinks he can catch any of his constituents by the soft sop of increasing the duty on wheat he has a very low estimate of their intelligence. To say that he made the statement "to supply the home demand" for correct ideas would be to say the "home demand" is more in need of protection for intelligent school-teachers to diversify their ability to teach a little common sense. Canada is the only country from which we could import wheat successfully, and ours is the only country that can export wheat successfully to Canada. We charge a duty of 20 cents a bushel against them; they charge a duty of 25 cents per bushel against us. As a revenue measure this will do, but as a measure of protection, just to keep the two peoples from trading with each other, how foolish. Each country raises a surplus and that surplus finds a market in Europe. While my colleague from Indiana would protect rye, wheat, cabbage and other vegetables, other gentlemen would protect lumber, coal, iron ore, etc. The tariff on these things is not and never was a protective tariff. On these articles it is and always was a revenue tariff only.

My colleague quotes from Mr. Converse to show that successful military campaigns can not be carried on without woolen clothes for soldiers.

Ay, there is your key-note, and is the only point in the whole line of argument in favor of protection; the only argument that has any pretense of merit, in suffering taxation for the purpose of diversifying industries. If it is war we are preparing for, that is unquestionably a good argument; and especially if putting wool on the free-list is to annihilate the sheep. "In time of peace prepare for war," is an adage that found its way into the literature of the world when "war" was the rule and "peace" the exception.

In a greatly modified degree that adage still has some force in some of the European countries. With us it has no force, because with our surroundings and prospects "peace" may be regarded as the rule and "war" as the exception. To tax ourselves heavily for wool and the prime necessities of life with so little prospect of war and mainly to be prepared for war is borrowing trouble too far ahead. England has higher-priced land than we have and has more sheep according to population than we have, and according to territory sixteen times as many, and yet she puts wool on the free-list. Germany and France each have higher-priced land than we have and each have six times as many sheep according to territory as we have, and yet they each put wool on the free-list. If these three first-class European powers, in close proximity to the warring nations of the world, can thus raise sheep and wool free and take the risk, why not we? My colleague further inquired why coal and iron ore were not placed on the free-list. I listened to hear, and hoped to hear him say, but he did not, that he was in favor of these materials going on that list. On account of the small value attached to coal and iron ore in comparison to the cost of transportation, whether on or off the free-list could make but little difference the one way or the other. The tariff on them is a revenue tariff and certainly not a tariff for protection. If placed on the free-list very little more would be imported than is now imported. The substantial good effect that would have grown out of it would be the effect it would have in removing the prejudice in the minds of many of our people against having anything placed on the free-list and in giving less pretense to those engaged in the protected industries for keeping up high duties.

If placed on the free list, where would we continue to get our coal? With possible rare exceptions, just where we get it now. The labor cost of mining coal and placing it on the cars is very small. If we are to rely on the information found in the second volume of Compendium of the Census of 1880, pages 1237 to 1245, inclusive, the coal mined in the United States during the census year, when mined and placed on the cars, was worth on an average all over the United States the sums of—

	Per ton.
For anthracite coal	$1.47
For bituminous coal	1.25

At some places it was worth more, and at some places less, but this was the average. Pennsylvania furnished all the anthracite and a very large part of the bituminous. The latter in—

	Per ton.
Pennsylvania was worth	$0.96
Maryland	1.15
West Virginia	1.15

Of the 42,000,000 tons mined during the census year 22,000,000 tons were mined in those three States. Taking the whole country on an average and the labor cost for mining was—

	Per ton.
For anthracite coal	$0.79
Bituminous	.78

But in Pennsylvania the labor cost was only 61 cents per ton for bituminous, and but little more in Maryland, West Virginia, and in many of the other States. So that the labor cost was small, and it is smaller to-day.

When carried to market the cost is greatly increased, not by labor, but by transportation, the extent of increase depending on distance of transportation. At the little city where I live when at home coal, and that of a superior quality, can be and is put on the cars for about $1 per ton. It is started East, West, North, and South, paying heavy freights on short hauls and from a half to three-fourths of a cent per ton per mile for long hauls. When it gets 100 miles off at a half a cent per ton 50 cents per ton are added for freight, and at three-quarters 75 cents per ton, and so it increases as it gets farther from home. It gets as far East as Cincinnati, as far West as St. Louis, as far South as Evansville, and as far North as Chicago. When it reaches the latter place, which is the most distant, being 258 miles, its chief cost is the cost of transportation. When it gets to Chicago it finds no competition from the pauper labor of Europe, but it finds the most nipping and close competition from the labor-producing coal coming from Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, and competition possibly not so nipping of other railroads leading into Chicago, but such as to require it, when it gets there, to be thrown upon the market at $2.50 per ton.

If when it got there it would bring $3.50 per ton, every person who has ever done business with railroads knows that the freight would be just $1 per ton more. Railroads always make the rate so as to cover all margins. But leaving out of view the extra dollar, let us sum up the cost of transportation. Twenty flat cars carrying twenty or more tons each make a fair train-load; then:

20 flat cars, 20 tons each, 400 tons, $2.50		$1,000.00
Labor cost 400 tons, 60 cents per ton	$240.00
Capital cost to mine owners, 40 cents per ton	160.00
1 conductor 2 days, $5	10.00
1 engineer 2 days, $4	8.00
1 fireman 2 days, $3	6.00
2 brakemen 2 days each, $1.50	6.00
Total labor cost		430.00
Other cost of transportation		570.00

Now, I imagine an intelligent coal-miner of my town becoming nervous for fear coal on the free-list would so cheapen the article that the railroad company would be forced to do its work cheaper or go out of the business.

For the purpose of further elucidating this coal matter, I looked up, that I might examine the question thoroughly, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the year ending June 30, 1887, on commerce and navigation. I was specially led to do this because I received a circular from some coal-men in Southwest Virginia. I presume a copy of the same circular was sent to all the other members of this House. These fellows down in Virginia claimed they were 360 miles from the nearest part of New England. They set up a terrible wail about their woe-begone condition in the event coal went on the free-list. They imagined they would go to the demnition bow-wows without the benefit of clergy. They could not stand the competition of Nova Scotia coal. All New England would get their coal from Nova Scotia. I first looked on the map. I found Pennsylvania with her cheap coal and cheap labor much nearer than Virginia. I next looked up Nova Scotia to see what manner of beast it was thus voraciously to "chaw" up these West Virginia people. When I found Nova Scotia I discovered her population equal to that of about two Congressional districts, mostly engaged in agriculture, and the balance in the fisheries. I then asked a Connecticut man—a Democrat, of course—where they got their coal. He answered, "Pennsylvania." I said, "I thought you got, or, if the duty was taken off, could get, your coal from Nova Scotia." He said, "Pshaw! the Nova Scotia coal is no good." "What kind is it?" said I. "A sort of rotten, semi-bituminous stuff. For manufacturing purposes it might do to mix with other coal. For domestic purposes no one would have it."

I then turned to look up our foreign coal trade. I got the report on commerce and navigation, to which I have already alluded. I turned about to its several tables and found all the coal imported and exported for the year ending June 30, 1887; wherefrom imported and whereto exported. The following is a statement of the same:

In 1887 we imported coal from—

British Columbia	$1,081,[illegible]
Australia	921,[illegible]
Scotland and Ireland	633,[illegible]
Nova Scotia	14,[illegible]
Canada	23,[illegible]
England	2[illegible]
All other countries	6,[illegible]
Total imports of coal	2,713,[illegible]

We exported to—

Canada	$3,[illegible]
Nova Scotia	2,[illegible]
Newfoundland and Labrador	[illegible]
Cuba	[illegible]
United States of Colombia (South America)	[illegible]
Mexico	[illegible]
England	[illegible]
British West Indies	[illegible]
Danish West Indies	[illegible]
French West Indies	[illegible]
Dutch West Indies	[illegible]
France	[illegible]
Germany	[illegible]
Hawaiian Islands	[illegible]
Venezuela	[illegible]
Porto Rico	[illegible]
All other countries	[illegible]
Total	4,[illegible]

From the above table it will be seen that the coal imported came mainly from Australia, British Columbia, Scotland, and Ireland. That coming from Australia and British Columbia was landed at San Francisco and Wilmington, Cal.; and when it reached those ports it sold at more than twice what our Indiana coal will sell for at Chicago, and this after deducting the 75 cents per ton tariff. That coming from Ireland and Scotland came as ballast—"a ground-hog matter." In fact, the coal imported and exported, except that imported into California and that exported to Canada and Nova Scotia was carried as ballast.

But what astonished me most was to find so large an amount exported and sold to Canada. Little Canada about supplied her full consumptive demand from us, and that in view of the dangerous and unobstructed proximity to Nova Scotia coal. Of that exported to Canada the anthracite was sold for $4.15 per ton, the bituminous for $2.65 per ton. A moment's reflection, with a mere modicum of common sense, would readily convince any one that coal on the free-list would not enable Nova Scotia to compete with our own coal people. Enough on the coal subject at present. I shall want to recur to the subject further on in my remarks, in connection with the manufacture of pig-iron.

During the present session of Congress to the present time almost every mail has brought me some circular on the subject of the tariff, so many, in fact, that I could not read them. I presume other members of the House have been afflicted in the same way. Generally speaking, they came from interested parties or parties who thought they were interested. Occasionally one came from a professional crank, who felt that he owed it as a duty to his country to enlighten members of Congress on the all-absorbing question. Among these circulars (not from the cranks, but the others) for weeks early in the session petitions poured in from California, Oregon, and Washington Territory by the basketful protesting against placing lumber on the free-list or disturbing the duty thereon.

Lumber on the free-list, if you were to believe the wail set up by them, and all the industries on the Pacific Slope were ruined. A receiver would have to be appointed. Bankruptcy was inevitable. The cheap labor of British Columbia would annihilate the lumber business in all that Western country. About the time the coming of these petitions had reached a white heat, a grave and reverend seignior—Senator DOLPH, from Oregon—broke forth in the other end of the Capitol, chiming in with the lumber interests of that far-off country. But in his speech he cited the fact that from Puget Sound, in Washington Territory, last year there were shipped to China, Hong-Kong, the Hawaiian Islands, and other foreign countries, 103,000,000 feet of lumber, five times as much as the whole output of British Columbia, and he stated that he had no doubt that his own State—Oregon—had done as much, but confessed he had no figures as to his own State.

All this in the very teeth of the even-handed competition from British Columbia and the cheap labor of that sparsely settled province. Lumber chopped and made ready for market by Chinese cheap labor, which it was bemoaningly suggested would be imported into that "neck of woods" to do cheap work. The idea of a California timber-owner complaining about Chinese cheap labor in British Columbia when California had one hundred times as many Chinamen as had British Columbia, and when the average lumber-owner of California had been lying awake of nights scheming in his own mind how to utilize the cheap labor of China for nothing. Talk about borrowing trouble. The thought that troubled the old maid past three-score and ten to such an extent that it brought tears to her eyes and grief to her heart is nowhere.

Not only from the grave and reverend seignior of the other end of the Capitol, but from the honorable Representative from the Sixteenth Pennsylvania, come lamentations on the lumber question. He says:

> Remove the duty from lumber and you immediately bring the hemlock and spruce and lower grades of pine of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and the Canadas into direct and ruinous competition with the low grades of pine everywhere used for the same purposes as the hemlock and spruce, and particularly with the pine of Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia, and Florida. Following upon such action the mills will close, the laborer be thrown out of employment.

Mr. MCCORMICK tells us that—

> Reasonably accurate estimates fix the amount of hemlock in his district at 50,000,000,000 feet.

I was in hopes that Pennsylvania would give us a rest, but it seems she has a monopoly, not only of cheap methods for iron making, but that she has millions of other cheap things that she wants to make high by closing the doors against all her competitors. Now, when we begin to need a wider field in which to buy our lumber, the lords rich in a few million acres of cheap wood lands, lands which the good Lord above gave, we find the monster monopoly intrenching itself behind its ancient bulwarks. Away with such supreme selfishness! Down with all such monopoly!

The idea, the Government paying the homesteaders out West a bonus for growing trees; and by our tariffs on lumber paying a bonus for destroying trees. Sirs, lumber ought to go on the free-list; coal ought to go on the free-list; iron ore ought to go.

Mr. BAYNE. How about sugar?

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. I will tell you about sugar. I would like to see sugar go on the free-list, and I think it ought to go there; but I have said that I am willing to place the tariff high enough to enable our people to succeed in their efforts at competition. Sugar has about the hardest struggle to compete of any of our industries, and without protection would possibly go to the wall. The tariff on lumber, on coal, and on iron ore is not at all necessary to enable our people to compete. These industries will all flourish whether on the free-list or not. The reason I would like to see sugar go on the free-list is because I believe it would give us cheaper sugar. The gentleman from Pittsburgh, if I understand him, does not believe that reducing the tariff lessens the price of the protected article. If I thought as does the gentleman, I would favor keeping the duty intact on sugar, because it gives us a large revenue. The duty, however, by the Mills bill is reduced on sugar more than it is on pig-iron. And I know full well, and shall demonstrate before I get through, that Pennsylvania, with her cheap coal and cheap iron ore can, without any tariff, make pig-iron in competition with England or any other country.

Time is passing, Mr. Chairman, and it is about time I was beginning to get serious. We must protect our labor. Ay, yes, there is the rub. But who are our laborers that need protection? Our farmers? No, you can not protect them, for they are compelled as a matter of dire necessity to sell their products wherever the sun shines, the rain falls, or man eats, and stand all competition. The farmers constitute 44 and a fraction out of every 100 of our working people. Our trade and transportation people, consisting of merchants, clerks, railroaders, teamsters, etc.? No, their vocations can not be taken from them by Europeans so long as Europeans keep away from our jurisdictions. These constitute 11 and a fraction out of every 100 of our working people. Our professional and personal-service people, consisting of lawyers, doctors, preachers, school-teachers, theatrical performers, real-estate and insurance agents, barbers, hotel-keepers, livery-stable keepers, washerwomen, State, county, city, and Federal officers, including postmasters, 'squires, country constables, Congressmen, et id genus omne? No, not these, thank God; the pauper labor of Europe does not disturb the equilibrium of our minds, the honorable gentlemen upon the other side of the House not excepted. We constitute 22 and a fraction out of every 100 of our people. Not our coal miners; unless by tariff revision they be let down some back stairway in the dark, they are secure. Not our copper mining and copper manufacturing people for they can send their goods abroad and stand right on the battlements of the enemy's intrenchments and auction off their goods before the very eyes of the enemy. Surely not the few thousand of our people engaged in the petroleum business. The products of these laborers sell as readily in Europe as here. Besides, the Standard Oil fellows smell so badly that even protectionists are wishing them all sorts of bad luck. The sweet rains from heaven would fail to remove the odor of their business. Surely not our silver and gold mining people, for the good Lord in His infinite wisdom and goodness did not give the European people any gold and silver to work in. But, finally, what portion of our manufacturing people need protection from the baleful influences of competition with the pauper labor of Europe? Let us inquire. Not our printers or newspaper men; not our carpenters, brick or stone masons, plasterers, painters, plumbers, paper-hangers, or any one connected with house-building or house-repairing—paupers in Europe, with all their meanness, have never attempted to build a house and send it over here, nor have any of our people sent a house over there to get repaired; our milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, tailors, and tailoresses—these have to reside here; not our bakers, our butchers, our grist-mill employés, our quarry men, our brick and tile makers, our blacksmiths, car-shop and foundry men, boot or shoe makers, saddle and harness makers, tanners, curriers, and all others working in leather—we can beat the world in leather, if you will only leave out kid gloves: six employés in a first-class establishment can make a $7 pair of boots in ten minutes by the watch; not our planing-mill men, sash, doors, and blinds factory men, wood-choppers, wood-turners, loggers, raftsmen, saw-mill men, furniture makers, coopers, and all others engaged in working wood, because we took out a patent on this business after England, Germany, France, and other first-class European powers lost their trees; nor those engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements, numbering over 39,000 (although, by mistake, the President, in his annual message designated them as numbering only 4,891), and those engaged in making wagons and carriages, numbering over 45,000. And right here let me pause to remark, parenthetically of course: the largest wagon-manufacturing establishment in the world is in my own State—Indiana. The Studebakers, at South Bend, Ind., make more, better, and cheaper wagons than are made anywhere else in the world. And not only make, but ship their wagons to all parts of the world and sell them in competition with wagons made in the cheap-labor districts of Europe. If they were given the privilege of buying their iron and steel cheaper (in the making of agricultural implements the iron and steel used in their making costs more than the labor of the employés engaged therein), and a few other things used by them, but which are made higher by tariff duties, they could still more easily sell their wagons abroad.

Our agricultural implements are among the best and sell abroad in South America, Australia, and in most of the countries of Europe. Although sold in Europe cheaper than they are sold here at home, still at a good profit nevertheless. Our sewing-machines (the labor cost of making one is only from $4 to $6) are also sold in Europe, and nowhere so much as in England, Germany, and France, England leading all other countries. England with her free trade is not only our best customer in the purchase of our agricultural products, but she buys more of our manufactured products than any other country of the world. The people of that country may be pig-headed, but they understand their own best interests. With her highest-priced labor of any country in Europe she has no trouble in competing with the cheaper labor of France, Germany, Italy, and Belgium, and with the country possessing the cheapest labor she competes the easiest and most successful.

But let us revert to the proposition, what portion of our labor, if any, needs protection? And how much does it need? My distinguished colleague from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] incidentally mentions them as those engaged in manufacturing iron and steel, cottons, woolens, hemp, leather, silks, earthenware, china, glass and glassware, and paper. About eight hundred thousand in all, or less than 5 per cent. of our laboring people. I assure him he could, with the utmost safety, have left out those working in leather. My own best judgment is that most if not all those named by my colleague need but very little protection, and that most if not all the protection given them only benefits the less than ten thousand employers under and for whom these less than eight hundred thousand laborers are working. These ten thousand employers constitute less than one out of fifteen hundred of our people. Certainly all pretended protection given them, beyond what is necessary to protect and enable them to continue their occupations without greater disturbance from foreign labor is an injury and not a benefit to their employés. To prove that fact shall be my effort to show, because if the wages of these employés are kept up to the same standard and as much employment given them under a reduction of the tariff they would be benefited.

I maintain that all reductions made that do not have the effect of crippling those carrying on manufacturing industries will, to the extent that it cheapens goods, cause a greater consumption of the goods, thereby creating additional demand for them and for the labor that produces them, and, as a consequence, greatly benefit employés by increasing the demand for their work by giving them cheaper things enable them to consume more and live better. Where the materials used, which constitute a chief part of the cost, can be obtained as cheaply here as in Europe, to the extent these materials enter into as a factor or element of cost no protection is needed, and where not needed should not and really can not be given. If given, it only operates to create monopoly.

Of the protected industries iron and steel, cotton goods and woolen goods are the most important, and of these iron and steel stand at the head and front of all the offending. Iron and steel enter not only into our private wants, but become a great factor in our public improvements—in fact are the mudsills upon which the substratum of our railroads and many other improvements, both public and private, are built.

Clothes only last a short time and have to be renewed often. Iron and steel last for years and need renewals less frequently. Clothing though of prime and most necessary importance is but a temporary investment. Iron and steel become a sort of continuous investment.

Ten dollars per ton on steel rails saves a thousand dollars per mile for every mile of railroad built, to say nothing of side tracks. Ten dollars per ton on iron saves almost as much more in the cost of rolling-stock, bridges, and other appurtenances to railroads. Two thousand dollars per mile is a big sum in the building of railroads, and if it could be saved more, many more, miles of railroad would be built, giving additional employment to labor. Freight and passenger tariffs would be greatly reduced. The people interested in the use of roads, in cheaper freights and passenger tariffs, would save the interest on two thousand dollars per mile in their continuous use.

Last year we built 13,000 miles of railroad. Two thousand dollars per mile would have been $26,000,000. That sum and the interest thereon become a vast sum. But railroads are not the only things which interest us in cheap iron and steel. Cheapen the machinery in our grist-mills, saw-mills, planing-mills, woolen-mills, cotton-mills, and the machinery in all our manufacturing establishments of every kind, wherever used, and our manufacturers can turn out cheaper goods of all kinds, because they need not lay aside so much of the earnings to cover interest. This will greatly cheapen the manufacturing plant and better enable our capital to compete with European capital.

That we can make pig-iron and steel rails almost as cheap, if not fully as cheap, as they can be made in England or elsewhere, any one who will take the pains to investigate, from a common-sense standpoint, may and can easily satisfy himself.

He who imagines that the per diem wages paid cut much figure in the cost of iron, steel, cotton, or woolen goods will readily become convinced of his mistake by a little common-sense investigation.

The cheapness of material, the effectiveness of labor, and surrounding conditions are far more important factors.

To prove this let facts be submitted. I will first take up pig-iron that being the substratum of all iron and steel values. The chief element of cost in making pig-iron is the cost of the iron ore and the fuel. These are as cheap in this country as they are in Europe; in fact, in places in this country, cheaper. Our census reports (see volume 2, Compendium 1880, pages 1237 to 1243, inclusive) show that the value of the anthracite coal (mined only in Pennsylvania) mined during the census year was worth $1.47 per ton, and of this value 79 cents were for labor cost; that the bituminous coal mined—averaging the whole United States over—was worth $1.25 per ton, and that the labor cost for mining was 78 cents per ton; that while such was the average value all over the United States, in Western Pennsylvania its value was 96 cents per ton, and the labor cost for mining 61 cents per ton. In Clearfield, Bradford, and Tioga Counties, Pennsylvania, it was worth $1.24 per ton, but the labor cost for mining, only 58 cents. In Maryland, $1.15 per ton, but only 61 cents labor cost for mining.

The report of the chief of the bureau of statistics of Pennsylvania, made in 1885 for the year 1884, shows that during that year (1884) the labor cost in Allegheny, Clearfield, Fayette, and Westmoreland Counties, where more than 16,000,000 tons of coal were mined, was but 48½ cents per ton. Allowing 25 cents per ton for the labor of converting about a fourth of the coal into coke. The labor cost of mining iron ore in Berks, Blair, Centre, Chester, Clarion, Cumberland, Huntingdon, Bedford, Lancaster, Lebanon, Lehigh, Northampton, Perry, and Snyder Counties, in that State, was, on an average, 69 cents per ton, while in Lebanon County 392,941 tons were mined by one hundred and sixty-five men, working three hundred days each, at a labor cost of only 17 cents per ton, each hand averaging over 7 tons per day. Think of it! Just like shoveling sand out of a sand-pit. Plenty of just such places can be found in the United States.

Now, during the census year ending June 30, 1880 (see volume 2, Compendium, pages 1138 to 1141, inclusive), there was invested in blast-furnaces in the United States $105,151,176. All these were not in operation, but such as were turned out 3,787,021 tons of pig-iron, valued at $89,315,569.

For the purpose of getting at the surrounding conditions, which, I have stated, is a chief and all-important factor of cost in the production of pig-iron, I have, from data found in volume 2, pages 1138 to 1141, Compendium 1880, formulated the following table, showing the number of blast-furnaces in the United States, in what State located, aggregate number of tons and stated values per ton of materials used, and quantity and value of product made.

* Uses other fuel. † Uses charcoal. ‡ Not reported.

In addition to the material disclosed in the above table there was used—

53,909,828 bushels of charcoal, valued at	$3,679,120
3,169,149 tons of fluxing material, valued at	2,547,336
Other material, kind not designated, valued at	910,667
Making the aggregate stated value of these materials	7,137,113

Now, by scanning over this table, we find iron ore, taking the average all over the United States, valued at $4.58 per ton, and ranging all the way from 97 cents per ton in Alabama up to $7.71 per ton in Vermont; bituminous coal averaging all over the United States at $1.99, and ranging all the way from $1.13 per ton in Tennessee to $3.26 per ton in Wisconsin; anthracite coal averaging all over the United States at $3.88 per ton, and ranging from $2.91 in Pennsylvania to $5.74 per ton in Wisconsin, and coke averaging all over the United States at $3.88 per ton and ranging in value from $2.45 per ton in Tennessee to $6.15 in Illinois. Think of it, my friends. Think of it ye who labor and are heavy laden. Iron ore at $4.60 per ton, bituminous coal at $2.41 per ton, anthracite coal at $2.91 per ton, coke at $3.37 per ton. What a commentary on the loving kindness of the good people, among whom are the meek and lowly miners getting about 15, possibly 20 per cent. of these values for their labor while speculation and transportation are getting the balance. Shame on such protection.

Now, let us see who is benefited by these prices. How much product—$89,315,569; and in what does its value consist. Let us see:

7,256,684 tons iron ore at $4.58 per ton	$33,205,278
1,057,753 tons soft coal at $1.99 per ton	2,095,887
2,615,182 tons hard coal at $3.88 per ton	8,012,755
2,128,255 tons coke coal at $3.80 per ton	8,129,240
53,909,828 bushels charcoal	3,679,120
Fluxing material	2,547,336
Other material	910,667
Total cost materials	58,580,283
Labor cost making 3,787,021 tons of pig-iron at $3.35 per ton	12,680,703
Total	71,260,986
Profit to capital	18,054,583
	89,315,569

Now let us proceed to make reasonable allowances and draw our deductions.

Ten per cent. on the capital invested ought to be enough; $2.58 per ton on the iron ore ought to be enough; $1.39 per ton for the bituminous coal ought to be enough; $1.88 per ton on the anthracite coal ought to be enough; $2.36 per ton on the coke ought to be enough. Every one familiar with the values of these materials knows that I have allowed enough. Those not familiar should refer to pages 1237 to 1243, volume 2, Compendium Census, and to pages 83 and 93 of the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of Pennsylvania. On the fluxing material, charcoal, and other material, valued at over $7,000,000, I have no data from which to estimate. Hence I shall leave them unassailed, although I have no doubt these should stand their pro rata share of discounts.

This enables us to deduct from the capital all above 10 per cent. on the amount invested.

	Per ton.
On the iron ore all above	$2.58
On the soft coal all above	1.39
On the hard coal all above	1.88
On the coke all above	2.36

Let us proceed accordingly.

Profit on capital	$18,309,691

The amount of pig-iron made was 3,781,021 tons, which divided into $29,196,030 makes $7.75 per ton on the pig-iron, and at that time the tariff was only $7 per ton; more than enough to offset the tariff, to say nothing of ocean freights. Now, sirs, without invading the alleged value of over $7,000,000 worth of charcoal, fluxing and other material, I have eliminated more from the cost of the pig-iron than the whole tariff, and left enough to cover reasonable profits to capital and an abundance to pay for transportation at reasonable prices. My friend from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] says that capital can not work as cheap in this country as in Europe. It never will unless forced to do so; when forced to do so it will be found as full of activity here as any place in the world, and will adapt itself to the necessities. Necessity is the mother of invention. Capital will not be long in devising methods to meet the requirements, while the labor in these industries will command and receive what is established by the standard paid to other labor. Ninety-five per cent. of our people are working in other industries, and the price paid these, they being the bulk, will regulate and control the price paid the few. That labor is usually paid most which is most difficult and unpleasant to perform.

Mr. BAYNE. The question I desired to ask the gentleman was, how the 70 per cent. duty on sugar proposed by the Mills bill suits him?

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. I understand the Mills bill reduces the duty on sugar 20 per cent.

Mr. BAYNE. But 70 per cent. is a very high rate.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. Yes, sir, it is very high, but the reduction is considerably greater than the reduction on pig-iron. Our conditions, sir, for raising sugar in this country are not good on account of being too much subject to loss by overflow every two or three years and by frost every two or three years. For these reasons I regard it as impolitic to try to compete with Cuba and other more favored countries. The margins for sugar-raising are small, but considerable capital is invested in the sugar industry. It has not been thought proper by any reductions made by the Mills bill to destroy any industry. Our conditions for making cheap iron in this country are as good as they are any place in the world. Considering the large margins in the profits on iron making, I regard the reduction from $6.72 to $6 on pig-iron as a much smaller reduction than the 20 per cent. reduction on sugar. We import nine-tenths of our sugar and produce but one-tenth. The duty goes into the Treasury. The duty, high as it has been and high as it is left, has not enabled any of our people to make a monopoly of furnishing us sugar.

We produce nine-tenths of the iron and steel consumed by us, and import only about one-tenth. The duty on the one-tenth goes into the Treasury while the increased price on nine-tenths goes into the pockets of our iron-mongers, among whom a large portion are constituents of the gentleman.

The large margin given by the duties on iron has created a monopoly and enables the iron men to limit the output and run up the price at times to the full limit of the margin given by the duty. The iron monopolists can better afford to suffer an importation of one-tenth of all we use than to lose nine-tenths of their profits.

Mr. BAYNE. The gentleman's proposition strikes me as strange logic.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. I am not surprised that anything should strike the gentleman as strange which proposes to reduce the tariff on pig-iron.

Mr. BAYNE. But if $6.72 per ton is paid on pig-iron that goes into the Treasury.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. It does so far as imported pig-iron is concerned, but as to the pig-iron produced in the neighborhood of Pittsburgh it goes into the pockets of the manufacturer of pig-iron.

Mr. BAYNE. But if $6.72 per ton is paid on pig-iron, that $6.72 goes into the Treasury.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. So far as imported pig-iron is concerned it does; but if the gentleman will study the figures already given and another statement I have prepared especially for his edification, if he has not already a part of the pork in his pocket, he will see where the $6.72 per ton on the pig-iron made in and about Pittsburgh goes or has gone. The facts from which I make this statement I find in volume 2, Compendium Census 1880, pages 1138, 1139, 1140, and 1141. In this book and upon these pages I find that during the census year in the whole State of Pennsylvania there was invested in blast furnaces $44,596,850. I find she made 1,930,311 tons of pig-iron, valued at $23.55 per ton, or in the aggregate at the sum of $45,573,750. To make this pig-iron she paid—

For labor ($2.46 per ton)	$4,752,828
For materials	29,675,075
Making the alleged cost	34,427,903
Leaving for profit only	11,145,847

But does any one believe the materials cost or were worth any such sum? Let us see. Of what did those materials consist? The following is an inventory, namely:

3,838,455 tons iron ore at $4.60 per ton	$17,720,502
1,921,588 tons hard coal, at $2.91 per ton	5,631,922
215,588 tons soft coal, at $2.41 per ton	579,768
1,054,452 tons coke, at $3.37 per ton	3,563,566
1,970,931 tons fluxing material	1,490,928
4,993,919 bushels charcoal	324,757
156,223 other materials not named	415,132
Aggregate	29,675,075

Having no knowledge of the value of the three last items—fluxing material, charcoal, and "other" material—we pass them over.

Our own knowledge of the value of coal, coupled with the information obtained from second volume Compendium Census 1880, pages 1237 to 1243, both inclusive, and from Legislative Document, volume 2, 1885, in which is found the report of the chief of the bureau of statistics of Pennsylvania upon the subject of the cost of mining coal and iron ore in the State of Pennsylvania, enables me to make estimates and eliminations as follows:

First profit on capital	$11,145,847
Allow 10 per cent. on capital invested	4,459,085
Amount deducted		$6,686,762
3,838,458 tons iron ore, at $4.60	$17,720,502
Allow $2.60	10,043,586
Amount deducted, $2		7,676,916
1,921,588 tons hard coal, at $2.91	$5,631,922
Allow $1.91	3,710,334
Amount deducted, $1		1,921,588
215,588 tons soft coal, at $2.41	$519,768
Allow $1.41	304,180
Amount deducted		215,588
1,054,452 tons coke, at $3.37	$3,563,566
Allow $2.37	2,509,114
Amount deducted		1,054,452
Total deductions		17,555,152

Nine dollars and nine cents per ton on the 1,930,311 tons of pig-iron made just makes the above net sum of $17,555,152. Nine dollars and nine cents is $2.37 more than your persistent $6.72. With this $2.37 we can allow $1 more per ton on your iron ore and 2 per cent. more interest on the capital invested. What does my friend from Pittsburgh have to say now?

Mr. BAYNE. If my friend will go to the iron regions of Pennsylvania I think he will find, if he can run a mill on the principle he suggests, that I would be safe in guarantying him a salary of $50,000 a year.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. I thank you. I am not in the pig-iron business. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAYNE. Such management as that might induce the gentleman to abandon politics and go into the pig-iron business.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. No, sir; I do not propose to become particeps criminis to your methods of robbery. I would like to go over into that region to teach economy and how to get an honest divide to the poor laborers who furnish the sweat and the muscle by which the large margins upon coal, iron ore, and pig-iron are made. They could well afford to pay $100,000 for a man half as smart as I am even in the pig-iron business. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. Is the gentleman aware that there are companies engaged in mining iron ore the stock of which (the par value of the share being $25) has been sold for $2,000 a share, a very considerable advance?

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. Yes, that is quite an advance—only 8,000 per cent. I am not versed in the intricacies of protection as affecting business about Pittsburgh.

Mr. SCOTT. My remark does not apply to Pittsburgh, but to the iron-ore regions of the Northwest, where the great bulk of the iron ore of the United States is produced.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. I have no doubt the gentleman's statement is correct. Although somewhat skeptical, I am prepared to believe anything relating to the combinations and trusts for keeping up the price of pig-iron.

Mr. SCOTT. I repeat the statement that in such companies shares of stock originally issued at $25 per share have been sold as high as $2,025 per share.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. Just so; and were it not that the gentleman from Pittsburgh has advertised himself so extensively, I should be surprised at the gall he exhibits in always putting in his oar, like a mousing owl, when any one mentions the subject of pig-iron.

Mr. BAYNE rose.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. If the gentleman will sit down I will give him all he wants to hear.

Mr. BAYNE. Just one moment.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. When the coal of fire begins to warm through the shell the tortoise begins to crawl. No, sir; my time is limited, and I can not suffer further interruptions.

Mr. BAYNE. Will not the gentleman allow me——

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. Not at all. I have submitted to all the interruptions from the gentleman, who is all the time seeking to occupy the floor at the expense of another's time, that I wish to. [Laughter.] I ask the gentleman to sit down.

I claim, sir, to have given some attention to the question of making pig-iron. I know the chief cost is the materials, namely, iron ore, fuel, and limestone rock. By the use of these materials in the year 1884 (see report chief bureau of statistics of Pennsylvania) the furnace employés in Pennsylvania made 2,092,754 tons of pig-iron. For their labor, therefor, they were paid $4,333,783, or $2.07 per ton. But this was the average, and in that same chief's report I find that much of the 2,092,754 tons cost less. On page 94 of that report I find where one furnace turned out 27,488 tons, and that the laborers for their work in making it were paid $39,313, or only $1.45 per ton. I know, sir, that day wages are higher in this country than in Europe, but, sir, it is cheaper because more effective.

I find in No. 64 of our consular reports, made in June, 1886, an official communication from J. Schoenhoff, our consul at Tunstall, a very carefully-prepared detailed statement of the relative cost of iron ore and coal used in the making of pig-iron in the United States and in England and in Germany. His information about the cost in this country I see he takes from the second volume of our Census Compendium, 1880, and the report of the chief of statistics of Pennsylvania, by me already referred to, and I take it his information as to cost in England and Germany is equally as reliable, and I commend the communication to the prayerful consideration of my friend from Pittsburgh. Mr. Schoenhoff tells us that England's advantage over us, if any, is in the fact that her materials—coal and iron ore—are closer together; that the average distance required to remove all home iron ore—all except what is imported—is 45 miles; that Germany's advantage, if any, consists in the fact that the government owns all iron ore and coal lands and that no royalties are paid—a most wise and beneficent arrangement. He tells us, however, that 189,248 coal miners in Germany, for the year 1885, mined only 51,867,646 tons, or an average of only 274 tons per employé; that the coal when mined is not as good as ours; that in England employés average 325 tons per employé per year.

In the United States our miners average a much larger quantity. Take Allegheny, Clearfield, Fayette, and Westmoreland Counties in Pennsylvania (see report Chief Statistics, already referred to, page 83) and we find 24,928 employés, which includes all hands inside and outside, working on an average of 200½ days each in 1884, aggregating 4,996,911 days' work, turned out 12,365,550 tons of coal besides making 3,694,710 tons of coke. Ordinarily it requires 1¼ tons of coal to make 1 ton of coke, therefore requiring 4,618,387 tons of coal. Thus showing that each employé averaged 681 tons of coal to say nothing of the time consumed in making the more than 3,000,000 tons of coke.

Following Mr. Schoenhoff further and we find that our employés working iron-ore mines turn out a much larger quantity of ore. And last but not least our ore is as rich, producing as large a per cent. of metal, and our coal is unsurpassed.

Having put the knife to pig-iron and found that those engaged in making it and in furnishing and transporting the material out of which it was made, realized $7.75 per ton, more than enough to cover good fair profits, taking the average all over the United States and $9.09 in Pennsylvania, let us take the rolling-mills and put them through the same process of purification and elimination through which we have put the blast-furnaces, and what do we find? See volume 2, Compendium Census 1880, pages 1144 to 1151, both inclusive:

Capital invested	$89,781,900
Total value products	136,798,574
Cost of these products:
Paid wages to labor	$34,004,709
Paid for material	88,277,293
Total cost	122,282,002
Profit to capital	14,516,572
Total	136,798,574

But of what did the materials consist? Let us take an inventory.

1. Iron ore	363,959 tons,	$7.41 per ton.
2. Pig-iron	2,705,509 tons,	$25.05 per ton.
3. Old iron rails
4. Other old scrap-iron
5. Hammered iron-ore blooms	114,762 tons,	$48 per ton.
6. Hammered pig or scrap blooms
7. Purchased muck bars
8. Charcoal	2,569,756 bushels.
9. Hard coal	526,126 tons,	$2.58 per ton.
10. Soft coal	3,915,377 tons,	$2.31 per ton.
11. Coke	14,834 tons,	$3.27 per ton.

With the above data let us proceed to make our allowances and draw our deductions.

1. Profit on capital	$14,516,542
Allow 10 per cent	8,978,199
Amount deducted			$5,538,343
2. 363,959 tons iron ore, at $7.41 per ton	$2,700,167
Allow $2.58 per ton	939,014
Amount deducted			1,761,153
3. 2,705,509 tons pig, old iron rails, and other old iron, $25.05 per ton	$67,779,633
Allow, less $7.75, or $17.30	46,811,939
Amount deducted			20,967,694
4. 114,762 tons hammered iron ore blooms, hammered pig and scrap blooms, and purchased muck bar, at $48 per ton	$5,507,676
Allow $25	2,869,100

6. 3,915,377 tons soft coal, at $2.31	$9,047,654
Allow $1.81	7,089,366
Amount deducted			1,957,688
7. 14,834 tons coke, at $3.27	$48,589
Allow $2.77	41,172
Amount deducted			7,417
Total deductions			33,133,934

Total products, 2,353,248 tons, or $14.07 per ton on the rolled iron. On account of the fact that rolling-mills are further from the places where fuel is produced than furnaces are or should be, I have allowed higher prices for coal and coke used in the rolling-mills than I have for that used in the blast-furnaces, and yet reference to the census reports will show that the rolling-mills estimated these materials at a lower price than did the blast-furnace. It will be observed that most of the deductions have been made on account of profit on capital and the $7.75 per ton on pig-iron, which we found could be eliminated by our calculations made on the blast-furnaces. A similar calculation on Bessemer-steel rails would enable us to reduce that product to a value below $30 per ton. In view of these estimates it would seem that the tariff on pig and rolled iron and steel rails is much, very much, too high in the Mills bill unless we are anxious to give the producers of these commodities the power to combine and run up prices. One-half the amount levied in the bill would give our home producers an advantage such as to enable them to hold the markets just as well as they can now. As long as Pennsylvania can realize a profit of $10 per ton on iron by limiting her output to one-half of our consumptive demands she can make twice as much clear money as she would make on $2.50 per ton profit and supply our full demand.

Iron ore prepared for the furnace when it leaves labor's hands, coal prepared for the furnace when it leaves labor's hands, are very cheap; in fact, as cheap in the United States, and especially in Pennsylvania, Maryland, West Virginia, Tennessee, and Alabama, as any place in Europe. The keeping up of the tariff affects not the price of labor, but enables corporate wealth and the greed of monopoly to gobble up the shekels and oppress the people. In Pennsylvania during the census year there was mined all the anthracite coal and eighteen and a quarter of the fifty-two million dollars' worth of bituminous coal mined in the United States. Of all the coal mined, 44 per cent. in value was anthracite and 56 per cent. was bituminous. Pennsylvania mined all the anthracite and more than one-third of the bituminous coal. Taking all in all, she mined 64 per cent., while the balance of the country mined 36 per cent. only. Iowa mined two and a half million dollars' worth of the fifty-two millions' worth. In Pennsylvania the coal when mined was worth 96 cents per ton, and labor cost paid for mining was only 61 cents per ton, while in Iowa the coal was worth $1.70, and the labor cost was higher than in Pennsylvania.

Of all the bituminous coal turned out in the United States during the census year, Pennsylvania turned out 43 per cent. in quantity, but in value only 35 per cent.; while Iowa turned out only 3.4 per cent. in quantity, but 4.7 per cent. in value, and notwithstanding the higher price of coal in Iowa in quality it was inferior to the Pennsylvania coal.

I apprehend that my good friends from Pennsylvania will hardly admit that wages are so much higher in Iowa as to justify this difference in the price of coal.

COTTON GOODS.

Let us next take up the cotton goods business.

In the cotton goods business, if we are to accept the statistics found in volume 2, Compendium Census 1880, pages 1124, 1125, 1126, and 1127, out of every $100 worth of goods, the materials, most all of which was cotton—

Cost	$54.40
The operative labor	21.60
Making a total	76.00
The balance	24.00

went to capital. Now, what do you want to protect? If only the $21.60, there is very little difference in the price of labor between the United States and England in the cotton goods business. But be liberal; say we pay $1 where they pay 75 cents. That being the case—

They would have paid	$16.20
While we paid	21.60
A difference of	5.40
This $100 worth of goods would therefore have cost	$94.60
But the unit of value is	100.00
Difference	5.40

If they make $94 60 while we make $100, then they would make $100 while we would make $105.70. Hence the amount, $5.70 on $100 worth of their goods, makes the difference, and 10 per cent. ad valorem duty is more than enough.

Next, take woolen goods. Turn to pages 1190 to 1201, both inclusive, volume 2 Census, and there we find a detailed statement covering 1,990 woolen-mills in the United States, that turned out more than $160,000,000 worth of goods. A careful analysis of the cost shows that out of every $100 worth of goods they cost—

Foreign and domestic wool	$41.16
Hair, noils, etc	.37
Cotton and cotton yarn	6.57
Woolen and worsted yarn	2.45
Chemicals	2.90
Wood and coal	1.09
All other material	4.00
Total cost of material	58.54
Paid wages to employés	15.79
Total cost	74.33
Balance to capital	25.67
Total value of product	100.00

Now, if wool is to go on the free-list, that, it is to be presumed, will cheapen it. Some say it will be higher. At any rate, we can buy from the same market that England and Europe buy from. For my own part, I feel that it will be cheapened. Let us now go over the items, and instead of $41.16 say it costs $35. The next item, though small, is as cheap with us as anybody, because admitted free of duty. The next three items, except for the little dab of labor in them, are as cheap with us as with any one. In their unfinished condition there is but little labor in them at most; but be liberal, take out $1.50 and there will be left $13.42. The wood and coal, I take it, are as cheap here as any place, $1.09. The other materials, I do not know what they are, but they are in a crude state and have but little labor about them; take out, however, 15 per cent. or 60 cents in the $4 worth, leaving $3.40, making for material $53.28; now, labor, $1.50, and 60 cents, $2.10, deducted above, added to the original $15.79 of labor cost, making total labor cost needing protection, $17.89; and this makes the cost of materials and labor $69.07, instead of $74.33 as before. Now add to this $69.07 the $25.67 to capital, and we have $94.74.

Thus by the cheapening process we have $94.74 instead of $100. In that $94.74 there is $17.89 of labor. If there be $17.89 to protect in $94.74 there would be $18.88 to be protected in $100. But suppose instead of $18.88 we say $20 to make it round figures. Now, say we pay $1, while England pays 66⅔ cents, then we would pay $20 while England would pay $13.33⅓, difference $6.66⅔. Protect this difference and the $5.70 difference in cotton goods, which would more than be covered by a 10 per cent. ad valorem duty! Then why make the ad valorem duty 30 and 40 per cent. and thus place it in the power of our manufacturers to combine and run up prices?

For the purpose of showing the labor cost in the manufacture of different articles I have prepared a table which I desire shall be marked Table C and made a supplement to my speech. This table I have prepared wholly from information drawn from volume 2 of our Census Compendium, 1880, pages 932–933, etc.

When armed with the capital and materials the cost of labor is not the big item, but is generally comparatively small. By reference to Table C it will be seen that the labor on $100 worth of—

	Cost.
Flour	$3.40
Refined sugar	1.80
Chemicals	10.00

I have not pretended to run clear through the list, but any person who may feel an interest in the matter, and who is familiar with the fundamental rules, addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division, and the time-honored rule of three, can easily extend it through the entire list.

The sensible man strikes more fools on the subject of wages than upon any other question extant. If gentlemen instead of continually harping on the difference in the per diem wages paid in this country and in Europe would compare the results of labor more, and would compare the per diem wages paid in the different States of this Union more, and in the different parts of the same State and often in different parts of the same Congressional district more, they might arrive at more correct conclusions as to why labor commands a better price at one place than another.

Some two months ago I had a constituent, a clever fellow and on most subjects very intelligent. He is interested in mining and shipping kaoline to Philadelphia, 800 miles distant, and I may say he has a most excellent plant when once rightly developed with all necessary conveniences.

He got scared about the tariff and came on here to exert his influence against any reductions. He called on me; I sympathized with him; was anxious to assist him. The duty reduced on kaoline or the products of kaoline would ruin him. He prepared at some trouble and expense to himself an argument on the price of wages—days' wages—between this country and Europe, seeming to forget altogether the fact that the question of labor was a mere song, that it was his distance from the railroad, that he had to team it over bad, rough roads with wagons and then pay high freights, twice as much as fair freightage ought to be, over railroads a distance of more than 800 miles. In further illustration of the wage question, I have prepared three tables which I shall mark D, E, and F, and make parts of my remarks.

The first of the three, being the one numbered D, prepared from facts found in volume 2, Compendium Census, beginning on page 944 and ending on page 1029, shows the average number of our manufacturing people at work in each of the States, the aggregate amount of wages paid, the average per employé per year, and the ratio of wages. Beginning with California, where wages are highest, and making the amount paid there the unit of comparison, and running on down to North Carolina, where wages are lowest, I find Pennsylvania away down eleventh in the list, paying $71.78, while California pays $100, New York $94.90, and down to North Carolina, where $31.10 settles the bill.

The second of these three tables, the one numbered E, prepared from facts found in volume 2, Compendium Census, beginning on page 1030 and ending with page 1095, shows the average number of our manufacturing people at work in each of the several cities named, the aggregate amount of wages paid, the average per employé per year, and the ratio of wages. Taking New York as a unit of comparison and running on down to Baltimore, where wages are lowest, I find Philadelphia, out of the thirteen cities considered, standing No. 10, occupying a column one nearer the top, but relatively several nearer the bottom than that in which Pennsylvania was found in the column of States. While New York pays $100, San Francisco $122.95, Chicago $102.12, and St. Louis $99.29, poor Philadelphia pays only $81.03.

But lest my distinguished friends from the Second, Third, and Fourth districts of Pennsylvania, who have been sent here to keep the yoke upon my constituents, for a time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary; for long years living in the past, coming from a city evidently living in the past—lest they should think there was something wrong about all these calculations, I have prepared a third table, marked F, from volume 2, Compendium Census, on pages 1070 and 1076 respectively, showing the average number of people engaged in certain manufacturing industries in New York City, and in the same industries in Philadelphia, the aggregate wages paid in each branch of industry, the average per employé, and the ratio to the employés in the respective cities. Taking the price paid in New York as the unit of comparison, and I find that in Philadelphia wages range all the way from 47 to 87 cents, while $1 is demanded and paid in New York.

Now, sirs, at the time the census whose figures are used was taken Philadelphia had 185,527 persons engaged in the manufacturing industries of the city, out of a population of 847,170. New York had only 227,352 persons engaged in manufacturing industries, out of a population of 1,206,299. To have had as large a proportion of her population engaged in the manufacturing industries as Philadelphia, New York would have had to have 264,000 persons engaged in such industries, or 37,000 more than she did have; Chicago, instead of 79,414, would have had to have 110,000; St. Louis, instead of 41,825, would have had to have 76,000; San Francisco, instead of 28,442, would have had to have 51,000. This shows that Philadelphia was more of a manufacturing city than New York, Chicago, St. Louis, or San Francisco, and if high wages depend on a larger per cent. of population being engaged in manufacturing industries, why is it that wages are not higher in Philadelphia than in New York or these other cities? And if the competition of cheap labor breaks down and destroys high-priced labor, how is it that the 227,000 persons engaged in the manufacturing industries in New York are not driven from their business by the cheap pauper labor of Philadelphia?

The pauper labor of Europe in an open field destroying the high-priced labor of America! The pauper labor of Philadelphia destroying the high-priced labor in New York! Was anything ever more farcical? I invite my friends from New York to contemplate the scene. And I pause to say to my friends from Philadelphia, Uncle Charlie in particular, "If you have tears to shed, prepare to shed them now."

Our protectionist friends talk with exultation at our growth as a country (my distinguished colleague [Mr. BROWNE] calls it "phenomenal") and of our high-priced labor, attributing it all to the tariff; and shed crocodile tears lest it should be brought into competition with the pauper labor of Europe. Does not every well-informed man know that high-priced labor beats the world in an open field? It always has and always will.

Our country's greatness! What made it great? The tariff. Who built these magnificent monuments? The tariff. What enables us to grow such splendid corn? The tariff. How is it that Kentucky has such fine horses? The tariff. How is it that we have these fertile lands, this healthful climate, these intelligent people, the good sunshine, and the rainfall? The tariff. How is it that now and then we cull out a holiday and call it the Fourth of July? The tariff, of course.

I once heard of an old physician who had a student whom he was trying to bring up in the ways of a full-fledged Esculapian. He had a sick patient to visit. He took his pupil with him; they entered the patient's bed-room; the old doctor felt the patient's pulse, looked about, and said to the patient: "You have been eating eggs, haven't you?" "Yes," said the patient. The old doctor prescribed, and they left. On the way back the pupil asked: "How did you know he had been eating eggs?" "Because," responded the old gentleman, "I saw the shells under the bed." Another day passed and the old doctor sent the young man to see the patient. The young man went in, felt the patient's pulse, looked about, prescribed, and returned. When he gets back the old doctor asks him: "Well, how is Mr. Brown to-day?" "I don't know, but I am afraid he is going to die!" "Going to die! Why do you think so?" "Because he has eat a horse." "Eat a horse! Why, what makes you think he has eat a horse?" "Because I saw the saddle and harness under the bed."

Because our country has prospered our protectionist friends look around, and finding the tariff in sight, they gladly attribute our growth and prosperity to the tariff. Sirs, the tariff has handicapped our people; it has built up millionaires, created colossal fortunes. In doing so it has ground and oppressed the people, transfered the money from the pockets of the many to the pockets of the few.

Why, Mr. Chairman, away back in 1860 I remember hearing Henry S. Lane deliver a speech at Bloomfield, a town in my district. He and Thomas A. Hendricks were opposing candidates for governor. Hendricks dwelt with just pride on the rapid stride our country was making in the march of progress under Democratic rule. Lane replied, admitting that it had, but wondered if the sunshine, the equitable rainfall, the healthfulness of our climate, the fertility of our soil, the intelligence of our people, in short, the greatness of our opportunities, did not have something to do with it.

During the decade then just passed all former decades were badly left, just as every ten years are bound to surpass every preceding ten years. The rule of progress, sirs, is upon the law of geometrical progression, and not the law of arithmetical progression, 1 and 1 are 2, and 1 are 3, and 1 are 4, and so on; 2 and 2 are 4, and 2 are 6, and 2 are 8, and so on, arithmetical progression; 2 and 2 are 4, and 4 are 8, and 8 are 16, and so on, geometrical progression. Simple interest never compounded is arithmetical progression. Compounded and it is geometrical progression. One hundred dollars at 8 per cent. interest draws $8 per year, or $800 in a hundred years. But at 8 per cent. compounded and in less than ten years it doubles itself. In ten years it is $200; in twenty years, $400; in thirty years, $800; in forty, $1,600; in fifty, $3,200; in sixty, $6,400; in seventy, $12,800; in eighty, $25,600; in ninety, $51,200, and in one hundred years it is $102,400, or $101,500 more than by the simple way. In 1850 we had over seven billions of property, and in 1860 a little over sixteen billions.

For every $100 in 1850 we had $226 in 1860. This rate of increase would have given us a little over thirty-six billions in 1870 and a little over eighty-two billions in 1880. Instead, we had only thirty billions in 1870 and forty-three billions in 1880.

In 1850 we had 9,021 miles of railroad; in 1860 we had 30,635. For every 100 miles we had in 1850 we had 339½ in 1860. The same rate of increase would have given us over 104,000 miles in 1870 and over 356,000 miles in 1880. Instead, in 1870 we had 52,914, and in 1880 93,349. In all the essential elements of advancement the country never prospered like it did between 1850 and 1860. In the language of Henry S. Lane, wages are good; our country's prosperity is phenomenal. Our wide fields and room for diversification, our genial sunshine, our refreshing rainfalls, our winters and our summers, our seed-time and our harvest, our intelligence, our virtues, our good government, our grand opportunities make wages good and make our country prosper.

Although considerable of a skeptic, not much given to believe in th at which I can not hear, see. taste, feel, or smell, or deduce by an à priori course of reasoning from something that I can hear, see, taste, feel, or smell, I am disposed to give God the glory, and to sing:

Rise, shine, give God the glory,
Rise, shine, give God the glory,
Rise, shine, give God the glory,
In the year of jubilee.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the difference between the Republican and Democratic parties on the subject of the tariff is radical, fundamental, irreconcilable. It is not a mere question as to the adjustment of a schedule of duties on foreign importations under a well-established governmental policy, but a question as to the policy itself. If it were a mere question of adjustment it could and should be removed from the domain of party politics to that of business, and be settled with reference to the demands of the revenue and of the business of the country for the time being. The everchanging conditions of trade and commerce and of industrial production necessarily require from time to time a readjustment of these duties, in order to promote and enforce the policy under which they are laid, and such adjustment should be left to the wisdom of Congress, unembarrassed by party strife.

But the question here is one of governmental policy, and is this: Shall duties be laid for the purpose of revenue only or shall they be laid not only for the purpose of revenue, but also with a direct view to the encouragement of home industries and home labor? If the policy be settled in favor of protection, then the matter of adjustment becomes a question of business to be settled by such mutual concessions between conflicting industries and interests as will best promote the good of the whole people, in effecting which every man may think and act free from the trammels of party. But if it be settled in favor of a tariff for revenue only, the only question of adjustment which can then arise will be as to what articles of foreign importation when subjected to tariff duties will best produce the revenue necessary for the maintenance of the Government without any reference to how home industries and home labor will be affected.

It is the avowed policy of the Democratic party to reduce tariff duties to the revenue basis, and the bill under consideration is brought in with that view. Indeed, I go further and charge that it is not only their purpose to bring tariff duties to the revenue basis, but to eliminate entirely from our revenue policy the idea of protection to American industries and American labor. The Democratic party is absolutely hostile to the protection idea, as is manifest by the last message of the President of the United States to Congress, and from the utterances of the leaders of the party on the floor of this House. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] said the other day:

We should levy taxes to obtain revenue, but not to restrict importations--

we will increase wealth if we lower the duties and let importations come in of those things which can be produced cheaper in other countries than our own.

This is the true Democratic faith as taught and practiced by the Southern Democracy, and was inspired not only by their selfish interests as slave-owners and cotton-growers, but by their peculiar construction of the Constitution of the United States. When the Constitution was adopted the people at once divided upon the question of its true construction; one party insisting that it created a government for the people of the thirteen original States sovereign within its sphere, and that in determining the extent and limit of its powers the Constitution should receive a fair and reasonable construction; a construction that would give it effect not only according to its letter, but its spirit; a construction that would imply all powers necessary to the due exercise of those expressly granted; in short, a construction which regarded the people of these States as constituting a nation and the Constitution as creating a government for them, whose sovereignty was paramount to that of the States.

But the other party insisted upon a strict construction, a construction which assumed for its basis that the Constitution created a mere agency for the convenience of confederated but sovereign States, and that it possessed only such powers as were expressly given to it. This party, which afterwards became the Democratic party, founded all its doctrines and policies upon the dogma of strict construction, and denied to the General Government the most essential powers of government, even the right of self-preservation, because no express warrant therefor could be found in the Constitution. Upon this ground it denied the power to establish a national bank, to undertake or carry on internal improvements, to acquire foreign territory, and especially the right to lay duties for the purpose of protecting home industries, and whenever the tariff has been under discussion in Congress the question of the constitutionality of protection has been raised by the Democratic membership, and is raised to-day, notwithstanding one hundred years of Congressional legislation recognizing it.

So that a tariff for revenue in the light of history and as expounded by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, means the absolute destruction of the policy of protection. And if internal-revenue taxes are retained, as proposed by this bill, the additional amount of revenue necessary for the maintenance of the Government can be obtained from duties so laid as to avoid even accidental or incidental protection—that species of protection which the Democratic party has heretofore expressed a willingness to submit to for the sake of the revenue. It is possible to select articles not produced here (as in free-trade England, where they levy duties on tea and coffee) from which this additional revenue may be obtained, and who can doubt, in view of the utterances on the other side of the House in the course of this debate, that even this species of protection will be eliminated from our tariff policy if the Democratic party obtains full and complete control of the Government?

Are we prepared for a tariff for revenue only as thus understood? What will it mean to the industries of this country? I will tell you. It will mean a readjustment of the industrial system of this country on the basis of unprotected competition with the industrial systems of the whole world; it will mean that in order to hold our own market—a market in which we sell at good prices 90 per cent. of our immense production—our labor must come down to the European standard and accept the wages and adopt the methods of living of the laborers of England and Germany; it will mean that many of our industries must fail utterly and their men be turned out to crowd the labor market of the remaining industries, bringing wages still lower, or, unfitted by training and experience, to enter the field of agriculture, there to assist in swelling the surplus of unmarketable production, or else wander as tramps through the country. And it will mean in its ultimate manifestation danger to the peace and safety of the Republic.

Gentlemen on the other side talk glibly about our labor being able to compete successfully with that of any other country and promise us the foreign market as compensation for any impairment of the home market. Undoubtedly the American workingman in point of intelligence, energy, and industry has no superior on earth, and with anything like equal conditions would fear no competition, but the free-trader, fair-trader, tariff-for-revenue reformer, or whatever else he may call himself, refuses to see that the conditions are not equal and can not be made so except by bringing our standard of labor and living down to that of other countries. What are the conditions under which we must enter upon the competition involved in the policy of a tariff for revenue only? First, what is our condition? We have a population of about sixty million souls—at the last census 50,597,057—but there are only seventeen persons for each square mile of our territory. Our exports last year amounted to $703,022,923, while our imports reached the sum of but $692,319,768, leaving a balance of trade in our favor of $10,703,155, and this does not include the imports and exports of gold and silver bullion and specie upon which the balance of trade was also in our favor to the amount of $37,460,492.

Ever since and including the year 1874 the balance of trade has been very largely in our favor. Last year we exported wheat, wheat flour, and corn to the amount of $162,013,864, and the only grain imported was barley, to the amount of $6,568,833. Our exports to Great Britain were of the value of $363,101,143, while our imports from that country were only of the value of $165,067,463, being a balance against free-trade England of $198,033,680. Our debt on the first day of this month less cash in the Treasury was $1,181,632,855, but our income last year was $371,403,277 as against an expenditure of $267,932,180, leaving a balance of $103,471,097 applicable to the payment of this debt, of which $47,903,248 was so applied by the purchase of bonds for the sinking fund, and the remainder might well have been applied to the purchase of outstanding bonds of the Government but for the political necessity of maintaining a surplus, in order to pave the way for tariff reduction.

The pretense of doubt about authority under existing law to purchase bonds having served its purpose, and Congress, to relieve the President from embarrassment, having by resolution expressed the opinion that the law of 1881 means just what it says, we may hope to see the accumulating surplus hereafter applied to the extinguishment of the debt. These are conditions of prosperity and offer opportunities to the citizen of independence, of comfort, of leisure, for intellectual growth and development not to be periled by a radical change of policy, the result of which must be purely speculative, and which in any event will bring disturbance and distress to our industrial and business interests during the process of change from the old to the new basis. Surely it is a case, if there ever was one, where it is "better to let well enough alone."

But what are the industrial conditions in other lands, whose unrestricted competition we invite? Turn to Europe; there we find the land crowded with human beings, from two hundred to five hundred to the square mile, an average to the square mile of over two hundred persons, who scramble and push each other in the struggle for bread, whose lives are given over to the single effort to obtain the mere means of existence, and who have no part or lot in making or executing the laws under which they live. I speak of the great mass of the people, the common people, those who really bear the heavy burdens of European government, who support in idleness its great standing armies and the magnificence of its nobility and royalty. England is perhaps less extravagant in this respect than others, and yet she pays nearly $100,000,000 a year for her army and her royal family. The annuities to the royal family amount to $2,715,000, the keeping of the royal palaces to $199,910, and the expenditure of the army to $91,969,500, making a total of $94,884,410. The strength of the standing armies of the leading States of Europe is as follows, namely:

	Men.		Men.
Austria	267,179	Holland	53,000
Belgium	54,818	Portugal	32,000
Denmark	16,653	Spain	144,664
France	525,711	Russia	735,218
Germany	492,000
Great Britain	149,391	Total	2,795,521
Italy	265,389

Each of these countries has a debt per head of its population greater than the United States, except Italy—the debt per head ranging from $28 to $153—and in all but Austria, Germany, and Russia their imports largely exceed their exports, and especially is this true of grain and flour; and in all except France, Germany, and Great Britain the annual governmental expenditure is greater than the income. In France, Germany, and Great Britain there is often a deficit, and the expenses of government are only met by the most onerous systems of taxation imaginable. Everything is taxed; in addition to the ordinary subjects of taxation in all countries, they tax doors, windows, railway passengers, licenses, carriages, male servants, and many things which display an ingenuity in finding subjects of taxation that only the most pressing necessity could inspire. The consolidated debt of France amounts to the enormous sum of $4,745,619,245, and that of Great Britain to $3,681,393,440.

These are not conditions of prosperity, not conditions conducing to high or even fair wages for labor and the beneficent results incident thereto; and yet it is proposed to bring our labor to the standard of these tax-ridden, overcrowded, ignorant populations. This bill is to be the beginning of that end. It is but a short step from this bill to the revenue basis, and the proposition is plain, if not self-evident, that free competition with these peoples means acceptance of their standards. We have no longer even the advantage which distance from the field of their production formerly afforded us. The cost and delay of transportation which distance imposed has been so lessened by the railroad, the steam-ship, the telegraph, and ocean cable, that there is now practically no restriction upon competition between the two continents save that imposed by legislation, and to legislation we must look as the only efficient means of equalizing conditions or preventing injurious competition. And looking to the good of our people as the best way of working out our part in the great plan of human progress, we have heretofore so legislated, with reference to the conditions attending our national development, as to prevent hurtful competitions, and we must continue to do so unless we are willing to become mere hewers of wood and drawers of water for some better-equipped rival.

If there could be substantial equality of conditions, then free and unrestricted commerce would be possible, and would follow as effect follows cause. But if the nations are to be brought to substantial equality in this respect, the movement should be upward and not downward, forward and not backward, up from the low wages of pauper labor to the fair wages of independent, self-respecting, intelligent labor.

If the restrictions we have placed upon foreign commerce for the protection of our industries and our labor be removed, will the movement be upward or downward? The crowded millions of Europe are standing by the shores of the Atlantic, with a surplus of everything but food, waiting to throw their wares upon our rich market and realize returns that will bring to them plentier and cheaper food and the comforts which their poverty has heretofore denied them, and they will win the market; as the cheapest producers they will take possesion of our market and hold it, unless we cheapen our productions to their standard.

It is a question of labor, of cheap labor—the cheapest labor must win if the productions be of substantially equal value. It is hardly possible to conceive of anything having value and which may be made the subject of traffic and commerce, which is not enhanced in value by labor, and must have the stamp of labor upon it before it can be devoted to the use of man. Gold is of no value until drawn by the hand of labor from its hiding place in the earth or released from the slow-yielding grasp of the quartz—and so with all things; they must be consecrated to use by the hand of labor. And so it is, that whatever the other advantages of a competitor, the element of labor is the controlling one, and the market will yield to the cheaper labor, the production being substantially as good as the competing one. It is only necessary to state this, it needs no elaboration or argument.

But it is said that the increased demand for our agricultural production will compensate for any injury to our manufactures. Necessarily the crippling of our manufactures will cheapen agricultural production, both by crippling the consuming power of the people and by the increased production which the return of the factory hand to the field will involve, and this cheapening and the introduction of foreign goods may increase the demand for wheat, corn, etc., but through the lowering of prices will benefit us but little, if at all. In the end we must accept European conditions and cheapen our labor so as to hold our market, or in large measure surrender commercial and industrial independence and devote ourselves to feeding the factories of Europe. Either way, we must lose our place in the great movement for the development of the earth's resources and the uplifting of its peoples, with which diversified industry has illustrated this age, and become mere stragglers in the rear of the procession.

Why should we voluntarily and unnecessarily embarrass ourselves in this race of life? We should lead the procession. Our area is continental; every variety of soil and climate is embraced within our boundaries. The lakes on the North, the gulf on the South, the great oceans on either hand, and the mighty rivers of the interior, supplemented with 150,000 miles of railway, afford facilities for transportation unequaled in all the world. Timber, coal, iron, and every production of forest, field, and mine necessary to the development of the highest civilization are here at the command of intelligent industry; and it is only necessary to avail ourselves of these advantages, it is only necessary to seize and improve the great opportunities which they afford in order to become the richest and most powerful nation of the world. Why, then, should we go to and depend on any other country for the things necessary for our national life and progress? And why, especially, should we go to them for the things we can produce ourselves? In order that we may get them cheaper, and in order that we may escape the clutch of monopolies, says the free-trader. But the answer to this is one approved by a hundred years of national experience, and is this: That home competition, the competition between our own producers and manufacturers, will insure reasonable prices to the consumer—much lower prices than would be accepted by the foreigner if in control of our market.

There has been a constant and rapid cheapening to the consumer of all productions since the beginning of our national existence, but more especially so since the enactment of the protective tariff of 1861. I will not offer tables of statistics to prove this; already the RECORD groans with figures that prove it beyond question. And in truth it is not questioned. The free-trader does not question the fact, but will attribute it to any cause under the sun rather than the protective tariff. Yet it is a fact that can not be controverted that in every leading industry home competition has brought down the price, and the lowering of the price dates from the laying of the first protective duty on the foreign article. It was so of steel rails, as often instanced, and of spool cotton, silks, woolens, blankets, etc. The country is too broad, its interests too varied, the enterprise of its people too great ever to become the helpless prey of monopoly.

There is a tendency, it is true, to combination on the part of capital through corporate organization, trusts, and what not, that is antagonistic to the welfare and happiness of the people which, while not growing out of, are made possible by the modern facilities for rapid communication and transportation. These agencies make possible the great combinations of capital which center in New York, London, and other great cities, and thence reach out to the whole world demanding tribute. They are not confined to any one country; they rise above all tariffs, whether protective or for revenue only, and exist wherever capital is found, and greed of gain and unscrupulousness combine with opportunity. It will not be claimed that a protective tariff gave rise to the Standard Oil combination, nor that a tariff for revenue only is responsible for the great English combinations of capital which exist to-day, nor that the revenue policy of France is responsible for the recent French copper syndicate. The tendency grows out of the peculiar commercial and business conditions of the age and these combinations must be met by legislation aimed at them directly, and of a character that will restrain the abuses of which they are guilty, and surely this end can better be attained by a study of the extent and character of their operations and the true and real causes of their existence than by an outcry against the tariff upon the demagogic assumption that it is responsible for them.

The tendency of the age is to the accumulation of wealth in the hands of the few at the expense of the many, and largely grows out of the abuse of corporate organization and power. These abuses call for radical measures, and unless the great corporations of the day are brought within limitations that will make them agencies of good and not of evil, they will possess the country and defy the Government, as many of them do now.

But our friends on the other side charge all these abuses against the protective tariff. On the other side of the ocean they are attributed to free trade. Sir Edward Sullivan, in an article in the Nineteenth Century of August, 1881, said:

> The workingmen are not working out the question by the abstract reasoning of others, but by their own experience; they know nothing of political economy, but they know what were the promises of the apostles of free trade, and they know what are the results. Bankers and brokers, and dealers in stocks, and importers of foreign manufactures may tell them that they are fools and do not know when they are well off. That may be so, but they know when they are badly off, and they are badly off now.
> The reports of their delegates state that a very large proportion of the operative population of Great Britain (they put it at one-third) is out of work; that the rest have not on an average more than four days' work a week; that for five or six years they have been consuming their savings and the funds of their trade societies. One rich trade society has paid no less than £200,000 in "work pay" during the last five years and reduced its capital to less than £100,000.
> Whatever the wealth of the country may be it has not penetrated down to them. Every year this wealth is accumulating into fewer hands; every year the gulf between rich and poor becomes deeper and broader. It is calculated that there are at this moment 14,500,000 of the people with less than 10s. 6d. a week to live on.

It would be just as fair to attribute to the protective tariff the evils of intemperance as to attribute to it the tendency of capital to form combinations, or of corporations to abuse their powers, or of the rich to grow richer and of the poor to grow poorer. Certainly the removal of the restrictions upon foreign commerce would not relieve us from these combinations unless through the destruction of the wealth of the country it should have that effect.

The foreign market as pictured to us by the free-trader is a delusion and a snare. We already sell there as much as there is any demand for. We successfully compete with other nations in the sale of cotton, grain, flour, petroleum, tobacco, and other things of our own special production, and can only hope to increase our exports materially by becoming the carrier of our own productions. Legitimately a nation should go abroad only for those things which it can not produce at home or can not produce in sufficient quantities to supply the demand of its people, and commerce between the nations should, in the main, be confined to these things. To go beyond this is to force the market of some other nation and do violence to the beautiful theory of the free-trader that a nation should shape its commercial policy for the common good of all mankind—for surely the common good of mankind would be best promoted by respecting the integrity of each country's market as to those things which it produces in quantities sufficient to satisfy the demand of its people. In this view we have little to complain of—our exports last year amounted to $703,022,923, classified as follows:

Agriculture	$523,073,774
Manufactures	135,317,574
Mining	11,758,720
The forest	21,126,212
The fisheries	5,145,771
All others	6,570,872
Total	703,022,923

The great disturbing element in the markets of the world is overproduction. Labor-saving machinery and appliances have so stimulated and increased production of every kind that, irrespective of commercial and industrial policies, there come times when the supply exceeds the demand and there ensues a business paralysis or stagnation that is only cured when consumption again overtakes production; and the great problem of the future is to so adjust the labor of the world to the new basis created by machinery as that it may find remunerative employment without bringing upon us the distresses incident to overproduction. And when this problem is solved it may solve the question of "strikes," which seemed to trouble the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] the other day, and which he attributed to the tariff, forgetting that the "strike" and "lockout" are free importations from free-trade England and that the argument that they grow out of the policy of free trade is much the stronger one.

Among civilized nations there is but one free-trader or rather but one tariff-for-revenue—only nation. All others, through restrictions on foreign commerce suited to their condition, endeavor to hold their own markets and support the policy which limits foreign importations to the things which they do not produce. The one nation which is an exception to this rule is England, and she is sui generis. Her insular position gives her special advantages as a maritime power. Very early she turned her attention to manufactures, and by a most rigid and even unscrupulous policy of protection, pursued for hundreds of years through tariffs and navigation laws, became the leading manufacturing nation and the ocean carrier of the world. Soon she was compelled to look abroad for food for her people and for raw material for her manufactures, and of necessity was compelled also to look abroad for a market for the surplus of her manufactured products, and so she began to plant colonies in every part of the world and adopted a policy with reference to them that compelled them to become consumers of her manufactures, in exchange for which they were required to furnish her food and raw material.

But she did not stop here; through diplomacy and with her cannons she from time to time took possession of markets all around the world, which she holds to-day, and when at last all these measures failed to meet her necessities, she as a measure of protection to her industries and trade, as purely protective in its operation and effect as the tariffs which she abandoned, adopted her so-called policy of free trade. Having a large and constantly increasing surplus of manufactured goods which she was compelled to sell abroad to obtain food and raw material, she said to the nations whose markets were yet within their control, "Let us remove all restrictions on commerce; let trade be free; let me sell in your market freely and without restriction, and you shall so sell in mine, and great good will follow to us all." Sell in her market! Sell what? Sell manufactured goods there when every dollar's worth so sold would to that extent lessen her ability to buy the food and raw materials she must have? No; she did not intend that. She knew that she must because of her necessity and with her advantages could undersell her competitors not only in her own market but in all markets to which she was admitted duty free.

Her assurance of this was in her cheap skilled labor, her improved machinery, her abundant capital, her large production, and in the fact that she would carry to her own shores, upon her own terms, the greater part of the competing goods. Beside that, she still lays duties on foreign importations, and still discriminates against foreign manufactures, although gladly admitting all raw material free. For instance, she lays duties on tobacco and coffee, but discriminates in favor of her home manufactures, by placing still higher duties on roasted or ground coffee or any form of manufactured tobacco, and so with many other things. She takes care of her own household and deserves credit for it, but offers nothing to compensate us for admitting her to our market on equal terms. If we had the cheap labor, the capital, and the ships, England would still be a formidable competitor in the markets of the world. She already has control of markets in every quarter of the globe from which it would be difficult indeed to dislodge her, and she would maintain a keen competition for all others. In any view of the matter the foreign market as compensation for the loss or any serious impairment of our own great home market is a delusion and a snare.

If the time shall ever come when through the crowding of population and the accumulation of wealth our labor shall be cheapened and the other conditions coexist to render us independent of the competition of other nations, it will then be time enough to throw down our walls of protection and invite the unrestricted competition of the world. Until then it is the part of wisdom to sustain the policy and hold the market that has made us a prosperous people and given us a high place among nations.

If we look abroad for a market we ought first to turn our attention to securing control of, or at least an equal share with other nations in, the markets of this hemisphere. They are already valuable and steadily growing more so. There is a wonderful increase in the wealth and population of the South American states, and a growth in trade, industry, and all the peaceful arts which gives promise of a rich commerce. But to-day we fall behind Great Britain, France, Germany, and even Belgium in our trade with most of these states. Last year the exports of the Argentine Republic amounted to the sum of $69,835,000 and her imports to $95,408,000, and her trade with the countries named stood as follows:

Country.	Imports from.	Exports to.
Great Britain	$33,432,660	$10,071,850
France	17,022,038	22,342,183
Germany	8,044,875	6,950,908
Belgium	7,721,817	10,924,737
United States	7,673,284	3,580,466

In 1886-'87 the exports of Brazil to Great Britain amounted to $32,410,720, and her imports from Great Britain to $34,378,435, while her exports to the United States were $52,593,716, and her imports from the United States were only $8,071,653, a balance against us of $44,522,063. For the same year the exports of Chili to Great Britain amounted to $11,387,185, and her imports from that country to $8,041,985, while her exports to us amounted to $2,863,233, and her imports from us to but $1,393,725. Our trade with these three countries is fairly representative of our trade with all the countries of that continent. There are twelve lines of steamers from the Argentine Republic to Europe, and an ocean cable to London, but none to the United States. This tells the story of European supremacy in the markets of these States. To secure the trade of these countries we must offer them as good if not better facilities for an exchange of products than they enjoy with Europe.

To do this we must have our own ships and be able to establish as many steam-ship lines as their commerce demands. But we have no ships and we find the ocean covered with the subsidized ships of Great Britain, France, Germany, and other nations, and independent of the subsidies with which these nations protect their commercial marines, we find that because of the high price of American labor we can neither build nor sail ships as cheaply as they, and consequently can not compete with them in the carrying of even our own trade. In this situation there is but one of two things to do—sit still and do nothing as we have been doing for so many years, or else by subsidy build up a commercial marine as we have built up our system of internal transportation, by unlimited appropriations to railroads and for the improvement of rivers and harbors—subsidies that will enable us to compete successfully with other nations for the carrying trade of the world.

But at this point the Democratic party meet us again with the constitutional objection—a want of power. I would find the power in that fair and reasonable construction of that instrument of which I have spoken, which gives it effect not only according to its letter but its spirit, and I believe with Col. J. R. G. Pitkin, whose language I now quote from a speech recently delivered by him before the National Convention of the American Shipping and Industrial League at New Orleans, that—

> A nation by its right to be, to conserve itself, must expand its powers; and it loyally construes its charter when it regulates commerce to that end. The Constitution that belted a union of thirteen States must be let out to the girth of the great nation which is not to be emaciated and stifled by a narrow construction of the letter that is perfidy to the spirit. It is not an instrument in which can be found by remote implication an intent or sanction to waste our substance on foreign fleets in an annual drain of $150,000,000, or to divest from our labor the legitimate dues by which it may be a nerved, sanguine, steadfast American force to compel wide elbow room in the world.

The only remedy the Democratic party suggests to relieve the unhappy condition of our commercial marine is what they call "free ships;" which means that we shall abandon ship-building—let it become to us one of the lost arts—and buy our ships on the Mersey and the Clyde, forgetting that subsidies to foreign ships still shut us out of the field of competition. What better use could be made of the surplus than to employ it in building up our shipping and in preparing the way for our admission on equal terms to the foreign market which our greatly increasing production renders so desirable? We can not afford to give up our own home market for the chance of a foreign market, or even in exchange for it; yet wise statesmanship requires us to inaugurate such measures as will in the no distant future secure to us equal advantages in the markets of the world. Let the "surplus" be devoted to rebuilding the Navy; to restoring our commercial marine to the proud position it once occupied; to the development and improvement of internal transportation; to the payment of liberal pensions to the old soldiers, who have made all the promise of our future possible, and the people will not complain; they will sanction and approve it all.

Notwithstanding the frightful pictures of distress growing out of excessive taxation to which we have been treated in the course of this debate, no man can lay his finger upon a single instance of real distress resulting from national taxation, and the people are nowhere complaining of it. In its daily round the sun does not shine on a more prosperous country than this, and their fancy pictures of distress are mere creations of the imagination, intended for use in the coming political campaign. A gentleman on the other side, from the State of Texas, complains that, admitting we pay higher wages than any other country, yet, to use his own language—

> It is also an established fact that the laborer in the United States can not, as a general rule, save anything from the result of his toil at the end of each year.

And adds—

> Then what is the difference between earning $1 per day or 10 cents per day, if the result is the same, namely, sufficient to eat to preserve life, and sufficient to wear to protect the body?

It is Buchanan's doctrine of 10 cents a day come again. This statement may fairly represent the condition of labor in the gentleman's State, and in the South generally, for some little observation in that region prepares me to believe it, and I am willing he shall confess for his section of the country, but not for mine. In no sense does his statement truly represent the condition of labor in Ohio, or anywhere north of Mason and Dixon's line. The deposits in the Northern savings-banks and in building associations refutes it, and it is absolutely refuted by the surroundings of comfort, convenience, and even of ornament and taste with which the homes of labor are filled in the North, whether on the farm, at the furnaces, or at the factories. Nowhere else in the world has labor such surroundings. You may find squalor and wretchedness in certain quarters of every great city, but there is no "general rule," as stated by the gentleman, applicable to the labor of the North.

Every man familiar with Northern life will bear testimony to the truth of what I say, and the census of 1880 shows that no more than 1 in 505 of the people of the Northern States receives public relief, while in England in 1868 about 1 in every 18 persons was in receipt of parochial relief. In the city where I reside, most of the men of family, who earn their living by labor in its numerous workshops and factories, own their homes, which they have purchased from the savings of their labor, and because of these savings small properties of $1,000 and less in value are almost as marketable as wheat and corn, and I undertake to say that this is not unusual in the towns and cities and in the country places of the North. The earnings of our labor have made it intelligent, independent, and self-respecting, as befits men who are charged with the responsible duties of a citizenship such as ours, and it demands a continuance of the policy which has protected it against the underpaid, underfed, and degraded labor of the old world, and if not heard now, will be heard in November. This is labor's battle and labor will decide it.

Petitions come here from the men in the mills, the factories, and workshops of the country, from the manufacturers who give them employment, from the farmers and stock-raisers, from the lumbermen, and from the miners, asking for the preservation of this policy and for the defeat of the Mills bill as the forerunner of its destruction; but where are the petitions from the people anywhere in all the land asking for a reduction of tariff duties? Who is it that inspires this crusade against the industries of the country? Not the farmers, not the manufacturers, not the workingmen; no, not these, but would-be political economists, with learning enough to be dangerous; disciples of Calhoun, who have never been charged with the responsibilities of government until within the last three years, and whose knowledge of any industrial system is of one that is dead and into which the question of wages never entered, and English emissaries of free trade, organized for the conquest of the American market.

From these come the inspiration for this warfare against the prosperity of the country. These men have control of the Democratic party and our safety lies in depriving it of the power it so abuses, and which was so improvidently placed in its hands. That day is near at hand. The men who toil, the old soldiers of the Union, and all those who intelligently and sincerely desire the continued prosperity of the country will have their innings in November next, and will re-establish the American policy, the policy of Henry Clay, the policy of the old Whig party, and of the Republican party, on foundations so firm that even the Bourbon Democracy will be convinced of the futility of ever again assailing it. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to occupy any of the time of the committee in the discussion of the pending bill. Its merits, if any merit it has, and its demerits, and they are to my mind many and glaring, were so well known to every gentleman on this floor whom I could hope to reach or influence by anything I might say that any suggestions on my part seemed not needed. My mind has not changed on that score. But, Mr. Chairman, last evening I received such a petition from many hundreds of people in my district protesting against the passage of this most unjust, unwise, and uncalled-for measure that I am impelled to say a word in presenting it to the American Congress. This petition, Mr. Chairman, is signed by many hundreds of people in my little city who know what labor is. They live by the toil of their own hands. Glad am I to say that they are intelligent people. They understand the meaning of protection. They know what the passage of the Mills bill means to them, they know what it means to all American workingmen, and they raise their voices by this petition in solemn protestation against its passage.

Look at this petition, gentlemen of the majority. Its length is measured by yards and its signers are numbered by hundreds, and yet this is not the only petition of like tenor presented by me to Congress.

Thousands of laboring men in the district I have the honor to represent are begging Congress to defeat this bill. They are workers of wool and of cotton, of iron and of glass, the mechanic and the farmer. Mr. Chairman, do they stand alone in making this request? Need I make answer? Why, sir, the term of the gentleman from Texas is hardly long enough to enable him to count the number of names of those throughout this prosperous land who have invoked Congress by petition not to disturb our industries, not to cripple our manufactures, not to place our happy and contented and prosperous working people on a level with those less favored in other lands by the passage of the Mills bill.

These petitioners are not confined to any district or any State. Why, sir, I have received remonstrances even from the State of Texas. Is it because these petitioners are outnumbered by those favoring the passage of the bill that no heed is paid to them by the gentlemen across the aisle? Is it because the districts represented on this floor by Democrats are asking for its passage that a deaf ear is turned by the gentlemen of the majority to this petition I present, and hundreds of others like it?

Mr. Chairman, I do not recall that a single petition has been presented asking for the passage of the Mills bill. When the American people are interested they let that interest be known. If the people of these United States, or any considerable number of them, desired the passage of the Mills bill, think you, sir, they would have remained so long silent? Has not nearly every gentleman on this floor received many petitions in reference to the copyright bill, the pension bills, the educational bill, the swamp-land bill, the direct-tax bill, and numerous other measures now pending before the House? Have we not all received protests against this bill? If petitions have been sent here favoring its passage they have been smothered in obscurity.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard no farmers crying for the passage of this bill; nor do I believe I will while nine-tenths of their products are used for home consumption. I have heard no laboring man ask for its passage. Do you think, sir, they will so petition while their wages approximate double those paid in every other country on the globe?

Who is it, then, that wants the provisions of the Mills bill enacted into law? Ah, sir, I believe that question will be answered next November in no uncertain tones. I believe the verdict of the people at the polls will answer, "Not the American people, but the British free-traders and their allies." [Applause.]

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Chairman, I have sought this opportunity during the continuance of this extended, and in some respects remarkable, debate to give expression to some of the views entertained by me concerning this bill, and also concerning the policy of this Administration on the subject-matter thereof, and on a question intimately connected with the proposed revision of the tariff. Not that I shall enter upon a lengthy discussion of the latter, but that before this controversy closes I may state some of the things I would like to see done in the way of revising the inequalities of our present tariff law in harmony with the declarations of my party and the best and wisest sentiments of a majority of its thoughtful people. Nearly five sessions of experience in this body has taught me how difficult it is to accomplish the most inconsequential legislation if a single one of the three hundred and twenty-five members of the House sets himself actively and persistently at work to prevent that legislation.

How many of the hundreds who have from time to time been members of the lower branch of Congress have realized most emphatic, if not bitter, disappointment when, on assuming their relation with the House of Representatives of the United States of America, they found themselves surrounded on all sides by insurmountable walls in the name and form of rules, constructed by their antecedent legislators, ostensibly for the purpose of facilitating deliberation and legislation, but effectuating the most complete legislative tyranny possible to conceive! I can not answer, but know I am within the bounds of truth when I surmise their number to be "legion;" so when I wish to put upon record some of the changes I would like to see made in our existing law, or in the so-called Mills bill before it shall, if ever, become a law, I am sensible how unreasonable may be the hope that such changes as I may desire, if their wisdom were conceded by a large majority of the present membership of the House, will be made either in existing statute or pending bill. Notwithstanding the difficulties in the way, however, each member has his individual duty to perform, his responsibility here and elsewhere to meet, and for one I shall hesitate not in doing the best I can to make plain my position.

Mr. Chairman, among the few things—some commendable, some despicable—done by this Administration there are at least three for which it can not escape if it would the condemnation of a majority of the most thoughtful and intelligent people of the country. For three attacks, neither of which involved the least exposure to physical danger, this Administration will be justly celebrated. First, the attack on the silver dollar; second, that upon the outstanding greenbacks, and, third, that upon the protective system under which this Government has grown and prospered, and by reason of which, as we on this side of the Chamber believe and declare, she has attained financially, commercially, intellectually, and nationally the proud distinction accorded her by the civilized world. The first attack, as all gentlemen present remember, was begun early.

Indeed, it appears that so much was the President-elect wrought upon by his own fears, or the importunities of influential single standard gold men of the country—which on this precise point practically means New York City—that prior to the time when, under the Constitution and laws, he could officially say or do anything, the country was amused and surprised to find that he, on February 24, 1885, had deliberately written certain prominent members of his party then in the House of Representatives, urging them, by indirect if not direct words, to a repeal of the law of February 28, 1878, under and by virtue of which the regular monthly purchase and coinage of silver dollars are being carried on. This, sir, was a most remarkable spectacle, the like of which I do not recall.

How this early, this pre-official attack upon the financial system of the country was followed up by the Administration is readily shown by reference to the first official communication of the President to Congress—his first annual message.

Now, sir, while I do not intend to discuss for one moment the silver question as related to our present coinage laws, and only wish, as indicating an opinion, to make brief declaration of my sympathy with the principle of bi-metallism, I can not forbear, in view of the bitter—I had almost said venomous—attacks made upon our tariff system by the Administration and by the great majority of the Democrats in the House and in the Senate since this debate began, calling attention to this first assault of the President upon the silver currency of the country.

As a text to this immediate discussion a wild and apparently deep-felt alarm was sounded. Uttered by the President in his last partial annual message to Congress—reference to every other subject of national or international concern being spurned as unworthy in comparison with the one thing forming the alpha and omega of this state paper—the cry has been iterated and reiterated over and over again during this debate that our whole land is in peril most imminent and threatening.

Why, Mr. Chairman, to read the message attacking protection, and the Democratic vociferations of calamities now on the country, and every day augmented at most fearful rate, if one accepted as literally true either the President's extreme utterances, or discarding those, the wild, fanatical, and vicious declamations of many of the free-traders who have spoken since this debate began, he would conclude at once that this country is going straight to perdition by the shortest route possible.

Now, I say upon the history of this Administration, already of more than three years' duration, that these cries are those of alarmists in high places and nothing more.

To prove this let me briefly recur to the policy and utterances of the Administration on the silver question.

I have already cited the unusual, pre-official attack made, and indicated that it was thereafter officially followed up.

Let us refer to the first message of President Cleveland to Congress, turning to pages 22 and 23 of the messages and documents of 1885 and 1886 as printed, and we will find such sentences as these:

The necessity for such an addition to the silver currency of the nation as is compelled by the silver-coinage act is negatived by the fact that up to the present time only about fifty millions of the silver dollars so coined have actually found their way into circulation, leaving more than one hundred and sixty millions in the possession of the Government, the custody of which has entailed a considerable expense for the construction of vaults for its deposit. * * *

Every month two millions of gold in the public Treasury are paid out for two millions or more of silver dollars, to be added to the idle mass already accumulated. If continued long enough this operation will result in the substitution of silver for all the gold the Government owns applicable to its general purposes. * * * The proportion of silver and its certificates received by the Government will probably increase as time goes on, for the reason that the nearer the period approaches when it will be obliged to offer silver in payment of its obligations, the greater inducement there will be to hoard gold against depreciation in the value of silver, or for the purpose of speculation.

This hoarding of gold has already begun. When the time comes that gold has been withdrawn from circulation there will be apparent the difference between the real value of the silver dollar and a dollar in gold, and the two coins will part company. * * * The hoarding of gold which has already taken place indicates that we shall not escape the usual experience in such cases.

So, if this silver coinage be continued, we may reasonably expect that gold and its equivalent will abandon the field of circulation to silver alone. This, of course, must produce a severe contraction of our circulating medium, instead of adding to it. * * *

And on pages 25 and 26 of this same publication will be found such sentences as these:

We have now on hand all the silver dollars necessary to supply the present needs of the people and to satisfy those who from sentiment wish to see them in circulation; and if their coinage is suspended, they can be readily obtained by all who desire them. If the need of more is at any time apparent, their coinage may be renewed. * * *

That disaster has not already overtaken us furnishes no proof that danger does not wait upon a continuation of the present silver coinage. We have been saved by the most careful management and unusual expedients, by a combination of fortunate conditions, and by a confident expectation that the course of the Government in regard to silver coinage would be speedily changed by the action of Congress. Prosperity hesitates upon our threshold because of the dangers and uncertainties surrounding this question. Capital timidly shrinks from trade, and investors are unwilling to take the chance of the questionable state in which their money will be returned to them, while enterprise halts at a risk against which care and sagacious management do not protect. * * * I recommend the suspension of the compulsory coinage of silver dollars, directed by the law passed in February, 1878.

A year passed. The following message contained a brief reference to the coinage of silver and to the views expressed in his first communication to Congress, which were reaffirmed. Another year passed, and the subject of silver coinage was wholly ignored.

It may be the "hoarding of gold" referred to by the President has not only been commenced and continued in some parts of the country, and that somewhere in some secluded spot of "gold bugs" gold and silver have, as the President predicted, parted company, and it may be perilous, crushing times have come somewhere, but I want to say most emphatically that such conditions as the President prophesied have not come to pass in my section of the country. Why, sir, as matter of every-day fact, there has been more gold in the safes and on the counters of the bankers of Northwest Iowa since the above-quoted words were written than I ever knew of before in that part of the country.

If you had gone into any of the banks doing a general business in the district I have the honor to represent at any time during the past three years you would have seen, as can be seen now, plenty of gold, and the banks can hardly put it out, because people, under the magnificent financial system enacted by the Republican party, know that for every practical purpose of trade and financial transaction a paper dollar serves them as well as either gold or silver and is vastly more convenient to handle. In the light of this indisputable fact of the presence of an abundance of gold on the counters of the bankers of the West, what becomes of the great hue and cry of the President that silver was fast driving out gold; that the gold was fast being hoarded, and would soon disappear from the sight of all but the miserly hoarders of it.

What has become of the prediction of the President that financial and commercial disaster would follow unless the coinage of the silver dollar was suspended? Despite local disturbances and local failures to realize the measure of prosperity hoped for, the fact remains that in the grand West at least railroad and town building, entries upon and purchase of land have gone on at rapid rate, and while the farmers of the country have not realized as much for their farm products as they desired, nor as they ought, yet I deny that during these years following this alarm sounded by the President, they have been, as some here have essentially depicted, going pell-mell to the poor-house.

But I shall recur to the farmers later on in my remarks.

Now, I maintain that this plentifulness of gold in the West, in every bank, large or small, engaged in a general business, could not have existed during all this time since the President sounded his excited alarm, and announced the "parting of company" of the two metals, the hoarding of gold and its disappearance from sight, were it not that our general condition of trade and finance has been fairly good.

If the general condition of the country in regard to the existence of an ample gold fund in the hands of bankers may be properly estimated by the condition of the National Treasury as to gold receipts during the past four years, there would seem to be no fear of early disappearance of "shining shekels."

On November 1, 1884, there were in gold in the National Treasury..	$134,670,790
On November 1, 1885	142,598,569
On November 1, 1886	158,537,179
On October 1, 1887	192,567,181

Or a gain of nearly $60,000,000.

The last monthly statement of the Treasurer is not at hand, but the one of date of March 31, 1888, shows a net gold coin and bullion balance in the Treasury of $218,818,253.63, while the net silver balance was only $43,886,782.09. I am aware that this is not a decisive criterion by which to judge the accuracy of the President's predictions, and that to present such complete criterion might demand a full survey of the field of trade and finance, the condition of our exports and imports of the precious metals; but, inasmuch as I have only sought to prove there was no just occasion for the deep apprehension felt by the President in forecasting such near and direful consequences unless the coinage of silver should be immediately abated, the above reference is, in my judgment, quite sufficient.

The Administration's second attack was made upon the few million of "greenbacks" still in circulation and use among the people. Not only must silver go if the Administration can have its way, but the "greenbacks" must go quickly and not stand much on the order of their going.

Why, Mr. Chairman, when I have listened to these many, very many, iterations and reiterations from Democrats of this House and elsewhere, as they sound the praises ascribed this Democratic administration—how it is the government of the poor man, the foe of monopoly, the guardian angel of the "meek and lowly" as against the high and crafty, the rich and exacting—to all this nonsense that has flowed like an almost ceaseless current of sickening self-adulation I have felt, in the face of the solemn facts, like turning away in shame and disgust.

In his reply to the House resolution of February 3, 1886, reported by Mr. BLAND, calling him to inform the House, among other things,—

What amount of silver dollars was in the Treasury on the 4th day of March last that could have been applied in the payment of the interest-bearing debt and other dues of the Government, and what amount of such dollars is now held in the Treasury that could be so applied; also, what amount of silver certificates is held in the Treasury that could be reissued; also, what amount of interest-bearing debt is now subject to call, and will the same policy be pursued in the payment of silver thereon and on other public dues as in the past?—

Mr. Manning, then Secretary of the Treasury, after having referred to the number of silver dollars then in the Treasury, and answering the question as to what application could be made of those accumulating in the Treasury, said:

As to what application "could" be made of them—

Note the irony—

being questioned, I respectfully answer, besides what is elsewhere said, that by careful management, so as neither to contract the currency nor to force a silver basis, these silver dollars might all, in time, be applied to withdraw and cancel the United States notes, which are "other dues of the Government" now payable. But my power to do so is left in doubt by the act of May 31, 1878. I therefore suggest its repeal, in order to provide a larger use for silver. * * * No other part of the public debt is subject to call at the option of the United States before September 1, 1891, except the United States notes, to the payment of which in coin or its equivalent (besides the redemption which has been kept up since 1878) the faith of the United States was solemnly pledged in the act of March 18, 1869. The amount of these notes now subject to call is $346,773,116. * * * A reform of the currency, coupled with the payment of the two sums now alone payable at the option of the United States prior to September, 1891—

Meaning the residue of the 3 per cent. bonds, loan of July 1, 1882, amounting to $174,092,100, and the "greenbacks"— would constitute a financial achievement exceeding any other which has heretofore been attempted within such a period of time.

It is true no formal attempt was made thereafter to summarily dispose of—pay off and cancel the $346,000,000 of the paper currency then and now in circulation—the remnant of that vast volume of similar paper money issued by the Government during the memorable struggle of 1861 to 1865; it is also true that the Secretary who penned the above condemnation of the remaining paper-currency issue not wholly based on coin has, since then, passed to his final resting-place; but the official act clearly expressing the hostility of this administration to the "greenbacks" of the nation remains. The attack was most seriously made, and the disposition to go the full measure that Wall street might wish disclosed.

The third attack, as I have seen fit to enumerate them in the beginning of my remarks, is that made by the President in his last annual message, and now being most vigorously and tenaciously supported by the free-trade members of this body upon the principle of economics so well defined by the word "protection." And while I would deplore success on the part of the Democratic party to seriously endanger this principle as applied in the collection of our necessary revenue, yet I must say I have experienced a profound satisfaction in the fact that now and hereafter during the approaching Presidential campaign, and I trust subsequent thereto and during the period of the existence of the present great competing parties, we are to know where the Democratic party as a party stands on this question; for whatever the mere verbal statement of the next Democratic platform may be, the position of that party is now more clearly defined by Presidential and Democratic Congressional utterance than ever before, and no skillful manipulation of words at St. Louis whereby, as in the last national platform of that party, the protectionists in the East and the free-traders in the West could, and did, with apparent equal sincerity, maintain that the party was committed to one or the other principle as was necessary to allure the elector, can, in the coming campaign, obscure the fact or deceive men of ordinary intelligence as to the real attitude of the Democratic party toward this important issue. The fearless and able defense of the protective principle made by such Democratic members as RANDALL, FORAN, MCADOO, and a few others—members of this House—can not break the force attaching to the President's message and the great volume of Democratic utterance in the two Halls of Congress in support of it.

I say, then, welcome be the day, and all the days in political discussion, when the country on this question of tariff shall be able unmistakably to locate each of the great parties correctly, and know, as they must, that the one means unyielding opposition to protection and the advocacy of free trade, the other the same intense and uncompromising allegiance to that principle which has, in every platform since the organization of the Republican party, marked its history and will continue to be one of its cardinal doctrines to the end of its days.

Of the so-called Mills bill let me here say that while I entertain strong feeling that Congress should revise the existing tariff so as to bring about such an administration of our revenue system, both of customs duties and internal revenue, as will promise relief from so large a surplus in the future, I can not and will not support this bill unless materially amended; and while doubting that, in the condition of the legislative mind as it exists in the House at this time, it will be possible to secure such amendments as will make it acceptable, it appears to me to be my duty to favor its consideration through the various parliamentary stages of discussion, both general and under the five-minute rule, in the hope that eventually it may come forth bearing far less resemblance to its former self and presenting a face and form in no feature of which may be traceable the strong lines of free-trade venom which now so seriously disfigure it. Therefore, if at the conclusion of general debate the opponents of the measure shall attempt to have the enacting clause of the bill stricken out, as was done in the Forty-eighth Congress in relation to another bill relating to this subject, I shall deem it my duty to vote with those who favor further consideration, at the same time declaring that, unless amended in nearly all the particulars hereafter named, it shall receive, on the attempt to pass it, my emphatic negative.

The great demand of the hour is such legislation, not alone of revision of the tariff and internal-revenue laws, but of wise and judicious appropriations as will reduce the large excess now existing and prevent future unnecessary accumulations in the public Treasury.

I agree that the existence of an ample public purse should lead to no unjustifiable and unnecessary expenditure of the public money, but with this fact in mind I am free to say that there are some objects of national concern requiring outlays of money which may well receive the attention of Congress at this time.

First among these objects as they appear to my mind is a just enlargement and readjustment of our pension laws with a view to the administration of a larger measure of justice to the men who, by reason of service in the Army during the late war, are now maimed or diseased to an extent unfitting them partially or totally to earn a livelihood for themselves and those legally dependent upon them. And by this is meant not only a more liberal allowance to those who have and can establish their claims under existing laws and rules of the Department, but also ex-soldiers who, while, strictly speaking, unable to connect their present disabilities with army service, can show conclusively that their present ailments are not due to their own immoral and vicious habits, but to other causes for which they may not be responsible, and hence placing them where they may well receive reasonable aid from the Government.

To this class, irrespective of any disability of a pensionable degree, I would add every one of our living soldiers, who, being in the service and line of duty, was captured and incarcerated more than thirty days in any of the Southern prisons. These men, while in a position in which capture was a well-understood incident of war, and as to which they knew on enlistment they would stand in danger, nevertheless I contend they can not reasonably be held to the understanding that the imprisonment to which they might, on capture, be subjected, would not be in accordance with civilized warfare, and that they would be starved to death in dens and pens of disgusting, sickening filth, nor that their terms of confinement might, for any reason of public policy, if such was ever the case, be unduly lengthened because of any failure, avoidable or unavoidable, to effect their timely exchange, and thereby, and by reason of the inhuman hardships to which they were by their captors subjected, the chances of their final deliverance so much curtailed as to amount to a most serious lessening of the possibilities of life.

To this class, then, I would immediately grant reasonable pensions, to be in addition to any pension they may now draw by reason of any specific ailment or wound.

From my standpoint I venture to say that the sense of justice which in the Forty-ninth Congress led a Democratic House and Republican Senate to pass a dependent-pension bill in aid of the dependent soldiers of the late war, their widows and orphans, more nearly met the approval of the loyal people of this country than the act of the President that prevented the action of Congress becoming effectual.

A bill in the same Congress granting a qualified service pension to every soldier, sailor, or marine who, being sixty-two years of age, served in the war with Mexico fourteen days, or was, during their enlistment, en route to the seat war, passed the same Congress and was a well understood companion piece of legislation with the vetoed dependent-pension bill above referred to. This measure gave not less than 65 per cent. of the amount appropriated to Southern men, regardless of the fact whether they were rebels during the late war or not, always excepting the chief traitor.

This bill was readily sanctioned by the President; the other, providing very similar benefits for the Union soldier, was apparently as readily denied Executive sanction. Not only so, but a strong effort is now being made to enlarge the scope of the Mexican pension bill, and no doubt it will be done soon after the next election. Now, in view of all this, what is the manifest duty of Congress? Let the bill now pending on the report of the House Committee on Invalid Pensions on Senate bill No. 181, entitled "An act granting pensions to ex-soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors," be soon taken up and passed that the many and deserving people coming within its terms may know that the Congress of the United States holds in further remembrance the invaluable services of dependent ex-Union soldiers as well as those more unfortunate than they. Finally, but most emphatically, on this subject let the limitation upon the arrears of pension for disability be removed; its continuance is a disgrace to the Republic. I note with pleasure the report filed to-day on that subject, though I have not yet examined it. Next to these classes may be enumerated suitable improvement of the navigation of all important and navigable rivers and harbors, and the construction of suitable, substantial, and enduring public buildings in our larger cities, where the public interests are great by reason of large postal service, or in addition thereto the courts of the United States are permanently located.

Other manifestly worthy objects of public care and the public revenue might be enumerated, but these may suffice to indicate my views generally on the subject of appropriations. But all these being provided for from time to time, as can be done—and certainly it can not all be done in one year, nor two even, but will require many—there will yet remain at the present rate of national income, as I am led to believe, a considerable sum of money more than will be disbursed in the usual appropriations, and indeed, millions more than will be required. How shall this unnecessary amount be prevented from further lodgment in the vaults now so weary, if we may believe our Democratic free-traders, of their contents? We will see.

I count it one of the marked features of our present tariff law that not only the manufacturers and producers in other lines, but that our farmers are not forgotten. Here is the list of articles in which the farmer deals and the rate of duty according to existing law:

Animals, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Beef and pork, 1 cent per pound. Hams and bacon, 2 cents per pound. Meat, extract of, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Cheese 4 cents per pound. Butter, and substitutes therefor, 4 cents per pound. Lard, 2 cents per pound. Wheat, 20 cents per bushel. Rye and barley, 10 cents per bushel. Barley, pearled, patent, or hulled, one-half cent per pound. Barley malt, per bushel of 34 pounds, 20 cents. Indian corn or maize, 10 cents per bushel. Oats, 10 cents per bushel. Corn meal, 10 cents per bushel of 48 pounds. Oatmeal, one-half cent per pound. Rye-flour, one-half cent per pound. Wheat flour, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Rice, cleaned, 2½ cents per pound; uncleaned, 1¼ cents per pound. Paddy, 1¼ cents per pound. Rice flour and rice meal, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Hay, $2 per ton. Honey, 20 cents per gallon. Hops, 8 cents per pound. Milk, preserved or condensed, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Pickles and sauces of all kinds, not otherwise specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 35 per cent. ad valorem. Potatoes, 15 cents per bushel of 60 pounds. Vegetables, in their natural state, or in salt or brine, not otherwise provided for, 10 per cent. ad valorem. Vegetables, prepared or preserved, of all kinds not otherwise provided for, 30 per cent. ad valorem. Currants, 1 cent per pound. Fruits preserved in their own juice and fruit juices, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Flax straw, $5 per ton. Flax, not hackled or dressed, $20 per ton. Flax hackled, known as "dressed line," $40 per ton. Tow of flax or hemp, $10 per ton.

What has become of this farmers' list of duties in the Mills bill? "Gone where the woodbine twineth," every one of them, except the following:

Rice. Rice flour. Paddy, or rice having outer hull on. Peanuts.

There is nothing mean about this; is there? Oh, no; every grain, all meats, vegetables, potatoes, hay, and, in short, everything the Northern farmer raises, dropped quietly out of the present dutiable list, while the great rice and less important peanut crop is duly cared for.

The great food supplies of one section utterly neglected, the great food product of the other section duly protected. Ah, what sublime equity.

And then the potato yield of Northern fields forgotten, while the gay and festive peanut "bobs up serenely," kindly sandwiched between rice and raisins on one side and mustard and cotton manufactures on the other. The peanut is a lucky little fellow. [Laughter.]

Take him up tenderly,
Pinch him with care,
Fashioned so slenderly,
Young, and so fair!
Peanut.

[Laughter.]

This Mills bill is truly odious, as has been said. It proposes to accomplish a reduction of revenue by dropping out the whole range of Northern farm products, placing some other articles on the free-list, reducing the duty on many other articles of home production, at the same time making but a slight reduction in the rate of duty on sugar, none on rice, and carefully favoring the Southern cotton-raiser by letting in his iron and steel cotton-ties free, and by making reduction on nearly all manufactured products. I am unmistakably opposed to any such sectional propositions.

I am also opposed to placing flax and its straw on the free-list, or to reducing the duty on the oil.

The people in my part of the country have for many years raised a considerable surplus of flax, and in the general depression of prices, and at times of partial failure of crops, they have found it of good reliance as to certainty of yield and price, and so much so as to have been most helpful in their years of hardship and trial in developing a new country. Large oil mills have been erected in Iowa, Minnesota, and other States west, and at Sioux City, in the district I have the honor to represent, one of the largest and finest mills in the country has recently been constructed and is now operated, thus, to a marked extent, eliminating a considerable per cent. of distance and charges from the list of fees usually taxed on shipment of flaxseed to distant points of manufacture and consumption. During the past sixty days I have received and presented to the House more petitions, bearing more numerous signatures of people residing in Northwest Iowa, praying that the duty on linseed oil be not reduced, than on any other subject since the commencement of my Congressional service in 1883, unless it be a single petition from laboring men. The proposition to alter the duty on flax its oil and fiber has, if I can estimate the sentiments of a large number of my constituents, met their positive and hearty disapproval.

I am also opposed to placing wool on the free-list. It is a farm product and represents the little surplus yield of too many families in the land for me to favor its being placed on that list. In the Forty-eighth Congress my vote was cast against restoring this commodity to the rate provided by the law of 1867. That did not seem to me to be necessary, and my convictions are most positive now that the farmers and stockmen who are engaged in this industry should not be compelled to take a level with the sheep-raisers of Australia and the South American countries; and particularly so in view of the large increase in the importations of wools and wool manufactures during the fiscal year of 1887.

On page 26 of the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, among other articles on the dutiable list as to which there was an increase of importations as compared with the previous year, he gives the following:

Wools:
Combing	$919,796
Carpet	1,978,295
Wool manufactures	3,481,399

These values do not represent increased price so much as of quantity, and, therefore, of value more largely based on increased importation.

Before passing from this subject, however, I would like to suggest to both the majority and minority of the Committee on Ways and Means whether such change can not be made in any bill that may become law, if any shall this Congress, in respect of the basis of duty on wool, as will give to the River Platte country an equal opportunity with other foreign countries to enter its wool in American ports. My information is that, by reason of the character of the soil and climate, the South American wool, while of average quality with that from Australia, takes on and retains a much larger quantity of filth, thereby increasing its weight out of proportion with the cleaner grades from other countries, and making it impossible of equally favorable entry with other wools of similar quality but carrying less of dirt.

This unintentional discrimination now existing against the South American wool is, I am satisfied, operating to retard the extent of our commerce with that country, and this is my reason for calling attention to it.

But my most serious objection to this bill, the asserted object of which is to reduce the annual revenue, is that it entirely overlooks the one article on the dutiable list in dealing with which in a statesmanlike manner more money can be at once saved to the entire people of the country, and not the least harm be done those now or hereafter to be engaged in the production or handling of the commodity, than in dealing with any other article on that list.

I refer to sugar. In the annual statements of receipts and expenditures of the Government, actual or estimated, made by the Secretary of the Treasury from year to year, the form adopted and long maintained has become a familiar one. For instance, the estimated revenues of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, as stated on page 7 of the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, are:

From customs	$228,000,000
From internal revenue	120,000,000
From sales of public lands	10,000,000
And so on down the grade, amounting in all to	383,000,000

Therefore it is that a glance at such statement at once rivets the eyes on the two immense sums resulting from customs and internal revenue. True, the aggregate of estimates of receipts from other sources is considerable, but none of them seem to be of a character to invite special attack when searching for sources of revenue to be curtailed. If I am not in error no one in all this debate has made a specialty of singling out any one or more of these minor sources of revenue. The war has been waged on these two, the free-traders selecting the customs duties as primarily the ones to afford the remedy sought, and the extreme and most radical protectionists aiming their guns at the internal revenue.

For my part, I do not think the latter should be the first resort in seeking a remedy, but that the customs list, and first that article upon that list which presents the greatest inequality in respect of the cost to the consumer as compared with the number of people and the area of country protected by the present duty.

At this stage of my remarks I can not, in deference to my own convictions and what I firmly believe to be the convictions of a large majority of the people of Iowa, and also of the Republicans of that State, refrain from taking issue with my esteemed colleague [Mr. KERR], as well as with a distinguished Senator from Iowa now serving in the other legislative branch of the Government [Senator WILSON], and whose judgment and ability I hold in high regard, upon the propriety of abolishing the internal-revenue system, and particularly the tax on liquors.

Those gentlemen and myself are in accord upon the great question of State prohibition as now represented by the statutes of Iowa, and when in the rapid course of political events it is apparent that it will be wise to extend that question to the broader domain of national legislation—as to which may God speed the day—I expect, if we are all living, to be in harmony with them then; but, sir, notwithstanding the fact that many excellent men and women in Iowa and elsewhere believe that in taxing men who engage in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors the Government thereby and in so doing becomes a sharer, a partner in the abominable traffic, I differ with them. Now, if in the consideration of this question it is to be viewed solely from a high moral point and in relation to ethics alone, I would take no issue with these gentlemen but at once coincide, but I am disposed to look at it in this light: Here is a National Government charged with the authority and responsibility under the Constitution of maintaining a system of revenue that shall in its operations occasion as little burden and hardship upon the people as possible.

In the exercise of this power that Federal Government, which is purely official, deals with thirty-eight States, some of which are widely separated, having local conditions and sentiments on many questions as widely different as their locations; each one possessing a sovereignty absolute and complete on the question of the administration of its police power, and therefore each alone possessing the sole authority to decide what its policy shall be, whether to license or tax liquors and those who manufacture or sell them, or entirely prohibit such manufacture and sale. Bearing this in mind, we must agree that tobacco and liquors have, during much of our history, been treated as proper articles of taxation, particularly when large sums of money had to be raised; and both these commodities being of a class not necessary as food or sustenance for the body, while large and increasing sums of money must be had for national support, I can not see, as a practical question of statesmanship, why the tax should at this time be in the least removed from liquors and dealers, unless as to some grades used in the arts and sciences, nor why it should be to any considerable extent removed from tobacco, cigars, cheroots, etc.

It is a well-known fact that but about five of the States in the Union have passed prohibitory statutes. As to such, if the present national law operates to interfere with the sovereignty of the State, or the enforcement of her laws passed to suppress intemperance, I make bold to say that such changes in our Federal laws should be made as will not so interfere with those of any State. But this is one question, and the right and justice of taxation as applied to these things under our federal system is another. Let us be sensible and practical in this, holding ourselves ready to move to higher ground morally when good sense dictates it can be done and should be done as matter of statesmanship.

Another thought, briefly. The expenses of Government in a general sense must necessarily increase as development and expansion go on. Large and growing sums of money will annually be needed. All of these should not be raised from customs duties. Perhaps it might not be going too far to make a change in the tobacco schedule, to reduce the rate on all kinds or clear chewing and plain smoking altogether; but certainly other kinds should nor be touched, and the taxes on liquors and dealers should be maintained unless as to such kinds of intoxicants as may be used in the arts and sciences or be made from fruits; but on this I do not now declare.

Turning now to sugar, let me say the amount of duty collected on sugar last year was in round numbers, $56,500,000, being an increase of the previous year of $6,000,000.

Sugar, sugar-candy, and molasses show an increase of exactly $6,237,738 over the year before. Except iron, steel, and manufactures, it exceeds the increase of nearly all other articles combined, and the increase over iron, steel, and their manufactures is nearly $200,000. so that it not only in and of itself presents the most striking inequality in point of relation of annual amount of duty to home product, persons, and area protected, but it is the one as to which the annual income is most rapidly increasing.

This being the case, what should be done? I answer unhesitatingly, put sugar on the free-list and give a bounty equal to present rate of duty to all persons who shall produce in this country from canes or beets 500 pounds of good marketable sugar.

The question may be asked, do you favor a general system of bounty giving? I answer, no; but that whenever, as in this case, our home industries can be protected and new ones established and developed by giving a bounty I am in favor of giving it. Why, sir, as has already been shown in this debate, we can actually save $50,000,000 each year and not in least jeopardize a single sugar plant in the land. If the sugar industry of the South had exhibited during all these years the power of growth, of expansion, promising extensive enlargement, as has and does manufacturing, and in that condition needed protection, I would probably regard the case on all fours with that interest. The cases are wholly dissimilar. There is one fact in connection with sugar manufacturing in this country well understood by members of this body, but not, in so far as I am aware, sufficiently emphasized in this debate.

As a nation we are, in my opinion, on the eve of a great and successful era of sugar manufacture from sorghum cane, if not from sugar-beets.

It has not been very many years since manufacturing sugar profitably from beets was regarded impracticable, but now the entire success of that method is attested by the more than 600,000 tons produce in Germany, over 460,000 tons in Austria, 400,000 tons in France, over 300,000 tons in Russia, and over 125,000 tons in Holland; so that to-day one-half of the sugar product of the world is made from beets.

During the past five years, and particularly during 1887, under the supervision of the Department of Agriculture, such experiments have been made as fully justify the conclusion that sugar-making from sorghum cane as a profitable business is assured, and that a good article of sugar can be manufactured from cane grown in Kansas (and if in Kansas, then in Iowa, Missouri, Nebraska, and other States) as profitably as from another quality of cane in Louisiana.

As gentlemen present know, there has recently been issued by the Commissioner of Agriculture a pamphlet containing in detail reports from the several chemists who during 1887 conducted experiments at sugar-making at Fort Scott, Kans., Rio Grande, N. J., and Lawrence, La.

This pamphlet contains also such an interesting "historical sketch" of the sorghum plant and the various attempts to demonstrate its adaptability to successful sugar production that I deem it of interest to present it, to be printed as a part of my remarks. It was prepared by Professor E. B. Cowgill, appointed by the secretary of the State board of agriculture of the State of Kansas to inspect and report upon sugar manufactured under an act of the Legislature of Kansas of date March 5, 1887, entitled "An act to encourage the manufacture of sugar," and appropriating $15,000 to cover a bounty authorized by the act of 2 cents per pound upon all sugar manufactured in that State from "beets, sorghum, or other sugar-yielding canes or plants grown in Kansas."

The historical sketch is as follows:

The sorghum plant was introduced into the United States in 1853-'54 by the Patent Office, which then embraced all there was of the United States Department of Agriculture. Its juice was known to be sweet, and chemists were not long in discovering that it contained a considerable percentage of some substance giving the reactions of cane-sugar. The opinion that the reactions were due to cane-sugar received repeated confirmation in the formation of true cane-sugar crystals in sirups made from sorghum. Yet the small amounts that were crystallized, compared with the amounts present in the juices as shown by the analyses, led many to believe that the reactions were largely due to some other substance than cane-sugar.

EARLY INVESTIGATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

During the years 1878 to 1882, inclusive, while Dr. Peter Collier was chief chemist of the Department of Agriculture, much attention was given to the study of sorghum juices from canes cultivated in the gardens of the Department at Washington. Dr. Collier became an enthusiastic believer in the future greatness of sorghum as a sugar-producing plant, and the extensive series of analyses published by him attracted much attention from sugar-makers in the South and students of the chemistry of sugar throughout the country.

SUGAR FACTORIES ERECTED IN KANSAS.

Stimulated by the analytical results published by Dr. Collier, interested parties erected large sugar factories and provided them with costly appliances. Hon. John Bennyworth erected one of these at Larned, in this State. S. A. Liebold & Co. subsequently erected one at Great Bend. Both of these factories made some sugar, both lost money, and both quit the business.

Sterling and Hutchinson followed with factories which made considerable amounts of merchantable sugar at no profit.

The factory at Sterling was erected by B. M. Sandys & Co., of New Orleans, who sought, by combining Mr. Sandys's thorough knowledge of sugar with the best practical skill of the South, to establish the sorghum-sugar industry on a proper basis. For two seasons this combination worked faithfully, and while the sirup produced paid the expenses of the factory, not a crystal of sugar was made. The factory then in 1883 changed hands and passed under the superintendency of Professor M. A. Scovell, then of Champaign, Ill., who, with Professor Webb, had worked out in the laboratories of the Illinois Industrial University a practical method for obtaining sugar from sorghum in quantities which at prices then prevalent would pay a profit on the business. But prices declined, and after making sugar for two years in succession the Sterling factory succumbed.

The Hutchinson factory at first made no sugar, but subsequently passed under the management of Professor M. Swenson, who had successfully made sugar in the laboratory of the University of Wisconsin. Large amounts of sugar were made at a loss, and the Hutchinson factory closed its doors. In 1884 Hon. W. L. Parkinson fitted up a complete sugar factory at Ottawa and for two years made sugar at a loss. Mr. Parkinson was assisted during the first year by Dr. Wilcox, and during the second year by Professor Swenson.

INFORMATION GAINED.

Much valuable information was developed by the experience in these several factories, but the most important of all was the fact that with the best crushers the average extraction did not exceed half of the sugar contained in the cane. It was known to scientists and well-informed sugar-makers in this country that the process of diffusion was theoretically efficient for the extraction of sugar from plant cells, and that it had been successfully applied by the beet-sugar makers of Europe for this purpose.

FURTHER WORK OF THE UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

In 1883 Professor H. W. Wiley, chief chemist of the Department of Agriculture, made an exhaustive series of practical experiments in the laboratories of the Department on the extraction of the sugars from sorghum by the diffusion process. His report sums up the results of his experiments as follows:

"1. The extraction of at least 85 per cent. of the total sugars present was secured. In many of the experiments, as will be seen by consulting the table, scarcely a trace of sugar could be detected in the exhausted chips.

"2. The production of a quantity of melada represented by from 10.9 to 12.28 per cent. of the weight of the cane diffused.

"This was secured with a cane in which the total sugars did not exceed 11.68 per cent. The percentage of melada by this process will be found just about equal to the per cent. of total sugars in the cane.

"It ought to be greater with a more perfect extraction, but I am speaking only of results actually obtained.

"This yield is just about double that obtained by the large factories at Rio Grande, Campaign, and other places.

"3. The production of a juice of great purity, which lends itself easily to processes of depuration.

"I consider the experiments, however, to have their chief value in the fact that they will call the attention of cane-growers to the advantages which a rational system of diffusion will have over pressure in the extraction of the saccharine matter.

"I hope to be able at the end of another season to report further progress in this interesting problem.

"In the present condition of the sorghum-sugar industry, in which it has alike to be protected from the overzeal of its friends and the opposition of its enemies, the process of diffusion offers the most promising outlook for success. It therefore seems the duty of this division to make a more practical test of this process and on a larger scale."

To make the necessary further experiments with diffusion required the expenditure of large sums of money. As already shown, the private companies had lost heavily. They were utterly unable to complete the experiments so hopefully begun by the Department of Agriculture.

THE AID OF CONGRESS SOLICITED.

At this crisis Hon. W. L. Parkinson and Mr. Alfred Taylor, of Ottawa, Kans., after consulting with others interested in the then languishing sorghum-sugar industry, went to Washington to call the attention of Congress to the important results promised for the diffusion process, and to show that without the aid of an appropriation all that had hitherto been accomplished would be practically lost. The Kansas delegation in Congress became interested. Senator PLUMB made a thorough study of the entire subject, and, with the foresight of statesmanship, gave his energies to the work of securing an appropriation of $50,000 for the development of the sugar industry. This appropriation was made during the last days of the session of 1884. The season was too far advanced to erect and use the diffusion apparatus with sorghum-cane, and it was by the Commissioner of Agriculture sent to Louisiana, and sorghum got no benefit from this first appropriation.

ANOTHER APPROPRIATION.

In 1885 Senator PLUMB, at the request of Judge Parkinson, Professor Swenson, and others, again labored for an appropriation for experiments with diffusion. It was shown by Judge Parkinson and all others interested in the sorghum-sugar industry that this was the only hope for success. Fifty thousand dollars for this purpose was again added to the agricultural appropriation bill, on the amendment of Senator PLUMB. This was expended at Ottawa, Kans., and in Louisiana. The report of the work at Ottawa closes as follows:

"1. By the process of diffussion 98 per cent. of the sugar in the cane was extracted, and the yield was fully double that obtained in the ordinary way.

"2. The difficulties to be overcome in the application of diffusion are wholly mechanical. With the apparatus on hand the following changes are necessary in order to be able to work 120 tons per day: (a) The diffusion cells should be made twice as large as they are now; that is, of 130 cubic feet capacity. (b) The opening through which the chips are discharged should be made as nearly as possible of the same area as a horizontal cross-section of the cell. (c) The forced feed of the cutters requires a few minor changes in order to prevent choking. (d) The appartus for delivering the chips to the cells should be remodeled so as to dispense with the labor of one man.

"3. The process of carbonatation for the purification of the juice is the only method which will give a limpid juice with a minimum of waste and a maximum of purity.

"4. By a proper combination of diffusion and carbonatation the experiments have demonstrated that fully 95 per cent. of the sugar in the cane can be placed on the market either as dry sugar or molasses.

"5. It is highly important that the Department complete the experiments so successfully inaugurated by making the changes in the machinery mentioned above and by the erection of a complete carbonatation outfit.

"Respectfully,

"H. W. WILEY, Chemist."

But while so much had been accomplished by the joint efforts of the United States Department of Agriculture and the Ottawa company, the financial results were so disastrous to the company as to leave them utterly unable to further cooperate with the Government in the prosecution of the work.

THE FORT SCOTT COMPANY ORGANIZED.

At this juncture Judge Parkinson saw that he must either submit to defeat or organize a new company to co-operate with the Department of Agriculture, should Congress be wise enough to make another appropriation. In this straight he went to Fort Scott and organized the Parkinson Sugar Company, which is now composed as follows: J. D. Hill, president; Eli Kearnes, vice-president; M. Swenson, secretary and chemist; W. Chenault, treasurer; W. L. Parkinson, manager; C. F. Drake, A. W. Walburn, W. W. Pusey, J. W. Converse, and David Richards.

Taking up the work where all others had failed, this company has taken a full share of the responsibilities and losses, until it has at last seen the Northern sugar industry made a financial success.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MAKES AN APPROPRIATION.

The report of 1885 showed such favorable results that in 1886 the House made an appropriation of $94,000, to be used in Louisiana, New Jersey, and Kansas. A new battery and complete carbonatation apparatus was erected at Fort Scott. About $60,000 of the appropriation was expended here in experiments in diffusion and carbonatation.

In his report Dr. Wiley arrived at the following conclusions:

"In a general review of the work the most important point suggested is the absolute failure of the experiments to demonstrate the commercial practicability of manufacturing sorghum sugar. The causes of this failure have been pointed out in the preceding pages, and it will only be necessary here to recapitulate them. They were—

"1. Defective machinery for cutting the canes and for elevating and cleaning the chips, and for removing the exhausted chips.

"2. The deterioration of the cane, due to much of it becoming overripe, but chiefly to the fact that much time would generally elapse after the canes were cut before they reached the diffusion battery. The heavy frost which came the 1st of October also injured the cane somewhat, but not until ten days or two weeks after it occurred.

"3. The deteriorated cane caused a considerable inversion of the sucrose in the battery, an inversion which was increased by the delay in furnishing chips, thus causing the chips in the battery to remain exposed under pressure for a much longer time then was necessary. The mean time required for diffusing one cell was twenty-one minutes, three times as long as it should have been.

"4. The process of carbonatation, as employed, secured a maximum yield of sugar, but failed to make a molasses which was marketable. This trouble arose from the small quantity of lime remaining in the filtered juices, causing a blackening of the sirup on concentration, and the failure of the cleaning apparatus to properly prepare the chips for diffusion."

THE COMMISSIONER OF AGRICULTURE DISCOURAGED.

After the expenditure of so much money, and the publication of so discouraging a report as that of 1886, the Commissioner of Agriculture declined to ask for further appropriations.* But Senator PLUMB again came to the rescue, and, by a faithful presentation of the possibilities of the case, induced Congress to make an appropriation of $50,000, of which $24,000 was apportioned to Louisiana, $6,000 to Rio Grande, N. J., and $20,000 to Fort Scott, Kans.†

SUCCESS AT LAST.

This year the Fort Scott management made careful selection of essential parts of the processes already used, omitted non-essential and cumbrous processes, availed themselves of all the experience of the past in this country, and secured a fresh infusion of experience from the beet-sugar factories of Germany, and attained the success which finally places sorghum-sugar making among the profitable industries of the country.

STATE ENCOURAGEMENT.

The State of Kansas had, by all reports, been indicated as the center of the sorghum-sugar industry when it should be developed. Kansas statesmen in the Legislature, as early as 1885, conceded that the State should assist in the development of the new industry. In that year Hon. R. F. Bond, member of the house from Rice County, prepared and introduced a bill providing for a bounty of 1½ cents per pound, to be paid out of the State treasury, on all sugar manufactured in the State for five years.

The bill awakened a great deal of enthusiasm, and at the same time a factious opposition, and was lost. At the session of 1887 Senator Bawden, of Bourbon County, introduced a bill providing for a bounty of 2 cents per pound to be paid upon all sugar manufactured in the State for five years, the maximum amount to be paid in any year being limited to $15,000. This bill became a law.

It will thus be seen that the present condition of the sorghum-sugar industry is due to private enterprise, aided by Government and State appropriations, and directed by scientific and practical skill.

COMMISSIONERS OF AGRICULTURE LE DUC, LORING, AND COLMAN.

It should be mentioned in this connection that United States Commissioner of Agriculture Le Duc extended a strong and friendly hand to the sorghum-sugar industry during his term of office. His successor, Commissioner Loring, had the work continued by Professor Wiley, but was himself skeptical as to results. The present Commissioner, Hon. Norman J. Colman, had been an advocate of sorghum for many years before his accession to office, and had probably written and published more on the subject than any other man in the United States. Every friend of the struggling industry was gratified at his appointment. He has extended all the aid at his command, and may justly feel proud of the attainment of the present success under his administration of the Department of Agriculture.

THE PRESENT STATE OF THE INDUSTRY.

The experiments in making sugar from sorghum, which, as above shown, have been in progress for several years at the expense of private capital and the United States Deparment of Agriculture, have this year reached so favorable results as to place the manufacture of sorghum sugar on the basis of a profitable business, as will be seen by the report to his company of Hon. W. L. Parkinson, manager of the Fort Scott works.

The success has been due to, first, the almost complete extraction of the sugars from the cane by the diffusion process; second, the prompt and proper treatment of the juice in defecating and evaporating; third, the efficient manner in which the sugar was boiled to grain in the strike pan.

On page 31 of said report the process of sugar-making from the sorghum cane as now developed is as follows:

First. The topped cane is delivered at the factory by the farmers who grow it.

Second. The cane is cut by a machine into pieces about ½ inches long.

Third. The leaves and sheaths are separated from the cut cane by fanning-mills.

Fourth. The cleaned cane is cut into fine bits called chips.

Fifth. The chips are placed in iron tanks, and the sugar "diffused"—soaked out with hot water.

Sixth. The juice obtained by diffusion has its acids nearly or quite neutralized with milk of lime, and is heated and skimmed.

Seventh. The defecated or clarified juice is boiled to a semi-sirup in vacuum pans.

Eighth. The semi-sirup is boiled "to grain" in a high vacuum in the "strike-pan."

Ninth. The mixture of sugar and molasses from the strike-pan is passed through a mixing machine into centrifugal machines, which throw out the molasses and retain the sugar.

After a very full presentation in detail of facts relating to this manufacture, Professor Cowgill concluded his report, as follows:

There seems to be no doubt but that there is here developed an industry of vast importance to our State and nation. For the year ending June 30, 1886, there was consumed in the United States, foreign grown and manufactured, sugar amounting to 2,989,881,765 pounds. If two thousand new sugar factories were at once erected, and each should produce an annual product of one and a quarter million pounds of sugar, they would not supply the place of the sugars now imported.

*The non-action of the Commissioner is misunderstood by Mr. Cowgill. When the House Committee on Agriculture made the appropriation of the preceding year it was agreed that no subsequent grant should be demanded. It was in harmony with this agreement and not for the reasons stated, that the Commissioner did not ask for a further appropriation.

†The distributton of the money to the various stations was left to the discretion of the Commissioner, and was not mentioned in the bill.

The annual consumption of sugar per capita in the United States is about 56 pounds. The population of Kansas may be taken as 1,500,000. These people consume each year—56 by 1,500,000 equal 84,000,000 pounds of sugar. It will be safe to say that the annual average product of the factories will not exceed 1,500,000 pounds; so that fifty-six factories will be required to supply the sugar consumed by the present population of Kansas, and for which they pay over $5,000,000 annually.

Processes whereby sugar can be made at a profit from sorghum have been worked out. These are far from perfect, but present developments give promise of others in the near future, and will enable us to produce our own sugar on our soil, with the labor of our people. Those who invest in the new industry will be cautious about experimenting with unknown conditions. Kansas is, therefore, likely to lead in the development and become the first Northern sugar State.

In view of these encouraging facts, who will venture to contradict when I make the prediction that within twenty years America will produce all the sugar her people consume. Why, then, should we hesitate to extend the reasonable aid of government to this new and wonderful industry? My own State, following the example of Kansas, has appropriated money to aid its development within her borders, and now, and in this presence, I declare myself ready to vote aid to the broader field—the entire country.

After disposing of sugar in this statesman-like manner, then let other articles on the dutiable list be carefully scanned with the view to a wise revision, and not a hasty destructive cutting and slashing at this or that article, as it may seem one section of the country may be able to slap the other in the face without being too seriously bruised in return. Let there be no boy's play about this matter, but a most careful, business-like consideration in broad daylight under the shining sun of noonday, and not in dark, impenetrable corners, within stone buildings carefully guarded against "the other side;" lest, perchance, the "tricks of the trade" be discovered.

Mr. Chairman, no person can more than touch here and there in one hour's discussion of the tariff. Numerous points of interest suggest themselves to my mind which I would like exceedingly to discuss. Many must necessarily be passed by in silence. I have noticed, however, that of the classes of people singled out in this discussion, the farmer, laboring man, and manufacturer are those receiving the most attention. The free-trader in profession is the devoted friend of the farmer, likewise of the laboring man. Oh, how he loves them! As the soul of Jonathan was knit to that of David, so, if you will let him tell it, is the soul of a free-trader knit to the farmer and laboring man; but these being thus knit together, according to the free-trader's imaginings, the manufacturer is the hated and destested Saul who is ever seeking to destroy them. I think I have shown how the Southern free-trader's soul in this case is "knit" to that of the farmer. The "knitting" is, in so far as every product of the farm is concerned, to the neglect of the farmer and pinning him to the free-list. Not in an open, frank, manly way, but by quietly dropping him out of sight as to practical benefits, while holding him up before him to smile upon and deceive, as matter of fact.

The manufacturer—that man or association of men engaged in lawful, honorable, and successful business, for whom every town or city East and West, and particularly in the West, is earnestly striving to have locate within the corporate limits, knowing well how much such enterprises properly conducted conduce to local prosperity and mutual business helpfulness—what a wretch is he in the eyes of his bitter foe, the free-trader!

Now, sir, there is one thing very patent to me in connection with the larger manufactories of whatsoever kind. Whatever the past, the time has come in the business history of this world when these extensive manufacturing interests can not be successfully carried on without putting together in the same enterprise large aggregations of capital. If it were possible to foresee events affecting any given industry, it can with truth be said that no man now so engaged could have been induced to thus subject his capital to the united purpose of a business if he could at the outset have seen not only that his reasonable annual accumulations might be uncertain, but that his capital would be exposed to certain loss, and no man or set of men now in any given manufacturing business will stay in it longer than they can not avoid, if it is certain they are not to make any money.

The success of all honorable, well-conducted business means the success of those immediately connected therewith as laborers and those engaged in other employments about them. So it is we of the West are laboring and planning to induce other gentlemen having money to come among us and build and operate enterprises that not only tend toward but do in fact enlarge the whole community's interests, and I am happy to say we are meeting with increasing success in this line. And let me say further that at the next census Iowa will surprise many of the incredulous in the growth of her manufacturing enterprises. The cities of that State, large and small, have been putting forth persistent efforts to secure capital from elsewhere than their immediate neighborhood to join with theirs in starting some new enterprise that should employ labor, and send forth blessings and good cheer not only, but add to the permanent property interests of those investing and the community. And I beg leave to cite one of the most striking illustrations of the success of this activity of our people.

In 1880 Sioux City had a population of 7,300. To-day she has over 30,000, and has witnessed a most marvelous growth and prosperity. How has this come? Not by accident. Not by waiting for the slow but sure development of the surrounding country alone. Mainly by reason of the determination of her people to make Sioux City a financial, commercial, manufacturing railroad center, and with tireless energy and liberal donations of money and grounds her citizens have secured a large foundry, plow factory, vinegar works, bottling works, flouring mills, immense flax mills, and numerous other important industries, and finally, to cap all, in addition to an old and extensive pork factory, long in operation, during 1887 her citizens secured the location of four immense pork and beef establishments, two of which are now in operation, having already constructed large plants, one by Silverhorn, the other by Fowler Brothers, costing hundreds of thousands of dollars, thus making Sioux City the largest meat center west of Chicago; and if any of you gentlemen who hear me are skeptical on this subject just make a trip to this rapidly-growing, only corn palace city of the world, and you will thereafter affirm the truthfulness of my statements.

With only two lines of railroad in 1870, she now has, with branches, ten, and others building. I tell you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, no gloomy picture of poverty-stricken farm life will fit that part of the country. Since 1879, the year of the last grasshopper appearance, thousands of farms have opened in Northwest Iowa on lands costing from $4 to $10 per acre, which, with reasonable improvements added, are now well worth $20 to $50 per acre, and, sir, I am proud of this opportunity to utter words of merited praise of that interesting prosperous section of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I have noticed the free-trade taunt that our manufactories are along the seaboard and away off from the farmers of the West, and therefore they might as well be across the ocean. Out upon such miserable nonsense as this!

While, as all know, the great institutions of trade, and especially to manufactures of cottons, woolens, etc., were early planted near the Atlantic, and that there the great bulk of them by the very reasonable law of the case will remain, yet he who will not cast his eye over the States of the West and see their growth in manufacture is blind beyond cure. You of the other side say we of the West can not have successful manufacture, and I say you do not know or else sadly pervert the facts. The whole great West is rapidly increasing in manufacture.

To illustrate this fact I have chosen Indiana, the smallest of Western States in area, having only 36,350 square miles gross area, and not the largest in point of manufacturing interests, Illinois being among the most important of the whole country.

In 1850 the mechanical and manufacturing establishments numbered 4,392; capital invested in them, $7,750,402; hands employed, 14,440; amount paid in wages, $3,728,844; value of materials, $10,369,700; value of products, $18,725,423.

And in 1880 the following magnificent increase was shown to exist: Number of establishments, 11,198; capital, $65,742,962; hands employed, 69,504; amount paid in wages, $21,960,888; value of materials, $100,262,917; value of product, $148,006,411.

Referring to the first biennial report (seventh volume) of the department of statistics for 1885 and 1886, on pages 24 and 25, after stating a table of statistics from which the above are taken, the author, William A. Peelle, jr., proceeds to say:

By consulting the foregoing table it will be seen that during the thirty years the number of establishments has increased 175 per cent.; capital, 828 per cent.; hands employed, 392 per cent.; total wages paid, 600 per cent.; value of material, 900 per cent.; value of products, 722 per cent. Since 1880 the increase has been steady and gratifying, and the sum totals, if they could be accurately obtained, would give to Indiana a proud prominence in the manufacturing industries of the country. It should be understood that the 11,198 establishments enumerated in the foregoing table do not include the mining operations of the State, nor those engaged in railroad work, other than car building and repairs. It would be difficult to exaggerate the importance of the questions which directly relate to labor, and by which are meant those enterprises which employ working people at stipulated wages by the day, week, or month. Even in Indiana the question forms an interesting study, and when considered for the entire United States its importance is increased an hundred fold.

The following figures, taken from the reports already referred to, will give the reader an idea of the gigantic strides by which this interest has advanced in the United States in the past thirty years:

Years.	Establishments.	Capital invested.	Number of persons employed.
1850	123,025	$533,245,351	957,059
1860	140,433	1,009,855,715	1,311,246
1870	252,148	2,118,208,769	2,053,996
1880	253,825	2,790,272,600	2,738,895

Years.	Amount of wages paid.	Value of materials.	Value of product.
1850	$236,755,467	$555,123,822	$1,019,166,616
1860	378,878,966	1,001,605,092	1,885,861,676
1870	775,584,343	2,488,427,242	4,232,325,442
1880	947,953,795	3,896,823,549	5,369,579,191

It will be observed from the foregoing table that during the thirty years named the increase has been as follows: In establishments, 108 per cent.; in capital, 423 per cent.; in employés, 200 per cent.; in wages, 300 per cent.; in value of material, 500 per cent.; in product, 400 per cent. It will be gratifying to know that Indiana in manufacturing enterprises has kept abreast of the advancing column of progress in such matters, and this may be readily seen in a recapitulation of the per cents. of growth in the United States and Indiana:

	Per cent. in United States.	Per cent. in Indiana.
Establishments	108	175
Capital invested	423	828
People employed	200	392
Wages paid	300	600
Value of material	500	900
Value of product	400	722

Such results as are shown by the foregoing figures are in the highest degree creditable to Indiana. They demonstrate that the people of the State are in active sympathy with the spirit of advancement and improvement abroad in the world, and that the State has taken a position in labor affairs which calls for a department as an adjunct to this bureau that shall be devoted entirely to the collection, compilation, and arrangement of labor statistics.

Among the establishments making up the grand total of 11,885 in 1886, were 73 agricultural; capital in grounds, buildings, and machinery, $1,846,950; average number employés, 1,719; total annual wages, $1,112,724; total value of manufactured product, $3,147,135. Boots and shoes, 1,270 establishments; capital in building, etc., $996,987; average number employés, 2,041; total wages, $723,355; value manufactured goods per annum, $1,800,830. Carriage manufactories and shops, 238; capital in buildings, etc., $821,455; average number employés, 1,613; value manufactured product, $2,121,760; total annual wages paid, $716,840. Drain tile establishments, 345; capital in buildings, etc., $1,153,607; average number employés, 2,166; value annual product, $1,751,945; total annual wages paid, $497,669.

Furniture and cabinet shops, 286; capital in building, etc., $2,919,610; average number employés, 5,729; value annual product, $6,913,298; total paid for wages, $2,423,865. Planing and saw mills combined, and saw-mills separate, 1,378; capital in building, etc., $4,668,366; average number employés, 9,194; value annual product, $14,333,319; total annual wages paid, $2,460,818.

Wagon manufactories, 289; capital in buildings, etc., $1,223,533; average number employés, 2,286; value annual product, $3,654,336; total paid for wages, $869,320.

And lastly, of those I will take time to mention—but not by any means least—is woolen mills: Number, 52; capital in buildings, etc., $1,167,802; average number employés, 2,038; annual value of product, $3,052,730; total wages paid, $869,359.

And, sir, I venture to say that when the census of 1890 is taken it will show a continuance of this same prosperity not only in the small State of Indiana, but extending over the entire West.

There are now fifty-two woolen mills in the State, producing over $3,000,000 of goods annually and paying over $600,000 in wages for the same period.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], in his effort to show the failure of protection, cited the decrease of woolen mills in the six New England States from 1870 to 1880, the decrease being one hundred and seventeen in number, but he had not one word in his whole speech about the growth of the West, not a word of Indiana's splendid development, not a word of Indiana's gratifying exhibit of manufacturing enterprise.

Ah, BYNUM! BYNUM! statesman from the West, tall of form and handsome of face, why, in your mad zeal to defend the fallacious theory of free trade, should you thus turn from and ignore the glorious facts of which your own Western section is the abundant possessor?

I say the West is coming to the front on this subject—not as rapidly as we from that part of the land would like, but surely coming, and the next census will reveal the truth of this statement.

Why, sir, Illinois has among her many and important manufacturing establishments five cotton manufactories. Four years ago a large and valuable one was constructed, and has since been operated, in Aurora, the home of the gentleman from that district, Mr. HOPKINS. I do not presume it has made much above expenses, but the last I knew of it it was operating and employing a considerable number of hands.

An authoritative report from these mills at Aurora, Ill., makes the following showing:

Date of construction	1884
Cost of plant	$325,000.00
Capital in business	$75,000.00
Number of hands employed	230
Wages paid annually	$65,000.00
Value of annual output	$350,000.00
Number of looms	424

Other mills of this kind will follow. At this time, in the city of Des Moines, ground is being broken for a large cotton-mill. The splendid condition of Iowa was well portrayed by my colleague [Governor GEAR] last week in his speech on this bill. None know better than he how grandly Iowa has developed. Ours is an agricultural people, and yet so much do we appreciate the value of a diversity of employments that most active efforts are being put forth to induce capital to come among us and build up enterprises that shall afford and promote labor. And while we are comparatively young in years, and particularly in manufacturing, we are not ashamed of our progress.

Last week Governor GEAR flung out before your gaze a pair of excellent Iowa-made woolen blankets, the product of a mill that is operating at some profit, I trust, away out in the West—in Iowa. And when the next discussion comes on upon this subject in 1890, in the Fifty-first Congress, he will no doubt ask you to examine a fine bolt of cotton manufactured at the capital of our State.

The exhibit we now make is by no means insignificant. Mechanical and manufacturing establishments, 6,921; capital invested, $33,987,886; whole number employés, men, women, and youth, 28,354; total amount paid in wages per year, $9,725,962; value of material used, $48,754,311.

Value annual products, $71,045,926; of capital invested in woolen establishments, there is $553,500; hands employed, 7,112; total annual wages paid, $117,792. And before leaving Iowa permit me to say that her condition, in point of manufacturing interests, is one of inf n ty.

Unequal and iniquitous discriminations in freight charges more than anything else have retarded manufacturing in the West. With the amendments to the interstate-commerce law that are certain of realization, and the continued improvement in the matter of equitable administration of the railroad business of the country, let me tell all of you gentlemen that the West with its magnificent water-powers, its gold, silver, coal, iron, and other minerals, is going to have a future, grand and glorious. And the West is willing, yea anxious, to co-operate with the East and the South in every good word and work calculated to advance the welfare and prosperity of our entire land. All she asks is an even, fair chance with other sections of the land in the matter of cheapness and equity of transportation, not only for her products East, but for yours of the East and South in return; that the products of other sections of the land which she must have may come to her borders bearing every legitimate and proper charge for every dollar of honest use of capital, compensation to laborers who handle them, and reasonable, necessary cost of transportation, but in no case and to no extent burdened with the inequity of a forced cost, the result of trusts and combines.

That which the West now most views with alarm is the disposition of moneyed men to conspire together to create unnatural and unjustifiable charges in retail establishments for articles they consume, while those from the farm must from the very nature of things always go to the markets free from any but the most reasonable and usual conditions and charges. Only when these products fall into the hands of capitalists can they be in the least manipulated, as oil, sugar, and numerous other necessary articles of consumption are now wickedly controlled by unconscionable financial pirates whose greed for gain is limited only by their inability to include the known world in their schemes of robbery.

If the West can be saved from the piracy of "trusts" and "combines," and have those natural conditions in other respects to which I have heretofore referred, she will maintain the reputation of the Western farmer and business man for thrift, energy, and business success.

Neither are Iowa farmers free-traders, no matter what they may be in Minnesota. At the last annual meeting of the Iowa State Grange the farmers spoke out in most positive tones on this question. I read part of their resolutions:

Resolved, 1. That the time has arrived in the history of our State and nation when the farmers should unite for the protection of their rights and the promotion of their interests morally, socially, intellectually, and financially.

2. We demand such a revision of the tariff laws as will protect the producer as well as the manufacturer.

3. That that part of President Cleveland's message referring to the reduction of the tariff is a direct blow at the farmers of this country, and in favor of monopoly.

4. That a great reduction of the tariff on all raw material produced in this country would greatly embarrass the agriculturists, while it would not accomplish the object sought; namely, a reduction of the revenue.

5. That a reduction of the tariff on articles produced in this country will not reduce the revenue, but increase the surplus, and, therefore, depreciate the value of our produce.

Now, Mr. Chairman, some remarks on the question of labor and laboring men, and I am done.

The Democratic party has no more of a monopoly of the fate and fortune of the laboring man than it has reputation for saving the Union from dismemberment. I grant that it never has armed itself against the former as it did against the latter; and, further than this, I am prepared to say it desires the best good of all the toilers of the land; but conceding this does not in the least argue that the Republican party has not been deeply concerned about the welfare of this class. No man having regard for truth can say that this party has neglected those whose days and nights are too heavily weighted with burdens we would all see lightened. The faith of the Republican party has ever been, and is, that the wisest national policy is the one that will afford to our toiling masses the most varied fields of employment; that will strengthen all forms of existing industry and constantly build up new ones; that as the West settles and develops every new enterprise possible of successful operation shall be brought into being, and thus aid most materially in fostering and sustaining her great distinguishing industry—the farm.

The Democratic party charges that we Republicans protect everything but labor, thus flatly contradicting a settled economic principle that labor and capital are inseparably connected with the other. We aim by making it possible for capital to find profitable investment to assure labor of healthful occupation, knowing that no profit can come to capital anywhere unless it call labor to its side and engage its assistance.

But have we not favored the protection of labor in other ways? Has not the Republican party indicated its desire to further protect labor by enacting legislation seeking to curtail Chinese immigration and joining the Democrats in prohibiting so-called contract labor? Most certainly.

And now, Mr. Chairman, one more point upon this question of our duty to our laboring classes, and I will close. The conditions of the crowded Old World with its dense population ought ere this to have aroused the statesmanship of America to a solemn duty not yet performed, and I fear not yet fully appreciated. It is maintained that when our population in all parts of this country shall be as numerous as theirs, we will be in their condition as to poverty and wretchedness of her dependent millions. I can not say it may not be so; at least, I fear it will come painfully near being so. Is there nothing, then, the Congress of the United States may do to postpone that day to the farthest limit possible? In all this debate, in so far as I have been able to attend upon it, not a word is remembered calling attention to the unrestricted immigration now and for years flowing in upon us from nearly every country on the other hemisphere. And what a spectacle it is. Why, sir, think of it. Over 471,000 upon an average each year received to these shores during the past eight years, and on they come and will come unceasingly, unless the Congress of the United States takes action to prevent.

I am aware sir, that this is a delicate question, one likely to provoke discussion, and perhaps unfriendly criticism in our respective districts, but in reflecting on the condition of labor now and of its probable future in this country, I have been led to the decided conviction that it is the duty of this Government to give serious and timely attention to this matter. Can we, in the very nature of things, permit this tremendous influx of people and not expect the most serious consequences to the whole country?

I am not speaking now as one alarmed because of a spirit of anarchy here and there in the land, for it appears to me the majesty of the law of Illinois has pretty effectually discouraged the violence of anarchy, if not the thing itself. Have we room for the born and unborn millions of Europe and Asia? No thoughtful person will say we have, but all will agree that some day a barrier must be raised. But when? Why not commence to deliberate earnestly about it now, and act? It is not yet too late. We still have room for all now within our borders, from whatsoever clime they have come, unless it be John Chinaman. He must go—i. e. if we have the power to make him—or he must, if away, remain; but all the rest of earth may come. Oh, the bald inconsistency of such a position!

Mr. Chairman, in a sense we are all foreigners, and in another I profoundly trust we are all Americans. It is our duty, as it should be our pleasure, to legislate for the benefit of our whole population, no matter whence they have come or whither they may go.

I would ask no question of any now here—whence came you—what your nationality or religion; but I would propound questions and insist on truthful answers of the untold millions yet to come, unless prohibited so doing.

It is a most difficult problem, I know, in the face of our unbroken history; but certain it is the common good—the welfare and prosperity of those who are designated as foreigners, their children and children's children—demands that the present rate of immigration should be at no distant day largely curtailed; and the statesman—be he Democrat or Republican—who shall successfully, and upon the fairest, most humane, and patriotic basis, propose and carry into effect legislation satisfactory to the American people, will have done his country a service of which his children may well be proud.

In order to bring to the minds of the members of this House the solemn facts with which we have to deal, I submit herewith tables found in the quarterly report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, No. 2, 1887–'88, bearing on the numbers and nationalities of those who compose the immense number of people who are coming to us annually from other lands.

Shall we drift along years to come in a sense of security from the dangers of an overcrowded, unemployed population, or shall we, in a spirit of "charity to all and malice toward none," seek in this great question the ultimate good of every man, woman, and child in our great and beneficent Republic?

Mr. COWLES. Mr. Chairman, I make no apology for taking a portion of the time set apart for the discussion of the bill now under consideration, in the subject-matter of which the people whom I have the honor to represent on this floor are so much interested.

Sir, the question of taxation is one of the first importance in every system of government, and its adjustment upon a proper basis and in proper degree, suited to the exercise of freedom and to the material prosperity of the citizen, is one of the greatest responsibilities of legislation. Especially is this so in a free Republic like ours, where all sovereignty abides with the people, and the officials of the Government, from the highest to the lowest, are but the servants or agents, if you please, of the people, intrusted for a limited time with the conduct of public affairs.

The unnecessary exercise of the taxing power robs the pocket of the citizen of more than is sufficient for the necessities of Government, and becomes an engine of oppression, which, in the hands of tyrants, is frequently the lever power for uprooting free institutions by gradual encroachment upon the rights of the people; and is a baneful influence in the extravagance and corruption which it engenders, and the constant temptation to wrong growing out of an overflowing Treasury.

The founders of government, and all those who come in the course of time to the enjoyment of its blessings, expect to be required to pay into the common fund their proportionate part of the taxes necessary for its economical and honest administration; but when we go beyond this, and persist for years and years in collecting for each year millions of money more than is necessary for the expenses of government, extravagant as they may be, we justly incur the indignation of an outraged people. That there is too much money collected by our different systems of taxation no one can deny, though some would, I believe, if the record did not stare them in the face with such an indisputable array of facts and figures; therefore, what to lop off and where to reduce should be the only matters of inquiry in the mind of any patriot who sits here as a representative of the American people. Partisan feeling should not enter into this inquiry, and the legitimate questions growing out of this bill should be considered purely as a most serious and important business proposition in which the welfare of the whole people whom we represent is involved.

It does no good to call each other hard names, nor is it profitable to recite the events of a quarter of a century and more ago, unless they bear upon the situation of our present duties and difficulties, and even then such references should be made in a manner not to arouse unpleasant feeling.

I know there are difficulties among those who sit on this side of the House as to the plan of reduction, the specific articles that should be included in it, and the limit to which it should extend as to each. I have no doubt but that, to some extent at least, the same differences exist on the opposite side of the House; therefore we should bear in mind that in the consideration of questions of this character, involving such diverse interests and matters of diverse opinion, conclusions are almost invariably reached through the medium of concession.

I have listened, sir, with a great deal of interest and, I trust, profit to the discussion as far as it has gone. The agitation of this most important question will certainly do good, and I think, sir, that I "can read between the lines" that ere long much that is useless and oppressive will be abolished and the means for raising revenue will be settled upon a business basis; not for the purpose of favoring monopolies; not to protect and enrich the few at the expense of the many, and they the poorer classes, but for the purpose solely of raising revenue sufficient for the necessary expenditures of the Government, and that, too, so as to distribute the burden in accordance with the ability to bear. It may not be done now, but the people are aroused, and they will and should be heard.

They demand, sir, that their money shall not be taken and locked up to be kept from the circulation that they so much need, or squandered in extravagant appropriations to pampered jobs, only to be again rapidly collected by the same system, to be again squandered. It is as impossible under the present system of revenue to maintain the circulation to the requisite standard for the needs of commerce and trade as it is for an eel to sustain life by continually swallowing himself.

Sir, we have too much revenue and too many systems of revenue. Strike down that which is effete and has been permitted to remain beyond the period of its allotted time, and give vital force and energy to that which since the organization of this Government has been established and maintained as the true source of Federal revenue.

It is not my purpose, sir, to enter into a minute discussion of the details of the present tariff laws or the proposed changes therein. The whole field has been gone over time and again in its discussion, and there are other gentlemen yet to speak to whom the whole country will look for information, who, it is expected, will deal principally with this part of our revenue system. But, sir, there is another branch of our revenue system to which I wish to pay my respects before I am done. To do this in order I wish to state that I understand it to be conceded on all sides that a revision of the tariff, not by increasing the free-list, but by reducing the tax on imported goods to the true revenue basis, which is to the point that foreign manufacturers will be able to pay and bring in their goods and commodities and exchange them for our goods and commodities, would very much increase the revenue now raised by the tariff; and I believe it is generally conceded that sufficient revenue can by this means be raised by the tariff alone for all the necessary expenses of Government.

I know that the argument was made by members on both sides of this House, in discussing the question of a reduction of the surplus in the Treasury in the Forty-ninth Congress, that, by a reduction of the duty on foreign goods or importations, you thereby would increase the surplus. If so, and it stands to reason that it is so, why not make the reduction of the tariff to a business basis and repeal the odious internal-revenue laws?

Impost duty or customs, which is but another name for tariff, in order to amount to a protective tariff must be and is so high as greatly to retard or prohibit the introduction of foreign goods and commodities, thus "protecting" those who produce these goods and commodities here from foreign competition, and thereby preventing a lowering of the price to the consumer. Now, however necessary to the fostering of our manufacturing interests this course may have been in the earlier days of our history, that time has long since passed, and the American manufacturers of to-day compete most successfully with the world in anything that it is profitable from natural causes to manufacture here, so that having the competition shut off from abroad by a very high protective tariff, they combine together here in "trusts" and "pools," which are nothing more than an agreement that they will not sell any given article or class of articles for less than a certain price in order to prevent competition among themselves, and thus, notwithstanding the increase of manufacturing interests, they keep up fictitious values at a high protective standard.

And it is a fact in the current history of trade that when, as frequently occurs, there is an overproduction of manufactures here the excess of goods is conveyed to foreign countries and sold at greatly reduced prices than they are offered for here, thus showing that protection for the sake of protecting has ceased to be necessary to the interests of our manufacturers, and that a tariff for revenue for the sake of revenue, affording them the benefit of the revenue-tariff tax, would be sufficient.

Placing articles on the free-list does not always benefit the consumer here, and especially is this so when the articles are not produced in this country at all, for it sometimes is taken advantage of by the foreign countries producing the article to place on it a moderate export tax whereby the consumer, instead of paying a moderate tariff tax into our own Treasury, is paying a moderate export tax into the treasury of the foreign country. A healthy tariff tax, one that will admit of foreign trade and intercourse and thereby extend the markets of our own products to the world, and at the same time pay a revenue into the Treasury, is what we need. I am, sir, in favor of a tariff for revenue only, and revenue only by the tariff. I am not now and never expect to be a free-trader. Abolish the internal-revenue tax and system, and address ourselves to the tariff in a businesslike way, knowing that we have to raise revenue enough to answer the needs of the Government, and it can be easily done.

Whilst we are arranging this, if there should be any deficiency, we certainly have surplus enough in the Treasury to temporarily answer that, and if it should be necessary to supplement the revenue received by the tariff, then, sir, the most just plan and the least vexatious is to place the additional burden where it will be easiest borne—upon incomes. The burden of a protective tariff falls upon the consumers, who are for the most part poor people who earn their livelihood by labor, many of them toiling in the fields to make the very staple used in the factories, and the price of which is regulated by a foreign market. If our chief industries are still in their "infancy" they have been dwarfed by protection. Give them the fresh, stirring air of American liberty to spread and try their strength in exercise with other industries of like nature, and they will become more self-reliant, and the generous health that competition—which is truly said to be "the life of trade"—will infuse into them will extend through all branches of our industries, including the noblest and most essential of all, that of those who under burning suns "make their bread by the sweat of their brows," and upon whose labor government itself depends; without which neither church nor state can prosper, and the "infant industries," of which we hear so much talk, one and all, could not budge a spindle. What protection have the farming class but in the labor of their own strong arms?

Ah, sir, when we hear talk of labor here it is not the labor that fells the forests and converts waste lands into fertile fields and pastures. We hear nothing of the labor that turns the clods, but it is always the labor of the loom and the labor of the shops, labor on Government contracts, on the railroads, in the mines, and everywhere that is to be tenderly cared and legislated for, but not the labor that with sun-browned hands plows and digs the fields, making not only the staple and the bread and meats that clothes and feeds himself and family, but the staple and the bread and meat that clothes and feeds us all.

There is no protection for that class of labor; yet upon its massive and good-natured shoulders rests the burden of the world. "Infant industries" indeed! Ah, sir, there are other "infants" in this land that claim some "protection;" and these are the little rosy-cheeked cherubs with sunny hair and bright, sparkling eyes, that wear the little white and pink dresses and make glad the heart of the father as he returns from the fields. Let us lessen taxation and increase the circulation of money and its more equal distribution for their benefit. This—the scarcity of money—is an important question, as I believe, growing out of the present condition of the revenue laws; and they are responsible, in great measure, for the stringency of money matters for several years past and now. A rich and overflowing Treasury, sir, makes a poor people, whether the unnecessary taxes be levied and collected off of what are termed "luxuries" or "necessities" of life, for it takes money to pay taxes, and all money withdrawn from the people in this way leaves that much less for the payment of debts and the ordinary transaction of business, and this, sir, in my opinion, is the true cause of the hard times of which we hear, and justly hear, so much complaint.

And another result concomitant with this and growing out of the protective system of taxation, are the complaints of the wage-earners—the employés of the combinations of capital, which under this system easily control the money and markets of the whole country. They appreciate the advantage of the protective system to the employer in the increased profits of the business, and clamor for a share of the profits in increase of wages. Strikes and riots are the result, shaking the peace of communities and damming up the channels of commerce. The intelligent laborer sees the inequality of a system that protects wealth and leaves poverty naked; and so long as this system of taxation is maintained for protection and colossal fortunes are realized to the protected, with a rapidity that rivals the story of the wonderful power of Aladdin's lamp, out of the interests thus protected, and by the labor of the toiling millions of poor laborers of both sexes, so long will this feeling of unrest and dissatisfaction continue, and strikes and riots multiply until hydra-headed anarchy, crouching in the weeds of corruption and fostered by a system which tends to make the rich richer and the poor poorer, will at last threaten the very vitals of Government and the liberties of the people with its poisonous fangs.

Sir, it is high time to call a halt. Go look at the money-bags hoarded up under this double-barreled system of revenue in the building that stands at the other end of the avenue! See the returns for a day: and that to-day: $575,236 from customs, $948,768 from internal revenue. Look at the statement of the amount for the last month: Customs, $17,202,374.59, and from internal revenue for same period, $9,893,-649.03, and of the amount on hand, and realize that this is drawn from the legitimate profits of labor, and ask yourself the question, if it is not wonderful that the people are so patient. Hard times in this country? Why should this exist? A soil more fruitful and diversified, a climate more beneficent, a people more industrious and naturally intelligent can not be found anywhere on the face of the earth. There are no natural causes for prolonged hard times, and they must exist from abnormal causes somewhere in the body-politic. We are now feeling about the root of the evil; let us have the manhood to pluck it up, root and branch, and leave the surplus where it belongs—in the pockets of the people.

Does New England need to be "protected" longer from Old England? Why, put her on her mettle and make her throw off her swaddling clothes of "over-grown infancy," and she can beat England at her own game. The South and West might with more propriety call for a protective tariff, if such measure were constitutional, against New England, but with our advantage in the South of having our factories in the midst of the cotton-fields, I think all the protection we need is that contemplated by the Constitution—a tariff for revenue.

The amount of the tariff is paid by the importer, be he a foreigner or one of our own citizens. Now, there is scarcely any one so simple as to suppose that the importer buys the goods abroad and brings them here at his own expense, and pays the tariff as a gratuity for the benefit of the consumer, who finally buys the goods and consumes or wears them out, though there are some who endeavor to gull the people by making this argument, and ask with great gusto: "Who pays any tariff? Mr. Jones, do you pay any tariff? Mr. Smith, does any marshal or sheriff in this country collect any tariff of you? No, sir! the rich importer pays the tariff." Then you should ask him this question: "Do you pay any freight on the goods you buy at the store? Does the merchant when he makes out your bill, make a charge of so much for freight, or does the sheriff come around and collect the freight? No, sir; the rich merchant pays the freight."

But how long do you suppose the merchant would hold up if when he comes to marking and pricing his goods to you as a customer he took no account of the cost of laying them down at his store? We know from experience that the merchant charges for the cost of carriage by steam-boat, by railroad, and by wagon and team in the price he asks for the goods, for it is as much a part of the cost to him as the original cost of the goods, and the consumer, be he farmer, mechanic, lawyer, doctor, or preacher, pays the freight when he buys the goods to use, and it is just so with the tariff.

For instance, a man buys goods in New York or Baltimore and offers them for sale in any town in my State; does not any one know that he adds in the cost of bringing goods from where they are first bought to the point where he offers them for sale, and that it is just as much a part of the cost to him as if it had been a part of the first price paid for the goods, and that putting this to the first cost he adds his own per cent., and that the customer pays it all when he pays for the goods? So that to say that the importer pays the tax and not the people who buy the goods is an attempt to deceive. The tariff is as much a tax upon the consumer as if it was levied upon his property and collected out of it. It is simply one of the modes of raising revenue, one of the modes of taxation, and to my mind, as we have to support and pay taxes to General Government in some way, I prefer the mode by the tariff to that of any other, provided it is adjusted, as any tax should be, solely for the purpose of raising revenue, and not for the purpose of keeping out commerce and revenue, fostering monopolies, and rendering possible "pools" and "trusts," and thereby making necessary the extraordinary mode of internal-revenue taxes.

It is true that good men of both parties differ on this question, just as they do on many other questions that arise from time to time as the exigencies of public affairs may bring forth. For instance, the currency question, as to whether we shall have a suspension of the coinage of silver, or as to whether we shall have the one standard, and that of gold, instead of the two—gold and silver; whether we shall have national-bank money or only Treasury notes, or whether we shall abolish both and return to the old State-bank system had before the war, and good men and good Democrats may hold their old opinions on all such questions and still be good Democrats, as ascertained by that touchstone of principles contained in the first inaugural of the great and immortal Jefferson, the founder of our party, and to whose writings and teachings we would all do well to recur occasionally. The cardinal principles of Democracy are deeper, broader, stronger, and more inflexible than any of these questions. The former exist like a rule of right for all time and under all circumstances; the latter must of necessity change and accommodate themselves to the exigencies of the times for which they may be provided. What I understand to be the cardinal principles of Democracy are so beautifully and succinctly stated by Mr. Jefferson in his first inaugural that it will not be amiss for me to quote them here:

Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political; peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations—entangling alliances with none; the support of the State governments in all their rights, as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns and the surest bulwarks against anti-republican tendencies; the preservation of the General Government in its whole constitutional vigor, as the sheet-anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad; a jealous care of the right of election by the people—a mild and safe corrective of abuses which are lopped by the sword of revolution where peaceable remedies are unprovided; absolute acquiescence in the decisions of the majority—the vital principle of republics, from which there is no appeal but to force, the vital principle and immediate parent of despotism; a well-disciplined militia—our best reliance in peace and for the first moments of war, till regulars may relieve them; the supremacy of the civil over military authority; economy in the public expense, that labor may be lightly burdened; the honest payment of our debts and sacred preservation of the public faith; encouragement of agriculture, and of commerce as its handmaid; the diffusion of information and the arraignment of all abuses at the bar of public reason; freedom of religion; freedom of the press; freedom of person under the protection of the habeas corpus; and trial by juries impartially selected.

And he concludes then with this beautiful commentary:

They should be the creed of our political faith, the text of civil instruction, the touchstone by which to try the services of those we trust; and should we wander from them in moments of error or alarm let us hasten to retrace our steps and to regain the road which alone leads to peace, liberty, and safety.

Now, sir; the man who receives this faith and keeps it will prove his faith by his works and vote the Democratic ticket, for these are the essentials, the very life, soul, and blood of the body, and all other questions are subordinate thereto.

There are many other pages in the writings of this great statesman that are profitable reading now. He came to his administration in times not unlike these. It was after the great struggle of the Revolution and at a time when the country, involved in the debt incident to the war and the other expenses of government, had resorted to the duplex system of revenue which we have now, tariff and internal revenue.

When Mr. Jefferson came to the administration of public affairs quite a surplus for the times had gathered in the Treasury and continued to increase. The same complaints existed among the people that we now hear and have heard so long of the vexatious, oppressive, and obnoxious internal-revenue laws. What, under these circumstances, do we find among the first utterances of this great man with a heart always big with sympathy for the people, with a mind fully imbued with the causes which led to the great struggle for independence, the principles of our Constitution and Government, that he had so large a share in framing, and with a desire to maintain the freedom and liberties of the citizen in all his domestic and State affairs without unnecessary interference on the part of the General Government.

We find in his first annual message to Congress these words:

Other circumstances combined with the increase of numbers have produced an augmentation of revenue arising from consumption in a ratio far beyond that of population alone, and, though the changes of foreign relations now taking place so desirably for the world may for a season affect this branch of revenue, yet, weighing all probabilities of expense as well as of income, there is reasonable ground of confidence that we may safely dispense with all internal taxes, comprehending excises, stamps, auctions, licenses, carriages, and refined sugars, to which the postage on newspapers may be added to facilitate the progress of information, and that the remaining sources of revenue will be sufficient to provide for the support of Government, to pay the interest of the public debt, and to discharge the principals in shorter periods than the laws or the general expectation has contemplated. War, indeed, and untoward events may change this prospect of things and call for expenses which the imposts could not meet; but sound principles will not justify our taxing the industry of our fellow-citizens to accumulate treasure for wars to happen we know not when, and which might not perhaps happen but from the temptations offered by that treasure.

And again we find in the same document:

When we consider that this Government is charged with the external and mutual relations only of these States; that the States themselves have principal care of our persons, our property, and our reputation, constituting the great field of human concerns, we may well doubt whether our organization is not too complicated, too expensive; whether offices and officers have not been multiplied unnecessarily, and sometimes injuriously to the service they were intended to promote. I will cause to be laid before you an essay toward a statement of those who, under public employment of various kinds, draw money from the Treasury or from our citizens. Time has not permitted a perfect enumeration, the ramifications of office being too multiplied and remote to be completely traced in a first trial. Among those who are dependent on executive discretion I have begun the reduction of what was deemed necessary. * * * The inspectors of internal revenue who were found to obstruct the accountability of the institution have been discontinued.

And again, in his second annual message, we find the following, congratulating the country on what had been done:

When effects so salutary result from the plans you have already sanctioned, when merely by avoiding false objects of expense we are able, without a direct tax, without internal taxes, and without borrowing, to make large and effectual payments toward the discharge of our public debt and the emancipation of our posterity from that moral canker, it is an encouragement, fellow-citizens, of the highest order to proceed as we have begun, in substituting economy for taxation and in pursuing what is useful for a nation placed as we are, rather than what is practiced by others under different circumstances.

And lastly I will quote from his second inaugural address:

The suppression of unnecessary offices, of useless establishments and expenses enabled us to discontinue our internal taxes. These, covering our land with officers and opening our doors to their intrusions, had already begun that process of domiciliary vexation which, once entered, is scarcely to be restrained from reaching successively every article of produce and property. If among these taxes some minor ones fell which had not been inconvenient, it was because their amount would not have paid the officers who collected them, and because, if they had any merit, the State authorities might adopt them instead of others less approved.

There are more people in this country than many seem to have any idea of that think this is mighty good reading now. The Democratic platform adopted at Chicago arraigned the Republican party for not relieving the people of "crushing war taxes," which I suppose my friends on this side of the House who differ with me as to the repeal of the internal revenue will say applies only to the tariff; but, sir, in the same instrument under which banner we fought and won in the last campaign it goes on to say:

From the foundation of this Government taxes collected at the custom-house have been the chief source of Federal revenue. Such they must continue to be.

And still further on it pronounces that—

The system of direct taxation known as the "internal revenue" is a war tax, and so long as the war continues, etc.

Going on to declare how it should be applied.

In another Democratic platform of the same year, that of my own State, there is no such uncertain sound. It says:

Resolved, That we are in favor of the unconditional and immediate abolition of the whole internal-revenue system, as an intolerable burden, a standing menace to freedom of elections, and a source of great annoyance and corruption in its practical operation.

Resolved, That no Government has the right to burden its people with taxes beyond the amount required to pay its necessary expenses and gradually extinguish its public debt; and that whenever the revenues, however derived, exceed this amount, they should be reduced so as to avoid a surplus in the Treasury. We therefore urge upon our Senators and Representatives in Congress to exert themselves in favor of such legislation as will secure this end.

Resolved, That with respect to the tariff, we reaffirm the life-long and fundamental principles of the party as declared in the national Democratic platforms, and that the details of the method by which the constitutional revenue tariff shall be gradually reached, are subjects which the party's representatives at the Federal capital must be trusted to adjust; but in our opinion the duties on foreign importations should be levied for the production of public revenue, and the discrimination in its adjustment should be such as would place the highest rates on luxuries and the lowest on the necessaries of life, distribute as equally as possible the burdens of taxation, and confer the greatest good to the greatest number of the American people.

And this, sir, is supplemented by the executive committee of the Democratic party of North Carolina in the following resolution, adopted October 19, 1887:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this Democratic State executive committee that the internal-revenue laws should be immediately repealed; and our Democratic members of Congress are requested to use their influence, as they have heretofore done, to have said laws repealed, and to secure such modification of the tariff as will lessen the duties upon imports to such extent as will be possible, consistent with the economical administration of the Government.

And again, on February 23, 1888, they say:

Whereas the Democratic Legislatures of 1874, 1883, and 1885 passed resolutions asking for the repeal of the internal-revenue laws; and

Whereas the Democratic State convention held in Raleigh in June, 1884, unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That we are in favor of the unconditional and immediate repeal of the whole internal-revenue system as an intolerable burden, a standing menace to freedom of elections, and a source of great annoyance and corruption in its practical operations:" Now, therefore,

Resolved, That this Democratic State executive committee, in session at Raleigh, February 23, 1888, reaffirms the declarations of the Democratic party of North Carolina, and also reaffirms its own declaration made on the 19th of October, 1887, in favor of abolishing the whole internal-revenue system.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each member of Congress from North Carolina.

Sir, the platform and resolutions that have just been read voice the convictions and the hope of the Democratic party of my State, and with them I, sir, am and always have been in the fullest accord; and, sir, in their advocacy and support I claim the right of a free representative of a free people to act in accordance with my convictions, and I shall not go out of my party to do so; and I shall always, here and everywhere, stand by its cardinal principles, that so much concern the greatest blessing that a people can enjoy, that of personal liberty.

The aspiration to be free was planted in the breast of man as he came from the hand of the great Creator, and though often and for long periods crushed and oppressed until the darkness of usurpation and tyranny seemed to envelop the world and scarcely a glimmer of its pure ray could be seen, yet struggling ever upward through darkness toward the light, it still lives to enjoy the fullest realization of the hope that has sustained it always, in the Government founded and transmitted to us by our fathers.

The idea of Mr. Jefferson was to sustain the Federal Government by a tariff on imports and leave direct taxation for the States, and to be regulated by them. What a blessing this would be now. If he had lived at this period he would have seen a larger country suffering in greater proportion than its increased size from the same abuses he endeavored, with so much success, to reform in his own day and time, and there is no just reason to suppose that his mighty influence, united with the great majority of his own State, as well as of mine, would not be exerted now, as then, to rid the people of "internal-revenue taxes," "covering our land with officers," "and opening our doors to their intrusions," "which once entered is scarcely to be restrained from reaching every article of production and property."

These are his very words, and in quoting them to you I am reminded that only last session we were called upon to add to this system of taxation the "butter bill," which was done, and this session we are called upon to pass the "lard bill," which I am afraid will be done, and when we set a bad thing or principle in motion, with a downward grade and as greasy a track as these two articles make, who can say where it will stop? The principle of these taxes is all wrong, and if I know what constitutes Democracy, it is undemocratic. The Democratic party of North Carolina is as honest and true as any political organization that ever existed in this country, and upon its success and control of our State government I verily believe depend the honor, the peace, and prosperity of our good old State. I have never deserted her in any struggle, and I can not and will not do so now, and mark my prediction, as the Democracy of North Carolina stood then, so it stands now and will stand in the coming campaign. She will not change because the flesh-pots of the revenue department have been transferred from Republican to Democratic officials.

We can not afford to barter the priceless inheritance of our manhood as a people and a party of principle for such a mess of pottage. To these declarations of my party of my own State I am now, and always have been, in full accord, and I give notice to you, gentlemen, on both sides of this Chamber, that when this bill comes up under consideration for amendment I shall claim the right of a Representative on this floor to offer an amendment to repeal the entire tax and system, and if that should fail of passing, then to repeal the brandy tax, and any other modifications that I may be able to get in, and shall endeaver to obtain a yea-and-nay vote on the same in the House, so that we may see, and the country may see, where the Representatives of the American people stand on this subject; and if any gentleman upon either side of this House is more successful than myself in point of time and opportunity in getting in such amendments, I pledge him here and now, I care not from what section he may come, or what may be his political creed and faith, my earnest and unqualified support to the measure.

Sir, go with me for a while and see the workings of this "infernal machine" in the country where I live. It is a land, sir, beautiful to look upon, abounding in fruit and grain, with mountains, valleys, and streams as picturesque as the pen of Scott e'er portrayed, and a climate abounding in exhilarating and health-giving influences, with waters that flow clear and cool from its life-giving fountains; yet, sir, in large districts of our country are communities without any railroad facilities, and the summer fruit grown upon trees planted and bearing long before this iniquitous law was made must fall and rot upon the ground, millions of bushels of it, because there is no way to market or save it profitably. This, sir, is by far the most cruel part of this law—the part that taxes fruit brandy. It is not claimed that there is any necessity for the revenue; there is, upon the other hand, a necessity for not obtaining it. Then why can not the farmer have the right to still his fruit free in a free country? "Oh," they say, "it would leave open gaps for avoiding the law taxing whisky." Can law be so framed as not to leave gaps for its avoidance? Is there no confidence to be placed in the honor of the people that they will obey the laws for their own self-respect and for the sake of obedience?

Then no such laws should have existence in a free country where the people rule. Give them this free license, sir, if you can do no more, and the remainder of the internal-revenue law will be executed all the more thoroughly, because this very liberty will bring public opinion more in accord with it; and without the support of public opinion no law can be executed with good effect. I would not give much for the nose of a revenue officer who could not tell the difference between brandy and whisky, and especially when the two are mixed to any considerable degree, and that, too, without any chemical process; for it is said by those who know that the mixing greatly deteriorates both in quality, flavor, and effect. But especially would detection be easy when we hear arguments here based upon the results accomplished by chemical science telling the kind, quality, and how much of each ingredient there is that enters into the manufacture of oleomargarine. There is no such trouble about the repeal of the brandy tax. It is only a story concocted by the big whisky interests to prevent its being given this advantage over grain distillations.

Now, sir, as to the whisky tax. It is not because we want more whisky, or cheaper whisky in the country, or more distilleries, that we demand a repeal of the law. There are in my State now at least five times as many whisky distilleries as there was before the law, and each one of those distilleries makes five or ten times as much liquor as they did before the enactment of the law; for before the enactment of this law there were but few distilleries in the whole State that operated except in the fall and early winter months. The custom through all our country, at this time when there was no surveillance and no tax on spirits, was to run the distilleries only from crop-gathering time until the early winter, when the hogs were fattened on the slop. Then the hogs were killed, the whisky was marketed, and the distillery closed until another year.

How is it now in the same country? They are usually run year in and year out, and when all the grain that our fertile lowlands yield has been bought and distilled it is brought from Cincinnati and the markets of the West to the nearest depot, and often hauled 40 and 50 miles and more into the country and distilled. We should always have plenty of grain in my country for man and beast, and yet, sir, I have seen the time there, and that, too, after years of plentiful crops, when poor laboring men, and women, too, who are unable to provide a year's supply in advance, might be seen going from house to house begging the privilege of buying corn enough to bread them until harvest, and having hard work to find it, and that because the remorseless worm of the still had devoured it before them.

Talk about the moral influence of this law! Tell it to those who know nothing about it, but tell it not to me. It sows a bountiful crop of oaths and makes smooth the way to a bountiful harvest of perjuries. The whole system is rotten to the core and is only held together by the cohesive attraction of public plunder. It is a menace and a threat to free institutions and is obnoxious to all liberty-loving people. Of course none of those who engage in the business of distilling get very rich by it; few of them make any considerable profit clear of expenses and contingencies, and many of them come to ruin; but, lured by the ignis fatuus of the increase of price which the tax makes, they press ahead, hoping to find the "potful of money at the end of the rainbow." If any of them should be for a time, through diligence, industry, sobriety, and strict attention to business, all of which are mighty hard on human nature in the circumstances in which he is placed—but if for a time he should be successful and come to the accumulation of some property, buy some new teams and wagons and some "Sunday clothes," there is another branch of this law watching with greedy eyes to pounce upon him as a hawk would upon a fat pigeon, for some violation of the law more technical than criminal, and straightway proceed to pick him clean, and when, after forfeiting his team and wagons to this rich and overflowing Treasury and serving his term in some filthy county jail, or in the penitentiary, he is released from the clutches of the law to make his way homeward, his patriotism, like Bob Acres's courage, all gone, and his only relief to "cuss" the court and the law that will not allow a man to do as he pleases with his own.

This is is the way it happens to the Government distiller that in some way gets crooked; but if a "blockader" gets caught, they make short work of him, and, as he stands under the sentence of the law, I imagine I can hear him soliloquize in the language of old "Groundhog Cayce," in a book by Miss Murfree, entitled The Prophet of the Great Smoky Mountains. The old man, speaking of the trials and difficulties which he has in his business, and which he can not understand, appealing to common reason, says:

> Lord A'mighty, air the corn mine, or no? Air the orchard mine or the raiders'? An' what ails me ez I can't make whisky an apple-jack same ez in my dad's time, when him an' me run a sour-mash still on the top o' the mounting in the light o' day, up'ards o' twenty year, an' never hearn o' no raider? Tell me that's agin the law nowadays? Waal, now, who made that law? I never, an' I ain't agoin' ter abide by it, nuther. Ez sure ez ye air born, it air jes' a Yankee trick fotched down hyar by the Federal Army. An' ef I had knowed they war goin' ter gin tharse'fs ter sech perseeutions arter the war, I dunno how I'd hev got my consent ter fit alongside of 'em like I done fower year fur the Union.

There is much in the language attributed to this illiterate old man that voices the same ideas that permeated the minds of our American ancestors when they fought and won the battles of the Revolution; the same that actuated our English ancestors when they wrenched from the mailed hand of King John the Magna Charta of British liberty.

This bill, sir, I consider the first serious proposition coming from the Ways and Means Committee of this House to afford relief from any part of this tax and from the inquisitorial rigors of this law, and as such it shall have my support. Removing the tobacco tax will be a good thing for the farmer, enabling him to sell his crop without subjecting himself to infringement of the law, and the abolition of retail licenses, for which I have labored most assiduously, will go a great way toward ridding the country of frivolous prosecutions in the Federal courts, for experience and observation show that in most of the cases originating there, after passing all the more serious charges in the information or bill, the prosecution dwindles down to a little retailing case that would scarcely comport with the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace or of a police court. Yes, pass these amendments to the law, and give to the Federal court judges the discretion of fixing the punishment for these offenses against the internal-revenue law without being confined by a minimum limit, and good people everywhere that know anything about the workings of this law will thank you and hope for more and better things.

In justice, sir, to the present administration of the law I am constrained to say that it is conducted on much more humane principles than heretofore. But a few years ago, and when the States were passing laws prohibiting the carrying of deadly weapons by the citizens, armed bands of revenue officers could be seen riding through the country with carbines swung around their shoulders and pistols hanging from their belts, in quiet hamlets and neighborhoods, frightening women and children, and arousing a spirit of antagonism among the men. But now, sir, in my own section at least, the arms have all been collected and sent back here to Washington, and yet the law is better enforced and more money collected than heretofore. But, sir, I shall always maintain that the whole thing ought to go, executed as it is by aid of spies and informers and inquisitions carried into the domiciles and cellars of the people, with no sanctuary so sacred as to keep out the invasion of the revenue officer. It is impossible to make it popular with the people that witness its administration without destroying their manhood and love of the principle of personal liberty, which, I pray God, may never be done.

Statistics show that under its influence the use of alcoholic liquors is on the increase. In 1840 the amount used per head was 4 gallons for that year, and in 1883 it was 12 gallons per head. During the five years preceding 1884 the population increased about 15 per cent., but the consumption of distilled spirits increased 44.15 per cent. It has not lessened the appetite for it, nor is its respectability impaired by making it a "licensed," taxed "luxury," with the stamp and seal of the Government upon it, so that a man feels that when he takes a drink he is helping to support the Government, and to be really patriotic he must take all he can, and especially is this so on a rainy evening about a Federal court green when a poor fellow is waiting to be called in for trial. It takes a good deal under such circumstances to keep his patriotism above zero.

The people feel, sir, that these matters should be left to the regulation of their States respectively. They love their State governments, and more blood and treasure, including the days of the Revolution, have been spent to maintain the right of local self-government than for any other cause on this continent.

It is a question, sir, that involves the liberty of Maine as well as South Carolina; as much that of Indiana as that of Texas. Upon it, the very union of these independent States depend. Strike it down, take from the people this inestimable right and State lines become obliterated, Territories are merged into each other, and centralization and despotism inevitable follow. Make this law a perpetuity, as some argue should be done; keep the strong hand of the Government continually clutching and interfering with State courts and laws and the rights and occupations of citizens; fill the land with Federal officers and keep them there with the execution of their offices above the laws of the State, and you fill the hearts of good men with despair, though they never made a drop of whisky in their lives, though they may not even drink it, and though they may be opposed to its use.

Mr. Chairman, it is not the whisky-making or the whisky-drinking element of society that I represent in this argument, but I feel that I voice the sentiment of the law-abiding, God-fearing, Christian people of my country when I say, Down with the demoralizing system of internal revenue! The moral element of the land have got the true idea of this institution at last, which for so long a time—God save the mark—has run as an adjunct to morality and temperance, and their opposition will grow more and more intense as they learn more about it.

Sir, in my political prayers I pray first for the success of the Democratic party in my own State, and then in the Union. You have been told to look at the history of that period before 1876, to see from what we escaped in that memorable campaign. In the light of this history, and the certainty of its being repeated by Republican success, if the issue which is to come before the people in the next election could be submitted to me with this alternative, "You can not have both; which will you take, success in the State election or success in the Federal election;" much as I admire Grover Cleveland, our honored and beloved President, and much as I appreciate the honest, clean administration he has given us, and the confidence which the whole people of our country so justly have in his patriotism and integrity, and much as I hope for his renomination and election, I would emphatically answer, "You may take the Federal administration with all its offices, with all its money wrongfully torn from the people to waste and squander, with all its 'boodle,' but give me Democratic home rule in North Carolina."

There, sir, we have a constitution formulated by a Democratic convention, adopted by a Democratic majority of the voters of the State, laws enacted under it by Democratic legislatures, and kept in force by a Democratic administration; the colored man has the right to vote and does so as freely and without control as the white man; he has the right to hold office and all the rights of citizenship, with an equal distribution per capita of the public-school money; he is contented and happy and there is no friction or clash between the races as such, unless it is aroused by bad men at home and abroad with a desire to stir up strife between the races and thereby control the colored vote for their own selfish ends and not for the good of the colored man.

Left to themselves, sir, the colored people know that the best friends they have are the white people, with whom they have been reared and who know them best. It is a moral and political sin to disturb by such means the peace and quiet of that country that is now engaged in earnest effort in working out the solution of one of the greatest political problems in the world, and with an earnest desire to do justice to all. But, sir, if evil counsels must prevail, and the issue is to be presented to us as to which race we will have to control the destinies of this country or of our own State government, I say here and now, standing in my place as the representative of a brave and honorable people, that we expect to be able to maintain for North Carolina, and that, too, without a resort to violence, a white man's government, for white men and white women, and for white children.

Look, sir, at what the Democratic party has done for North Carolina. It has paid her debts, restored her credit lost under carpet-bag rule, brought confidence to our people and to those abroad having capital to invest, encouraged and built public improvements and promoted private enterprise, vastly increased our facilities for education, and has brought about, by giving us an honest and economical management of public affairs, a degree of individual and public prosperity never before known in the history of our State, and yet we have much to do and much that we can do. We are not begging for help or for greater "protection" than the rest of our fellow-citizens are entitled to.

We only ask the privilege under salutary laws of being allowed to work out our own salvation. Capital can find no safer place for investment. The next ten years will show greater improvement in North Carolina than the past twenty years have done, and in twenty years from to-day we will have reached a degree of prosperity not dreamed of now even by those who by their enterprise and labor are contributing so much to it. With a name as stainless as any star in the bright constellation of the Union that floats above our heads to-day, her sons and her daughters now, and generations yet to come, will rise up and call her blessed. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the tariff bill had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Several messages, in writing, from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 83) accepting the invitation of the French Republic to take part in the international exposition to be held in Paris in 1889;

An act (H. R. 48) for the relief of Benjamin M. Simpson;

An act (H. R. 3215) to authorize the construction of the Ohio Connecting Railway Company bridge; and

An act (H. R. 9430) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to award a gold medal of the first class to Capt. Thomas Sampson, of New York City, for rescuing five boys from drowning.

The message also announced that the bill (H. R. 1712) for the erection of a public building at Portsmouth, Ohio, having been presented to the President April 30, 1888, and not having been returned by him to the House in which it originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, had become a law without his approval.

EDWARD FITZGERALD.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, reported back favorably from the Committee on War Claims the bill (S. 316) for the relief of Edward Fitzgerald.

Mr. ROGERS. The bill just reported by the gentleman from Kentucky is one which I endeavored to call up some time ago; but one or two gentlemen on the other side objected then to its consideration. They have since investigated the matter and do not now wish to object. The bill merely provides for the reference of a claim to the War Department, to be audited and reported back to Congress. It makes no appropriation. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be now considered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Quartermaster-General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to examine the claim of the Right Rev. Edward Fitzgerald, Bishop of Little Rock, trustee of the Catholic Church in Arkansas, for timber and fuel belonging to said church, alleged to have been taken by the United States, or the armies thereof, at or near Fort Smith, in the State of Arkansas, during the war of the rebellion; and he may consider the evidence heretofore taken on said claim, so far as applicable, before the Commissioners of Claims and such other legal evidence as may be adduced before him in behalf of said trustee or in behalf of the United States, and shall report the facts to Congress, to be considered with other claims reported by the Quartermaster-General.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROGERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to

GRANT OF LAND TO WYOMING FOR PUBLIC PURPOSES.

Mr. CAREY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 850) granting certain lands in the Territory of Wyoming for public purposes. This bill has been favorably reported to-day by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], from the Committee on Public Lands, and a House bill of similar purport was favorably reported some time ago.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the governor of the Territory of Wyoming is hereby authorized and empowered to cause to be selected and entered of the public lands contained within the boundaries of the Fort Sanders military reservation, in said Territory, as soon after the extension of the public surveys through said reservation as practicable, to an amount not exceeding 640 acres, as nearly as practicable in square form according to the public surveys; that the lands so selected and entered are hereby granted to the Territory of Wyoming for the purpose of enabling the said Territory to maintain thereon a fish-hatchery and other public institutions: Provided, That if the said Territory shall at any time permit the said lands hereby granted to be used for any purpose not contemplated by this act the said lands shall revert to the United States: Provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed or have the effect to impair the rights of any person in or to any portion of said lands acquired under any law of the United States.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has this bill received the consideration of the Committee on the Public Lands?

Mr. CAREY. Yes, sir; and has been unanimously reported with a favorable recommendation.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the following resolution of the House:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be requested to return to the House the bill (H. R. 2699) for the relief of the heirs of the late Solomon Spitzer, for the purpose of correcting the same; and the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to insert in said bill the word "unexpected" instead of the word "unexpended."

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 347) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Youngstown, Ohio.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 9793) authorizing a loan of arms and equipments to the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 9711) making an appropriation to enable the several Executive Departments of the Government and the Bureau of Agriculture and the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and Commission of Fish and Fisheries, to participate in the centennial exposition of the Ohio Valley from July 4 to October 27, 1888; also that the Senate requested a conference with the House on said bill and amendments, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. ALLISON, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. COCKRELL.

RUDOLF LOBSIGER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. SPRINGER, referred, with the accompanying documents, to the Committee on War Claims:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State relative to the claim of Mr. Rudolph Lobsiger, a Swiss citizen, against the United States, and recommend that provision be made by law for referring the matter to the Court of Claims for examination on its merits.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 14, 1888.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, accompanied by a report of Mr. Somerville P. Tuck, appointed to carry out certain provisions of section 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801," approved January 20, 1885.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 14, 1888.

Mr. SPRINGER. That message, I presume, Mr. Speaker, should go to the Committee on the Judiciary, as it relates to pending litigation in the Court of Claims. I move that reference.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I make the suggestion that it is probable it should go to the Committee on Appropriations, as my recollection is that at the beginning of this session certain reports of the Court of Claims were referred to the Appropriations Committee with instructions to report back in reference to them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to refer the message to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to; and the message was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent to offer a bill for my kinsman, Mr. CLIFTON R. BRECKINRIDGE; and also ask unanimous consent that other gentlemen having bills to offer may present them now for proper reference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS, FLORIDA AND OTHER STATES.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas (by Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky), introduced a bill (H. R. 9982) to revive and amend an act entitled "An act for the final adjustment of private land claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana, Missouri, and for other purposes," approved June 22, 1860; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

BUSINESS FROM COMMITTEE ON LABOR.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That Tuesday, May 22, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of bills and resolutions reported from the Committee on Labor.

PER DIEM RATED SERVICE-PENSION BILL.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, I present to Congress, and ask to have printed in the RECORD, two very brief petitions, but signed by a very large number of persons. One of these petitions is signed by almost 1,000 soldiers of Lawrence County, Pennsylvania; the other petition is signed by 2,300 soldiers and citizens of Beaver County, Pennsylvania. These petitions were prepared with great care and labor. I can assure Congress that they are genuine signatures of actual citizens. They are both on the same subject, and are in favor of the per diem rated service-pension bill. I ask this because I believe this subject is one of great importance; that these petitions represent the general sentiment of the people of my district on this subject.

I offer them and call the special attention of Congress to the great demand there is by ex-soldiers and the citizens of our country for additional legislation on the subject of pensions. I am hoping that some heed will be given to these petitions, and that a day for the consideration of these and other general pension bills will be given by this Congress at an early date. I ask unanimous consent that one of these petitions, the two being identical in substance, may be printed in the RECORD without the signatures.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The petition is as follows:

To the honorable Senators and Representatives in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned surviving soldiers and sailors of the Union Army and Navy, heartily indorse the per diem rated service-pension bill, based on the principle of paying all soldiers, sailors, and marines a monthly pension of 1 cent a day for each day they were in the service during the war of the rebellion. And we urge upon Congress its immediate passage.

ESTATE OF THOMAS L. PRICE, DECEASED.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 475, for the relief of the estate of Thomas L. Price, deceased, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to credit to Thomas L. Price, of Jefferson City, Mo., late brigadier-general of United States volunteers, and now deceased, the sum of $2,000, being the amount received at Jefferson City, October 7, 1861, of R. O. Wariner, a paymaster in the United States Army, by order of General John C. Frémont, for special public purposes at that post by said Price, then commanding said post, and to release the estate of said Price from any and all liability therefor.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, was passed.

Mr. BLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OHIO VALLEY CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I ask that the committee of conference asked for by the Senate on the amendments to the bill (H. R. 9711) making an appropriation to enable the several Executive Departments of the Government, the Bureau of Agriculture, and the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and the Commission of Fish and Fisheries, to participate in the Centennial Exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States, to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio, on June 4 to October 27, 1888, just reported from the Senate, be agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the House will nonconcur in the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee of conference will be appointed hereafter.

ESTATE OF FRANCIS M. MURRAY.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 251) for the relief of the estate of Francis M. Murray, deceased, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the legal representatives of Francis M. Murray, deceased, late of McCracken County, Kentucky, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,500, for 3,000 bushels of stone-coal taken by and delivered to the steam-boats White Cloud and Silver Moon, in the year 1863, at Paducah, in the State of Kentucky, said boats being at the time in the employment of the Navy Department of the United States.

The Committee on War Claims recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Strike out "$1,500," in line 7, and insert "$900."

There being no objection, the bill was considered, the amendment concurred in, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

A. R. HARTZELL.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent to call up from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill H. R. 3604.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3604) granting an honorable discharge to A. R. Hartzell, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the order heretofore made, dishonorably dismissing from the military service of the United States A. R. Hartzell, late of Company H, First Regiment Iowa Cavalry, be, and the same is hereby, revoked, annulled, and set aside, and that the Secretary of War is ordered to grant to said Hartzell an honorable discharge, and to correct the records of his Department showing the removal of the said order of dismissal; and the said A. R. Hartzell is restored to all rights and privileges lost or suspended by such order.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the report in that case be read.

The report (by Mr. GEAR) was read in part.

Mr. PERKINS (interrupting the reading). The report is rather long; and perhaps it would be as satisfactory to the gentleman from Illinois if I were to give a brief explanation.

Mr. SPRINGER. Very well.

Mr. PERKINS. It was charged that this man had been guilty of quitting his guard-post without the permission of his superior officer. His own captain, however, admits that the charge was not sustained in the trial by court-martial. But he was convicted of disobedience of orders, and according to the captain's testimony the sentence was a very arbitrary and severe one. It is to be remembered he was a private and not a commissioned officer.

Ten years after the war closed for some reason he was dishonorably discharged. That was in 1874. He was dishonorably dismissed as a soldier upon an order issued from the War Department. The effect of this bill is to annul that order. That is all there is of it.

Mr. SPRINGER. What was the order he disobeyed?

Mr. PERKINS. He refused to go on escort in December, 1862, being without an overcoat, unless he should be furnished one. The weather, according to the testimony of the captain and other officers, was exceedingly severe and cold. He was part of a command which had been ordered to escort some Arkansas militia to their homes to spend New Year's with their families.

Mr. SPRINGER. It was rather a severe sentence.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Does the committee recommend the passage of the bill?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir. I may say in addition that after this soldier had been confined fifteen days he escaped, and soon after his escape returned.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The report in full is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs have had under consideration the bill and papers, with accompanying evidence, in the case of Adam R. Hartzell, for whom relief is asked by House bill 3604, and find that Adam R. Hartzell enlisted as a private in Company H, First Iowa Cavalry Volunteers, at Keokuk, Iowa, in August, 1861, to serve for three years, unless sooner discharged. He served with credit and distinction and as a brave and patriotic soldier until late in December, 1863, when he was placed under arrest by the captain of his company, and subsequently court-martialed. At this court-martial he was charged with quitting his guard without the leave of his superior officer, and "disobedience of orders." He was found guilty and sentenced to forfeit all pay and allowances now due or that shall become due him, except $2 per month of his monthly pay, and to be confined at hard labor with ball and chain until the expiration of his term of enlistment, in such military prison as the commanding general may designate.

In February, 1864, the military prison at Little Rock, Ark., was designated as the place of his confinement, and he was committed February 11, 1864. He remained in confinement until February 25, 1864, when he escaped therefrom. Soon after his escape he returned to his company, but not on duty. He messed much of the time with his company, and made no effort to conceal himself. His company was at the time at Little Rock, and his presence was known to his officers and comrades, and no effort was made to recapture him or to return him to prison. He belonged to the non-veterans of his company, and continued with them much of the time after his escape until they went home in the fall of 1864 to be mustered out. Hartzell accompanied the others home, but was not mustered out in consequence of having no descriptive roll.

This was the condition of things for several years, when Hartzell employed an attorney to secure for him an honorable discharge. But instead of granting an honorable discharge, the commanding general, Department of the Platt, in June, 1874, upon instructions from the War Department, furnished him a dishonorable discharge, to date February 25, 1864, and it is to relieve him of the odium of such dishonorable discharge that the present bill is presented. Much evidence has been filed in the War Department, and also presented to your committee, in support of the petition for an honorable discharge for this soldier. This evidence has been carefully considered by your committee, and from it the following conclusions are reached:

1. That the soldier was not guilty of quitting his guard without leave, as charged at the time of his court-martial.

2. That he was guilty of "disobedience of orders," but with these mitigating circumstances:

On the 31st day of December, 1863, at Little Rock, Ark., Captain Whisemand, with a part of his command, was ordered out to escort some Arkansas militia to their homes, some 40 miles distant, to spend New Year's with their families. Mr. Hartzell, belonging to this company, was detailed by the captain to be one of the escort. The weather was exceedingly cold for that locality, and the ride was long, and Hartzell, being without an overcoat, refused to go unless he could be furnished one. In fact the entire company was without overcoats, in consequence of their loss by fire, and Captain Whisemand, who detailed the soldier as a part of the escort, and who preferred the charges against him upon which he was court-martialed, says in his evidence filed with the committee that Hartzell refused—

"To go out upon the scout when ordered, and sought to justify his refusal on the grounds that he was willing to go if furnished with an overcoat, being without one himself and unable to get one. This was true, and it was also true that the weather was extremely cold and severe at the time, and a soldier ran a great risk of being frost-bitten, even with his overcoat."

This, in the judgment of your committee, from a careful examination of the testimony, was the sum of his offending; and while your committee is not inclined to look with leniency upon the offense of a soldier disobeying the orders of his superior officers, yet in the case of this soldier we are shocked with the severity of the punishment, and find nothing in the record or testimony to justify it. In fact Captain Whisemand, who preferred the charges, says in his testimony—

"That while the offense of refusing to go on a scout when regularly detailed was, in a military sense, a serious one and called for punishment, yet I had no idea that any such severe punishment would be inflicted as that announced by the court-martial.

"That if a sentence of two weeks' imprisonment had been imposed without any forfeiture of pay, I should have regarded it as entirely sufficient for the offense, and have always been of the opinion that the punishment fixed by the court-martial was unjustly severe under all the circumstances of the case."

It seems to your committee that this must be the feeling of all who review the circumstances of this case, and perhaps this explains why no effort was made to return the soldier to the military prison after his escape therefrom after a confinement therein of two weeks.

Why the soldier should have been dishonorably discharged from the service almost ten years after the term of his enlistment expired is unknown in reason or law to your committee. It was not a part of the judgment of the court-martial, and he was certainly not a deserter, and he had no notice of any charge against him that would justify such an order. In fact, the only charge that could have been made was that he had escaped from a military prison and did not voluntarily return to wear a ball and chain during the remaining time of his enlistment.

He belonged to an honorable family and for years has been living in the State of Kansas and is a respected citizen, and, in the judgment of your committee should be given an honorable discharge as a soldier.

In fact, your committee is of the opinion that he should be permitted to recover the money due him at the time of his arrest. And we recommend that the bill do pass.

ROAD TO NEW BERNE (N. C.) NATIONAL CEMETERY.

Mr. SIMMONS. I call up for consideration at this time, from the Union Calendar, the bill H. R. 4320.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4320) to authorize the construction of a graveled or macadamized road from the city of New Berne, N. C., to the national cemetery near said city.

Whereas there is now no public road leading to the national cemetery near the city of New Berne, N. C., but access to said cemetery can be had only over a private road belonging to and kept open at the discretion of the adjacent land-owners; and

Whereas the said land proprietors are willing to donate to the United States the right of way over their said lands from the said city of New Berne to the said national cemetery: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to construct a good and durable graveled or macadamized road from the city of New Berne, in the State of North Carolina, to the national cemetery, near said city, over such road and along such route as he may deem proper. And for the purpose of carrying into effect the foregoing provisions of this act the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, said money to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, or so much thereof as may be necessary for said purpose.

SEC. 2. That before any money shall be expended as aforesaid the title to the right of way shall be granted to the United States free of cost.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with the following amendment:

In the first section, line 9, strike out "$30,000" and insert "$20,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. KERR. How long is the road?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is about 2 miles in length.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SIMMONS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

C. B. WILSON.

Mr. SYMES. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 5080) for the relief of C. B. Wilson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster-General of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to give credit to C. B. Wilson, present postmaster at Buena Vista, Colo., for the sum of $225, money-order funds remitted by said Wilson, as said postmaster, to the post-office at Denver, Colo., in accordance with the postal rules and regulations, and mislaid or lost in the post-office at Denver, Colo.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Let the report be read.

Mr. SYMES. I think I can make a brief explanation which may obviate the reading of the report.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Very well.

Mr. SYMES. The claimant in this case in December, 1886, transmitted from Buena Vista to the postmaster at Denver, Colo., $225 of money-order funds. It is proved conclusively to the Department that the money was received in the Denver office, but was there lost or mislaid. The Postmaster-General specially recommends that the claimant be granted the relief asked for.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I withdraw the request for the reading of the report.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SYMES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HEIRS OF CHRISTOPHER COTT.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 956) for the relief of the heirs of Christopher Cott.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the heirs of Christopher Cott, late a private in Company B, Mc. Laughlin's Independent Squadron, Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, the pay, bounty, and all other allowances of a private of cavalry from the 30th day of April, 1864, to the 30th day of November, 1864, the supposed date of the said soldier's death.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OUTHWAITE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JESSE COE.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask unanimous consent to call up from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 6233) for the relief of Jesse Coe.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 5.30 p. m. having arrived, the House, pursuant to order, stands adjourned until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

A bill (H. R. 6583) granting a pension to Sally B. Wilson.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2666) granting a pension to L. B. Skinner, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1750) granting a pension to George W. Wilburn;

A bill (S. 876) granting a pension to Catharine Simmonds;

A bill (S. 2101) granting a pension to Daniel K. Smith; and

A bill (S. 885) to increase the pension of Adrian C. Dodge.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 228) donating certain lots to the city of St. Augustine, Fla., for public schools, parks, and a public library, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (S. 2946) granting the use of certain lands to the city of St. Augustine, Fla., for a public park, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 3745) granting a pension to Mary O'Neil;

A bill (H. R. 8260) granting a pension to Lydia A. Hicks;

A bill (H. R. 3712) increasing the pension of Milton Judd; and

A bill (S. 2733) granting an increase of pension to Shadrach Brown.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 2753) granting a pension to Louisa N. Noble;

A bill (S. 2800) to increase the pension of Sarah B. Young; and

A bill (S. 2732) granting an increase of pension to Samuel H. Rook.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of William C. Shimoneck, praying to be allowed an increase of pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 2947) granting an increase of pension to William C. Shimoneck; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7783) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near Knoxville, Tenn., reported it with amendments.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 489) for the relief of John Finn, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William B. Stokes, late pension agent at Nashville, Tenn., praying for the passage of a bill to relieve him and his sureties from a claim alleged to be due the Government, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 2948) for the relief of William B. Stokes, M. M. Brien, sr., Thomas Waters, and William T. Haskins; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1497) to provide for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of Dakota, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments.

I wish to say in reference to the bill that it is not intended to antagonize the efforts now being made for the admission of Dakota as a State; but until the people of that Territory can be allowed to provide for themselves we must provide additional judicial facilities for them, and in order that they may be so provided the bill is reported favorably.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. STANFORD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 351) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Zanesville, Ohio, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1553) to provide for the purchase of a site for and the erection of a public building at Oakland, in the State of California, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred an amendment intended to be proposed to the Indian appropriation bill, to insert in line 107 of the printed bill, after "thousand," the words "five hundred," reported it favorably, and moved its reference to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a resolution directing that committee to ascertain what rules or regulations prevail in the District for granting authority to house-owners to extend the fronts and the door-steps of their residences into the streets, and to establish carriageways across the sidewalks to and from their front doors, asked that it be printed with the accompanying letters from the commissioners of the District of Columbia on that subject; which was agreed to.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were agreed to, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 2844) granting a pension to Squire Burns;

A bill (S. 2857) granting a pension to Charlotte Ayers;

A bill (S. 2815) granting an increase of pension to Edwin Marsh;

A bill (S. 2758) granting a pension to Susan B. Murdock; and

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2683) granting a pension to Andrew J. Foust;

A bill (S. 2842) granting an increase of pension to William H. Welsh;

A bill (S. 2759) granting a pension to James M. Frost;

A bill (S. 2746) granting a pension to Ezra E. Annis;

A bill (S. 2899) granting a pension to Harriet Welch;

A bill (H. R. 2156) granting a pension to Warren Ohaver;

A bill (H. R. 9170) granting a pension to James W. Poag;

A bill (H. R. 354) granting a pension to Samuel McClure; and

A bill (H. R. 152) granting a pension to Mrs. Theresa Guelich.

WILLIAM LEMONS.

Mr. SAWYER. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2928) granting a pension to William Lemons, to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill at this time. William Lemons is an old man over ninety years of age, and I am informed that he is in circumstances of extreme suffering.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of William Lemons, late a drummer in the war of 1812.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the following resolution, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance, by subcommittee or otherwise, are authorized to collect information, to take testimony, to employ a stenographer, to administer oaths, as they may deem most expedient; and the expenses therefor shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

FINANCE COMMITTEE HEARINGS.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. MORRILL, April 24, 1888, reported it without amendment, and the resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as he may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had before said committee, and to have the same printed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 2949) granting a pension to the widow of G. K. Warren; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2950) granting a pension to Milton Childers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2951) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Morrison Elliott; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FARWELL introduced a bill (S. 2952) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to cause such changes and improvements to be made in the United States custom-house, post-office, and subtreasury building at Chicago, Ill., and erect such additions thereto as in his judgment may be necessary to provide sufficient accommodations for the post-office in that city; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CHANDLER introduced a bill (S. 2953) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Medical Inspector Thomas W. Leach a medical director on the retired-list of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. STEWART introduced a bill (S. 2954) granting a pension to William Gardner; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLATT (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2955) to authorize the appointment of a commission to examine, test, and report upon the use, by different systems and methods, of dynamite and other high explosives for military and naval operations; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 83) for the relief of the Venezuela Steam Transportation Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 84) to authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office to have certain maps printed; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA REPRESENTATION IN CONGRESS.

Mr. BLAIR. I introduce a joint resolution providing for an amendment of the Constitution giving representation to the District of Columbia in the two Houses of Congress.

The joint resolution (S. R. 82) proposing an amendment of the Constitution giving representation to the District of Columbia in the two Houses of Congress was read twice by its title.

Mr. BLAIR. I have heretofore introduced this resolution in substance, but it failed to be printed by some error, and I now introduce it again, modified. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and in doing this I wish to say, in an effort to express the importance of attention to this matter, that the population of this District by the last census exceeded that of the States of Oregon, Delaware, and Nevada.

In valuation of property it amounts to $99,401,787 by the same census, and it exceeds the assessed valuation of Nebraska, Vermont, Arkansas, Colorado, Delaware, Oregon, Florida, and Nevada. The direct taxes of the District of Columbia paid since 1862 amount to $6,454,907.03, amounting in the last year alone to $142,172.10, exceeding the direct taxes paid by the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Maine, Mississippi, Nevada, South Carolina, and Vermont. For local purposes last year its taxation was $2,374,914.53.

I have some other figures that may be of use to the committee of which these are a recapitulation, and with the consent of the Senate I will pass them to the Reporter that they may appear in the RECORD.

According to the last census, the District of Columbia has a population larger than several of the States:

District of Columbia	177,624
Oregon	174,768
Delaware	146,608
Nevada	62,266

The population of the District is now estimated at from 200,000 to 250,000. In valuation of property it exceeds, according to the last census, a number of States—

District of Columbia	$99,401,787
Nebraska	90,585,782
Vermont	86,806,775
Arkansas	86,409,364
Colorado	74,471,603
Delaware	59,951,643
Oregon	52,522,084
Florida	30,938,309
Nevada	29,291,459

In addition to indirect taxation, which operates upon the District the same as upon the States, it has paid $6,454,907.03 taxes since 1862, under the internal-revenue laws. During the last fiscal year it paid of those taxes more than either Alabama, Arkansas, Maine, Mississippi, Nevada, South Carolina, or Vermont:

District of Columbia	$142,172.10
Alabama	78,542.76
Arkansas	97,630.38
Maine	50,286.45
Mississippi	$42,608.14
Nevada	70,419.50
South Carolina	100,146.83
Vermont	99,119.75

For local purposes it pays annually over $2,000,000 in taxes. Last year the amount was $2,374,914.53. Here, then, is a rapidly growing community, already close up to a quarter of a million in number, paying more taxes than some of the States, having more people than some of the States, and yet, as a member of Congress lately said, "at no point touching the administration of their own affairs." Is this right or expedient?

Mr. HOAR. I ask the consent of the Senate to make a brief statement in regard to this subject which will be of interest to the public.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BLAIR. As this is a modified form of the joint resolution I heretofore introduced, let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. HOAR. Several persons, gentlemen of standing and character in the District of Columbia, have applied to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for a hearing in support of the joint resolution. I communicated to them that I had no doubt the committee would give them a hearing if they should desire, but asked them to consider whether it would not be better for their case to present in print what they have to say. I have been informed by these gentlemen representing this sentiment that they would like to take that course, but that which ever course they take they would prefer to have the question deferred until the next session of Congress rather than to have the committee consider it and bring it into the Senate during the haste and crowded condition of business which will exist in the latter part of the present session. Unless some good reason shall appear to the contrary, I have no doubt the committee will comply with that desire, and will take the matter up for consideration at the beginning of next winter's session.

Mr. BLAIR. If I may be permitted to say an additional word I will state that this amendment originates in the desire to give to the people of the District substantial representation in the making of the general laws under which they live, and after the preparation of the original amendment which was made by citizens of the District on my suggestion of what I thought it ought to contain, I introduced the amendment as they had it prepared. There are some difficulties which would be likely to arise in the operation of such an amendment, should it be made as prepared, and those difficulties in this second preparation I have endeavored to obviate; but of course in so intricate and important a matter it is not to be presumed that any amendment will be likely to be so nearly complete as to not require substantial modification by the committee that considers it.

I am very glad that the matter is to be suspended until the next session of Congress. Meanwhile I think there may be somewhat extensive representations that the people of the District may make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. ALLISON, Mr. CHANDLER, Mr. SPOONER, and Mr. STANFORD submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE and Mr. VANCE submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the Indian appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 251) for the relief of the estate of Francis M. Murray, deceased;

A bill (H. R. 956) for the relief of heirs of Christopher Cott;

A bill (H. R. 3604) granting an honorable discharge to A. R. Hartzell, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 4320) to authorize the construction of a graveled or macadamized road from the city of New Berne, N. C., to the national cemetery near said city;

A bill (H. R. 5080) for the relief of C. B. Wilson;

A bill (H. R. 6233) for the relief of Jesse Coe; and

A bill (H. R. 7111) granting a pension to Caroline Pautel.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 38) granting the Washington and Idaho Railroad Company the right of way through the Cœur d'Alene Indian reservation;

A bill (S. 316) for the relief of Edward Fitzgerald;

A bill (S. 475) for the relief of the estate of Thomas L. Price, deceased; and

A bill (S. 850) granting certain lands in the Territory of Wyoming for public purposes.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9711) making an appropriation to enable the several Executive Departments of the Government and the Bureau of Agriculture and the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and Commission of Fish and Fisheries, to participate in the Centennial Exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States, to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio, from July 4 to October 27, 1888, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, Mr. CLEMENTS, and Mr. BUTTERWORTH managers at the conference on its part.

SENATOR FROM INDIANA.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in regard to the case of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions, concurrent or other, the order of morning business is closed, and the Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections concerning the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE].

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the several memorials. I suppose that is all the action necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions and memorials in regard to the matter. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. CHANDLER. It seems to me, Mr. President, that one of the propositions enunciated by the committee in their report is too broad, and I desire to express my dissent from that proposition.

The committee make a reservation at the close of the report in which they state that they do not mean to be understood as declaring that the Senate, upon the question of the admission of a Senator to his seat, can not inquire into the legality of a Legislature; whether it is in form and in fact a Legislature competent to elect a United States Senator. But they also say they are of opinion, upon the offer made of proof of facts in this case as stated in the second proposition of their report, that the Senate have no authority to investigate such facts in connection with the question of a Senator's right to his seat. The offer of proof was as follows:

Second. That before said alleged election the senate—

That is, the State senate of Indiana—

wrongfully, and for the purpose of obtaining a majority for said TURPIE in said joint convention, declared two members, who had been duly and lawfully elected members thereof, not entitled to their seats, and declared two other persons, who had not been duly and lawfully elected, to be entitled to such seats, and thereupon seated such persons, and that this was done without right, without evidence, and without hearing or debate; and that said persons so seated thereafter were present and voted for Mr. TURPIE in said convention, and that without such votes said TURPIE would not have received a majority.

I concur in the general proposition that the Senate of the United States, when deciding upon the right of a Senator to his seat, should not undertake to investigate the legality of the election of members of the State Legislature which chose the Senator; but I think it is going too far to exclude the special case named in this second point of the report, where it may be made to appear that a Legislature in session, duly organized, as a preliminary to the election of a United States Senator, and as a part in fact of the proceeding of election, go on and in order to make a wrongful and fictitious majority eject certain members lawfully entitled to their seats and put others in their places.

It seems to me that there may be an extreme case in which it would not only be the right but the duty of the Senate to inquire into the circumstances of the ejection of members of a State Legislature from their seats, and that there is an exception, and there may well be an exception, to the general proposition that each branch of the State Legislature is entitled to decide for itself, and to decide for itself conclusively, the right of its members to their seats for the purpose of electing a United States Senator.

The question is one of some importance, and the rule as laid down by the committee may be one which will work in the future evil results because of the method prescribed for electing United States Senators by the United States statute on that subject. The act of 1866, as Senators well recollect, provides that if there is no election of Senator by a concurrent vote of the two Houses acting separately on the first day fixed by the act for an election, there shall be on the next day a joint convention, and that an election of Senator may, and shall then if possible, be made by that joint convention.

It may happen, it often has happened, that a Legislature thus assembled is of different politics in the two branches. There may be, for illustration, and I think there was in fact in this case, a Republican house of representatives and a Democratic senate, a Republican majority in one body and a Democratic majority in the other body.

Now, the proposition of the Senate committee in its broadest sense is that if, as preliminary to the election of a Senator, one of these bodies shall deliberately eject some of its members without right and shall substitute for those members others as members who had no right, for the purpose of creating a false and fictitious and manufactured majority in the joint convention, it is beyond the power of the Senate of the United States under any circumstances to inquire into the legality of that transaction.

I say that I think the committee have enunciated that proposition too broadly. I think that there may be a case where, under a proper construction of the Constitution, after a proper consideration of the law of 1866, if it shall appear that a majority is thus manufactured in a State Legislature, not as a regular and legitimate and ordinary course of business for the purpose of deciding as to the rights of members to their seats, but solely and clearly and plainly for the purpose of changing the political character of the joint body—I conceive that under these circumstances the Senate of the United States would unhesitatingly inquire into the legality of these transactions, and would treat the ejection of certain members and the introduction into the body of the State Legislature of other persons as a part of the res gestæ, as a part of the whole election by which a Senator is to be chosen contrary to the will of the Legislature as a whole.

The doctrine as laid down by the committee would go to the extent of preventing the Senate of the United States from disputing the legality of the election of a Senator in a case where, on the very morning of election, one body might undertake to eject a sufficient number of members from participation in the election, or might confine them where they could not take part in the election. The doctrine as broadly laid down by the committee might go to that extent, and it seems to me that the principles announced by the committee unanimously, as I understand, which as a general proposition may be correct, go altogether too far. I desire, therefore, to place upon record my dissent from the extreme doctrine thus too broadly stated.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the considerations which have been suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] have been the subject of very grave and anxious reflection on the part of a majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

It is always unpleasant, when you have a constitutional or other public duty to perform, to feel yourself restrained from going into the merits of the entire question down to the bottom by any legal or constitutional barrier; but at the same time that is the theory upon which our government of checks and balances depends. Certain duties, certain judgments, certain ascertainments of fact are assigned under our Constitution and the laws to different tribunals, and each tribunal is bound to take as conclusive the adjudication of every other within its sphere. The Supreme Court of the United States, or the supreme court of any State renders a judgment between man and man; and when a suit is brought upon that judgment elsewhere, the second tribunal can not go into the question of mistake, of fraud, of duress, or of wrongful motive and purpose of any kind whatever, but it acts upon the judgment of the constitutional court.

Take a case which is quite analogous to the one with which the Senate now has to deal. A little while ago it was said, among the wretched campaign slanders of the time, that two judges of the Supreme Court of the United States were appointed for the purpose on the part of the Chief Executive, General Grant, of reversing the judgment of that court in an important controversy which had stirred very deeply the whole American people, an important constitutional question which affected the determination one way or the other of every contract to be executed in the future which required a payment of money from one man to another in this country. There never was a viler slander that came up from the stump. The names of the two gentlemen who were appointed to that bench at that time had been sent into the Senate before that judgment was announced from the bench; their names were here awaiting confirmation. I do not suppose there is any intelligent man, now that the excitement of that time has passed by, who seeks to find for the appointment to the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States of Judges Bradley and Strong any motive whatever, except the conspicuous excellence of those two gentlemen, and their conspicuous fitness for that lofty constitutional function. One of them has retired at the end of a long service, a model of the judicial character, and the other is by the general confession of bench and bar alike the foremost living jurist of the world, certainly the foremost living jurist upon this continent to-day.

But suppose it had been otherwise, would it have been lawful for any person who did not like the judgment of that exalted tribunal, who was called upon in any way as an executive officer or as a member of a State tribunal where that judgment might have been put in suit, to go into the question of the motive of the Executive who had the power of nominating, or of the Senate who had the power of confirming or rejecting the proposition to appoint them? The judgment of that constitutional court is a final judgment as to all the world.

In the same way, under the constitution of the State of Indiana, in the assignment of political power and its distribution between State and nation, each legislative body of that State, as of all the other States, is the final judge of the title to seats of the persons who compose it; and when you have got a lawful senate this body can inquire into nothing, when it seeks to inquire who was the person who cast his vote for a Senator of the United States, but what has been the judgment of that lawful senate as to that person's title to his seat. However much we may suspect or believe the influence of improper motives upon that judgment, it is binding upon us under our oath of office to preserve the Constitution of the United States.

We have acted upon that doctrine in even a more important matter than this. It is declared in the Constitution that the several States of the Union shall determine the manner of choosing Presidential electors. We claimed on this side of the Chamber that that involved also the duty and the right on the part of the State authorities to ascertain the result of that election, and we declared that we could not go behind the result so ascertained and declared; and no doubt my honorable friend from New Hampshire will remember, unless I have very much misread the history of that period, that we declared that when the State tribunal had acted upon the question of the title to his seat in the electoral college of a State elector, that was conclusive upon the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States, and that we were to count the votes of the persons so declared entitled to that office.

Now in the same way we have the right undoubtedly, being the final judges of the election, qualification, and return of our members here, to see whether the elector in the Legislature of the State of Indiana in casting his vote was corrupted, or was under duress, or whether his vote in any way was wrested so that it was not the true and lawful act of that elector; but in determining who has the right to cast the several votes we are bound by the conclusive judgment of the legislative body of the State of Indiana. So we had only to inquire in determining whether the votes of these two men, Branahan and McDonald, were to be counted, which changed the result; whether the senate of the State of Indiana had pronounced them to be entitled to seats in that body; and we had no authority given us to say whether they did that against right, or against evidence, or for the purpose of changing the result of the election.

A question came up of the lawful organization of that senate, whether the lieutenant-governor or the person claiming to be president pro tempore of the senate was the lawful and rightful presiding officer. But there was a senate there, a senate of unquestioned authority. The governor of the State was recognizing it as a senate, receiving and approving the laws which it undertook to pass. The other house, the Republican house of the Indiana Legislature, was communicating with it as a senate, among other things inviting it to enter into this very joint convention in pursuance of the act of Congress; and it took its constitutional share in legislation and in laws which it passed, so organized and so presided over, by the entire acquiescence of the whole people of the State of Indiana, and is the law of that commonwealth to-day. And in addition to that, and a still more important recognition than that, every single member, Republican and Democrat alike of the body, in his individual official action recognized it as a lawful senate, acting for all lawful and constitutional purposes.

Therefore it seems to me, however much I may dislike the result, and however much I may disapprove the action of that body, if it be such as is set forth in this remonstrance, I do not see how, under my oath of office as a Senator, I can help giving effect to the votes of the persons whom that constitutional court, the senate of Indiana, declared, one by one, were entitled to act as electors on that occasion.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, when the Legislature of Indiana met nobody denied that the State senate in question was a constitutionally and legally organized body. A question then arose in the senate of Indiana as to the right of two persons to seats in that body, a question that had been by the constitution of that State left exclusively to the senate of that State to determine, and the Senator sitting in front of me [Mr. SPOONER] reminds me that the question of the right to seats in the other body, the house, was also presented. It was a Democratic senate and a Republican house. Each house exercised its constitutional right to pass upon the question as to who had been elected members, and rendered its judgment. In the house, as I recollect, a Republican was seated, at least one in place of a Democrat, who had held a certificate and who claimed to have been elected. In the senate two Democrats were seated in place of Republicans who had claimed to be elected and who, I think, held the certificates.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but there was just one ousted. There was one member, a Democrat, who sought his seat in the lower house who was denied it; and there was one Republican senator, whose seat was contested, who was ousted. Branahan and McDonald were contestants. McDonald was admitted.

Mr. TELLER. That does not change the legal aspect of the case.

Mr. VOORHEES. Not in the slightest.

Mr. TELLER. The senate of Indiana was exercising a constitutional right, a right given it by the constitution of the State, from which there was no appeal, and no tribunal created anywhere on the face of the earth could review their determination. They determined that the Democrat was elected. It is possible that they were influenced by their desire to create a Democratic majority. At all events, they were passing upon a question that they had a right to pass upon and that nobody else had a right to pass upon and that nobody else could review after they had passed upon it.

It does not lie in the power of the Senate of the United States, when it comes to a question of this kind, to review that decision, and no matter where it may take us, no matter where it may land us with reference to the misconduct of State Legislatures, it never was intended by the framers of this Government that that question of the right of members of the Indiana State Legislature to sit in either body there would ever be a subject of discussion in this body. We must accept the Legislature of Indiana that the people of Indiana in all departments of its State government recognized as their Legislature, and that we admit was a legally elected Legislature, although we may think the methods by which they secured a majority were unconstitutional and illegal, because we have not been authorized either by constitutional law or by statute to pass upon that question, and the committee in making this report have gone no further than former Senates have gone upon this question, and have not enunciated any new or strange doctrine to the American people. If the senate of Indiana outraged the rights of the people of Indiana, who elected another man from the one they seated, it is for the people of Indiana to settle with them.

The Senator from New Hampshire suggests that this doctrine may carry us too far, that it may carry us so far that if the Legislature of Indiana shall confine some members of that Legislature for the purpose of preventing them from voting, still we should not be allowed to inquire into that. Mr. President, the Legislature of Indiana would not then be exercising a constitutional duty or a constitutional power. That might be revolution, and that might raise an entirely different question. The committee have not dealt with that question. We have dealt with a Legislature declared to be legal in its inception, which the Senator would have us to say became illegal by the exercise improperly of a constitutional power conferred upon it by the constitution of Indiana.

Now, Mr. President, it is not worth while for this body in dealing with these questions to assume that there will be any such extraordinary conduct as is suggested; but if there should be, it will not be at all analogous to this case. What might then be the duty of the Senate in such a case would have nothing to do with what is its duty in this case.

I want to repeat again that this Legislature was legal when it was organized, and it was legal when it met in joint convention, unless it had by the introduction of one single member made itself an illegal body, which can not be presumed, and it was a Legislature that the governor of the State recognized, that the courts of the State recognized, and, as was said by the Senator from Massachusetts, the members of the house recognized it individually and collectively, and all the members of the senate, irrespective of party affiliations, recognized it, and the people of Indiana recognized it, and its enactments are the laws of Indiana to-day. Unless we are prepared to say that it was a body that could not enact legislation that would be binding on the people of Indiana, then we have no right to go into this question at all.

I am willing to stand by the language of this report, and even if the language had been stronger on that subject it would have met my approval.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, if I may be permitted a moment, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] rose to correct a statement of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] in regard to the alleged unseating of members of the Indiana Legislature. We do not undertake to deal with the facts, but only with the allegations as stated. The Senator from Indiana stated that McDonald and Branahan were contestants. The precise fact is this: There was a man by the name of John McDonald who is alleged to have been unseated and Branahan put into his place. That was one of the questions at issue. Then there was another McDonald whose title to vote was disputed. He was, I believe, a regularly certified member, but his title to cast his vote was disputed by the Republicans, according to these allegations, on the ground that he was a postmaster or had some other incompatibility and was deemed, therefore, ineligible. The objection of the remonstrants, the gentlemen who contest Mr. TURPIE'S title, was to the recognition of both these men, Branahan on the ground that he was unlawfully put in his place by the exclusion of the Republican McDonald, and the Democratic McDonald on the ground that he had no right to sit there, he being ineligible; so that the objection related to two votes, both of which, it is said, were cast for the sitting member, and in regard to both of which the Committee on Privileges and Elections are of opinion that the judgment of the senate of Indiana is final. That, I believe, is the precise state of facts.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Massachusetts is exactly correct. I overlooked in my response to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] the fact that there was another McDonald. He was a sitting member, however, with a certificate of election, and nobody was contesting his title. My mind at the time simply reverted to the contest between Branahan and McDonald. It is not a matter of any consequence, however.

Mr. TELLER. I recollect the fact now as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Indiana, but for the moment I had forgotten it. I knew there was a question raised on two senators. One had been admitted when he was outside at the beginning, and it was said the other ought to have been put out, but the Legislature declined to put him out. That is the case as I now recollect the testimony.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Colorado hardly state their case as they have put it in the report. Near the bottom of the first page they say:

Second. That before said alleged election the senate wrongfully and for the purpose of obtaining a majority for said TURPIE in said joint convention, declared two members, who had been duly and lawfully elected members thereof, not entitled to their seats, and declared two other persons, who had not been duly and lawfully elected, to be entitled to such seats, and thereupon seated such persons; and that this was done without right, without evidence, and without hearing or debate, and that said persons so seated thereafter were present and voted for Mr. TURPIE in said convention, and that without such votes said TURPIE would not have received a majority.

If this report were what the Senators state, as I understand them, on the floor of the Senate, it would seem to me clear that they are right; but the report is inconsistent, as I think, with what they say on the floor of the Senate. If they admitted that the senate of the State of Indiana, in the honest exercise of its undoubted function of deciding as to the election and qualification of its own members, had proceeded to oust two of them who appeared to be lawfully elected, and who as a matter of fact were lawfully elected, and to give those seats to others who as a matter of fact were not lawfully elected, then I can see how the action of the senate of Indiana thus constituted or reconstituted might be final and sufficient to elect Mr. TURPIE; but the committee come here with an admission that the contestants offered to prove a direct violation of its constitutional duty by that body; in other words, the commission of a crime by the senate of Indiana, as much as though they had undertaken by murder to obtain a majority which might change the result in the choice of a Senator of the United States. According to the statement in the report it was an offer to prove a violation of constitutional law, the commission of a crime by that admittedly legal body and for the purpose of changing a result with a criminal intent.

It does not seem to me possible that the Senate of the United States, having the right to judge of the election and qualification of its members, can be held concluded by that which is admitted to be criminal conduct so far as an organized body can commit criminal conduct on the part of either the house of representatives or the Legislature jointly which sends a man here to claim a seat.

The explanation made by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Colorado does not seem to me at all consistent with the offer which these contestants made of proof as stated in the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I desire to state, as I did when I had the floor before, that I do not dispute the general principles advanced by the Senator from Massachusetts, nor the general proposition made in this report; but I continue of the opinion that it is altogether too broad a conclusion to say that where a State Legislature, or one branch of a State Legislature deliberately ejects members and puts others in their places in order to change the political character of the Legislature, and more than that, for the immediate and special purpose of electing a particular man to the Senate of the United States, who is then and there elected, this body can not inquire into such action.

Now, the proposition in the offer which was made of proof before this committee—and I understand very well that the Senator from Indiana, whose seat is now in question, does not admit that the facts could be proved as stated—but dealing with the offer of proof, the proposition was:

That before said alleged election the senate wrongfully, and for the purpose of obtaining a majority for said TURPIE—ejected certain members and seated others.

That is the case; that wrongfully and with all these attending circumstances of outrage, in order that they might get a majority for this particular man for Senator, they then and there changed the complexion of that State Legislature.

Mr. President, I argue with considerable confidence that a case of that kind brings the ejection of the two members and the installation of two other persons so closely and completely and intimately into the election of a United States Senator that the Senate of the United States may fairly treat those acts as a part of the election of a United States Senator; and if in that election thus consummated there has been committed fraud or wrong in any way, the Senate of the United States may be a tribunal for the purpose of righting that wrong.

The Senator from Massachusetts has stated two illustrations, one the case where it might be supposed that the President of the United States appointed two justices of the Supreme Court in order to secure a particular opinion from the court to which the appointments were made. It seems to me that the illustration is not a good one. It is difficult to conceive how such a motive could be proved on the part of a President; and there is the further fact, that there is no tribunal which by any possibility in any form of proceeding could ascertain the motive of the President in appointing two justices on the supreme bench. The Senator appears to think his illustration is a good one and that there is a tribunal that has just as much right to pass upon the motive of the President in appointing two judges of the Supreme Court as this Senate has to deal with the election of a United States Senator. Then he may remain satisfied with his illustration.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will allow me. I think if there were a suit brought before any court in this country on the judgment in the legal-tender cases the court would determine whether it would maintain that suit, having the same right to go into the question of the motive of the appointment of those two judges and their right to sit and determine that question as we have to go into the question of the motive of the senate of Indiana in declaring a certain person entitled to his seat in that body.

Mr. CHANDLER. I perceive that the Senator persists in his illustration and I still persist in differing from him. I think that a subordinate tribunal trying a case which involves the legality of the legal-tender act has not a right to go into the motive of the President of the United States in appointing two judges of the Supreme Court. It is not a tribunal for that purpose. But to say that the Senate of the United States, when it is engaged in investigating the election of one of its members by a State Legislature, can go into all the circumstances of that election and every step of that election, and can not go into the facts that are alleged in this offer of proof reported by the committee, is an entirely different claim.

The Senator also adduced another illustration. He says, in effect, that the Senate of the United States has no right to go into the question presented to-day by the offer of the remonstrants against the right of the Senator from Indiana to his seat, because the Electoral Commission in 1877 concluded that it had no right to go behind the findings of the returning boards in the Southern States. There is as to the case which furnishes this illustration a very wide and evident distinction, and that is that there was no tribunal which had any authority under the Constitution and laws of the United States to investigate the appointment of those electors which should appear to Congress to have been appointed in such manner as the Legislatures of the several States had prescribed.

When the Legislature of a State created a canvassing board and the canvassing board made their finding, the decision of eight out of the fifteen members of the Electoral Commission was that there was no power in Congress, in either or both branches, or in the Electoral Commission, to go behind that finding. There was no tribunal existing for that purpose. But if there had in fact been, within the contemplation of the Constitution, a tribunal created with authority to investigate the question of the election of electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, it would have been very difficult to resist the conclusion that the tribunal might inquire into more of the facts and more of the circumstances connected with the Presidential election than the Electoral Commission felt authorized to do; and there is a very clear and plain and wide distinction between the two cases.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he means to say that this body can now go into the question whether the house of representatives in the Legislature of the State of Indiana when they seated the members that they seated—because if we go into the question as to one house we may go into it as to both houses of the Legislature—and say that it made a mistake when it did not oust the member who it was said ought to have been ousted because he was ineligible? Does the Senator seriously mean to claim that this Senate is to resolve itself into a tribunal to determine those questions?

Mr. CHANDLER. It will be difficult for me to convince the Senator from Colorado, because he says that the language of the report is not, as it stands, strong enough to suit him; but I deal with the language of the report. I say that if, as a part of the proceedings in the election of a Senator of the United States, the legislative body engaged in that election, just before the election and in such close connection with it that its action may be fairly treated by the Senate of the United States as a part of the election, wrongfully and for the purpose and with the effect of obtaining a majority for a particular individual, unseated members and seated others, it is competent for the Senate of the United States to go into that question.

The Senator from Massachusetts doubtless alluded to the decision of the Electoral Commission in order to make votes for his report on this side of the House; but I trust in the general interest of that report he has not succeeded by his reference to that decision, as I once did on a similar occasion in the Legislature of New Hampshire while trying to keep in a Democrat whose seat was contested, in driving so many Democrats away from him as to lose his case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to discharge the Committee on Privileges and Elections from the consideration of the remonstrances filed and referred to that committee in the case of the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE].

The motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. STEWART. I gave notice that I should call up the bill for the admission of Washington Territory to-day, but the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] is quite unwell and would like to have it postponed until next week. I ask unanimous consent to have it fixed for Thursday week at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks that the bill for the admission of Washington Territory be made the special order for Thursday of next week at 2 o'clock. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1216, being House bill 1275. There will be no controversy about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would state that the Calendar under Rule VIII being in order when the question of privilege was moved, the Chair had recognized the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] to move the consideration of another bill, and in equity the Chair thinks he should now recognize the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. BROWN. I appeal to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. FARWELL. How long will the Senator take?

Mr. BROWN. Not five minutes.

Mr. FARWELL. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask the Senator from Georgia to allow me to ask unanimous consent to have a bill made a special order, as I am now called to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BROWN. I yield for that purpose.

SEACOAST DEFENSES.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask unanimous consent that Order of Business 603, being the bill (S. 62) to provide for fortifications and other seacoast defenses, be made the special order for two weeks from Monday next, to follow the Washington Territory bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks that the bill named by him be made a special order for two weeks from Monday next, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 956) for the relief of the heirs of Christopher Cott;

A bill (H. R. 3604) granting an honorable discharge to A. R. Hartzell, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 4320) to authorize the construction of a graveled or macadamized road from the city of New Berne, N. C., to the national cemetery near said city.

The following House bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. 251) for the relief of the estate of Francis M. Murray, deceased; and

A bill (H. R. 6233) for the relief of Jesse Coe.

The bill (H. R. 5080) for the relief of C. B. Wilson was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. 7111) granting a pension to Caroline Pautel was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT COLUMBUS, GA.

Mr. BROWN. I now move to take up the bill to which I have referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1216, House bill 1275.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. 1275) for the erection of a public building at Columbus, Ga., and appropriating money therefor, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT STEAM RAILROADS.

Mr. FARWELL. I move——

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Senator from Illinois to yield a moment to enable me to have a bill made a special order. I move that Calendar No. 1302, Senate bill 2919, be made the special order for Tuesday week.

Mr. FARWELL. Will the Senator from West Virginia state the object of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The title will be stated by the Secretary.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2919) to define the routes of steam railroads in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What day does the Senator name?

Mr. FAULKNER. I named Tuesday week, as I thought that would give every one an opportunity to thoroughly consider the bill, a special order having already been fixed for the Monday preceding that, and also for Thursday. I desire to give full opportunity for all the Senators to consider the bill as now presented by the committee. It is an important matter, and it ought to be decided promptly one way or the other.

Mr. MORRILL. Does the Senator mean next Tuesday or a week from next Tuesday?

Mr. FAULKNER. A week from next Tuesday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the bill being made a special order for Tuesday of the week after next? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHARLESTON, S. C.

Mr. HAMPTON. I ask the Senator from Illinois to allow me to call up a House bill which is a matter of great consequence to the city of Charleston.

Mr. FARWELL. How long will it take?

Mr. HAMPTON. I think not two minutes.

Mr. FARWELL. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HAMPTON. It is Order of Business 1217.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina asks that Order of Business 1217, House bill 4358, be now taken up. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4358) to increase the limit of cost for the public building in course of erection at Charleston, S. C.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

Mr. FARWELL. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 938, being the bill (S. 2615) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to acquire and use real estate for railway purposes in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not insist on that motion. This is a minor question as compared with the one presented by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER], and just made a special order for a week from Tuesday next. I think the major question ought to be decided first, manifestly so. Having spent the better part of thirty-three years of my life in this city, I naturally take some interest in what so deeply concerns the welfare of the city as the location of the two railroads, the Baltimore and Ohio and the Baltimore and Potomac.

Mr. FARWELL. I beg the Senator's pardon one moment. This bill is not objected to by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand that perfectly; but at the same time it is a question which is connected with the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad. When the major question shall have been decided the Senator will find me as liberal as himself towards either of these roads; but looking to the fact that this city is destined to stand in the primacy of all national cities in the world, I desire that we shall protect, if possible, the public parks. That is with me the principal and chief object in appearing on this matter. I desire to participate in the discussion of these questions. I do not feel well enough to do it to-day, but I hope to be prepared to do it a week from Tuesday, or I will make no further opposition.

Again, I desire to see the bill that has been presented by the Committee on the District of Columbia; it has not yet made its appearance on our desks in print. When that shall appear I shall be ready to offer a substitute which I not only hope will receive the approval of the Committee on the District of Columbia, but receive the approval of a majority of this body. I therefore trust that the Senator from Illinois will not press this measure forward at this time. I conceive it manifestly unfair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Calendar under Rule VIII being in order, the Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2615) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to acquire and use real estate for railway purposes in the District of Columbia. The question is on that motion.

The question being put, a division was called for, and the ayes were 8——

Mr. MORRILL. We shall have to have the yeas and nays.

Mr. VEST. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not persist in calling up the bill under the present circumstances. The Senator from Vermont states that his health is such that he can not debate the question to-day. Without saying what my view is in regard to the bill, I sincerely hope that we shall hear the Senator from Vermont on the question. There can be no such emergency as to authorize the pressing of the bill at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division having been called for, the the Chair will announce the result of the count: The yeas are 8, and the noes 15. A quorum has not voted.

Mr. FARWELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPOONER. I appeal to the Senator from Illinois. I am in favor of this bill and joined in the report of the Committee on the District of Columbia in favor of it; but when the Senator from Vermont states that he desires to be present, and that he is ill and can not participate in the discussion to-day, and therefore prefers that the Senate defer action upon it, I submit to the Senator from Illinois that the bill ought not to be pressed at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the pending question the Senator from Illinois demands the yeas and nays. Is there a second for the call?

Mr. BUTLER. I trust the Senator from Illinois will not insist on his motion. I am heartily in favor of considering the bill, but in view of the statement made by the Senator from Vermont I think it would scarcely be becoming to take up the bill now. Therefore, I shall feel constrained to vote against the motion, whilst I should be very glad, indeed, to have the bill considered.

Mr. VANCE. If it be in order at this stage of the proceeding I desire to move, in deference to the request of the Senator from Vermont, the postponement of this bill until Tuesday next. He desires very much to discuss it, and he has announced this morning that he is not able to do so to-day, but hopes to be able to do so by next Tuesday, or if he is not then that he will withdraw his application before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would be compelled to hold that that motion is not now in order. The bill is not before the Senate. The motion is to proceed to its consideration, upon which there has been a division, which discloses that no quorum is present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is evident there is a quorum in the Chamber, and therefore I ask unanimous consent to say a single word.

Mr. FARWELL. I will withdraw the request for the consideration of the bill under the circumstances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois withdraws his motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

ADMISSION OF NEW STATES.

Mr. PLATT. While I was out of the Chamber a few moments since I understand that unanimous consent was obtained for the consideration of the bill for the admission of Washington Territory a week from Thursday next. I ask that that consent may also include the other two admission bills, for North Dakota and Montana. I think we may dispose of all of them in one day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator indicate them by the numbers on the Calendar?

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are understood. We all know what they are. I wish to say on the subject of unanimous consent that all this must be taken subject to other business not of a legislative character that the Senate may find it proper to attend to.

Mr. PLATT. I supposed all our unanimous consents were subject to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] asks unanimous consent that the two bills referred to by him, one Order of Business 677, being the bill (S. 1196) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of North Dakota, and for other purposes, and the other Order of Business 819, being the bill (S. 2512) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Montana, and for other purposes, shall be considered by the Senate after its disposition of the bill for the admission of Washington. Is there objection to unanimous consent being given? The Chair hear none, and it is so ordered.

HOURS OF LETTER-CARRIERS.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 865, being the bill (H. R. 1645) to limit the hours that letter-carriers in cities shall be employed per day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Calendar, under Rule VIII, being in order, the Senator from New Hampshire moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It provides that hereafter eight hours shall constitute a day's work for letter-carriers in cities or postal districts connected therewith, for which they shall receive the same pay as is now paid as for a day's work of a greater number of hours. If any letter-carrier is employed a greater number of hours per day than eight, he shall be paid extra for the same in proportion to the salary now fixed by law.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to say that I am very anxious to dispose of this bill, and will ask the indulgence of the Senate beyond 2 o'clock, if it shall not then be disposed of.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Education and Labor with an amendment to add as a new section:

SEC. 2. That the Postmaster-General is authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations for carrying this act into effect.

Mr. BLAIR. The committee report the bill with this amendment, but on account of the great difficulty of securing attention to the bill and the really unimportant character of the amendment, the committee desire that it be disagreed to. I ask that the committee amendment be disagreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Education and Labor.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALBEMARLE AND CHESAPEAKE CANAL COMPANY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Calendar, under Rule VIII, being in order, the first bill on the Calendar in regular order will be announced.

The bill (S. 2039) for the relief of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company was announced as first in order on the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The bill proposes to direct the Secretary of the Navy to investigate the claim of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company for tolls on vessels transporting naval supplies, and to award such sum as he may find equitably due, not to exceed $3,742.20, the award to be in full payment of all claims of the company against the Government.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAUDE H. MASTIN.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I move to proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 730, being the bill (S. 437) for the relief of Claude H. Mastin, surviving partner of the firm of Le Vert & Mastin, of Mobile, Ala.

Mr. VEST. Several of us have bills that we should like to have considered, and I simply want to call the attention of the Senate to this practice, after the Calendar has been taken up, of laying it aside. I have not the slightest objection to the Senator from Arkansas taking up his bill, but we ought to go on with the Calendar regularly, or else not attempt to enforce the rules of the Senate at all. We shall never get through the Calendar under the practice that the Senator from Arkansas now resorts to. I have on the Calendar three or four bills which I especially desire to have passed, but I have refrained from asking the Senate to take them up out of their order in the hope that the Calendar might be proceeded with regularly.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I deem it proper to say that I have no objection to taking up the Calendar and proceeding with it regularly, and I very much desire to do so. I have no objection to the Senator from Missouri calling up any bill out of order at any time, and will certainly not characterize his action as scrambling. The bill I move to take up has been on the Calendar quite a while; it has been reported time and again by committees of this body; it is a just and equitable claim, and in my judgment it ought to have been passed long since. I hope the Senate will proceed to its consideration.

Mr. VEST. I have bills of the same character on the Calendar.

Mr. MORGAN. It was at my request that the Senator from Arkansas moved to take up this bill. It is a bill to provide for the payment of a debt due to a firm, one member of which is dead. The daughter of Dr. Le Vert, the deceased member of the firm, is very infirm, is almost dying. The Government of the United States owes the firm a small sum of money for the use of property. The bill has twice heretofore passed the Senate. I think there will be no trouble at all in passing it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of Senators to the fact that debate on motions of this character is not in order under the rule, and can only be tolerated by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS. I know debate is out of order, but I desire to say, as others have been allowed to be heard, that I hope the bill called up by the Senator from Arkansas will be disposed of, but it seems to me the wisest thing we can do is by unanimous consent to agree to take up the Calendar under Rule VIII, and devote, I would say to-morrow, next day, and the next day, at least two or three days in succession to it, so that we may run through the Calendar as we did three or four weeks ago, devoting day after day to it for such number of days as the Senate will consent to devote to it. And I will ask at this time unanimous consent of the Senate, if there be no appropriation bill interfering, that we take up the Calendar under Rule VIII to-morrow and devote at least the next two days to it immediately after the routine morning business is concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] asks unanimous consent of the Senate that to-morrow, immediately after the routine morning business, the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Calendar in its order. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to proceed to the consideration of the bill which has been indicated.

Mr. CHANDLER. What is the order of business?

The CHIEF CLERK. Order of Business 730, being the bill (S. 437) for the relief of Claude H. Mastin, surviving partner of the firm of Le Vert & Mastin, of Mobile, Ala.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the bill taken up on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] be proceeded with, displacing the unfinished business as to that bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire at this time to move another bill to displace the regular order; but I shall yield informally to the Senator from Arkansas to dispose of his bill.

Mr. HARRIS. If this bill is taken up under my motion, the Senator will have a chance presently.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that Senate bill 437 be continued in consideration.

Mr. BLAIR. Should that be done, as soon as the bill is disposed of will it be in order for me to move to proceed to consider any bill on the Calendar?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands. If the Senate votes to consider this bill, the consideration of which is moved now by the Senator from Tennessee, it will displace the unfinished business.

Mr. BLAIR. But when the bill of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] is disposed of, will it then be in order for me to make a motion to proceed to consider some other bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands, there being no unfinished business at that time and no special order for that time.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the Chair to recognize me, then, when this bill shall have been disposed of.

Mr. PALMER. I am willing that Senate bill 2083, being the animal-industry bill, should be displaced. There is such a diversity of opinion that it will lead to great discussion, and I shall be out of the Chamber much of the time for the next two weeks, and therefore would prefer to have it go to the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to proceed with the consideration of Senate bill 437.

Mr. VEST. What is the fate of the bill in regard to the Bureau of Animal Industry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be displaced by this motion, and will go to the Calendar in its order.

Mr. VEST. Then it goes back to the Calendar?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It goes back to the Calendar. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS].

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 437) for the relief of Claude H. Mastin, surviving partner of the firm of Le Vert & Mastin, of Mobile, Ala.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, in line 9, after the word "Hospital," to insert "and;" and after the word "thereto," in the same line, to strike out the words "and so forth;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and required to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,927 to Claude H. Mastin, surviving partner of Le Vert & Mastin; the said sum to be received in full payment and satisfaction for the rent of the Le Vert Hospital and damages thereto by the United States authorities.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GREENOUGH'S STATUE OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, some days ago I offered a resolution in regard to the statue of Washington in the Capitol grounds, and it was referred to the Committee on the Library. At the request of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I wish to have that reference changed, with the consent of the chairman of the Committee on the Library, the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], with whom I have conferred. I move that the resolution be withdrawn from the Committee on the Library and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the resolution to which the Senator from Missouri refers will be withdrawn from the Committee on the Library and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, together with the letter accompanying the resolution.

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate proceed to consider Order of Business 1196, being the bill (H. R. 8560) to establish a Department of Labor, a bill that passed the House of Representatives unanimously.

Mr. VEST. I hope we shall go on with the Calendar. I may be in a minority, but I shall insist on it.

Mr. BLAIR. My motion is in order. I hope the Senator will not oppose it.

Mr. VEST. It is a very important bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The Senator from New Hampshire moves to proceed to the consideration of House bill 8560.

The question being put, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask for a division.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope not.

Mr. BLAIR. The bill will take but a short time.

Mr. HARRIS. It will take at least an hour.

Mr. BLAIR. I have wanted for a long time to rid myself of the burden of this bill.

Mr. HARRIS. You can bear the burden a little longer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls attention to the rule that prohibits debate on a motion of this character. Is a division called for?

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to have the bill considered. If it is necessary to call for a division, I must do so, or call for the yeas and nays. I think there will be no further question made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is a division called for by the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that the question be put again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question again on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8560) to establish a Department of Labor.

The question being put, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KENNA. Are the yeas and nays ordered? I saw but two hands up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair saw a sufficient number rising to second the call for the yeas and nays. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANDERSON (in the chair, when his name was called). The occupant of the chair announces that he is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. I do not know how he would vote if present.

Mr. ALLISON. I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—16.

Blair,	Davis,	Hoar,	Teller,
Bowen,	Evarts,	Jones of Arkansas,	Turpie,
Brown,	Faulkner,	Palmer,	Voorhees,
Chandler,	George,	Sherman,	Wilson of Iowa.

NAYS—14.

Bate,	Coke,	Pasco,	Vance,
Butler,	Hampton,	Pugh,	Vest.
Call,	Harris,	Quay,
Cockrell,	Morgan,	Reagan,

ABSENT—46.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Ingalls,	Riddleberger,
Allison,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Sabin,
Beck,	Eustis,	Kenna,	Saulsbury,
Berry,	Farwell,	McPherson,	Sawyer,
Blackburn,	Frye,	Manderson,	Spooner,
Blodgett,	Gibson,	Mitchell,	Stanford,
Cameron,	Gorman,	Morrill,	Stewart,
Chace,	Gray,	Paddock,	Stockbridge,
Colquitt,	Hale,	Payne,	Walthall,
Cullom,	Hawley,	Platt,	Wilson of Md.
Daniel,	Hearst,	Plumb,
Dawes,	Hiscock,	Ransom,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not a quorum voting. The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Cullom,	Jones of Arkansas,	Saulsbury,
Allison,	Davis,	Kenna,	Sawyer,
Bate,	Dolph,	Manderson,	Sherman,
Blair,	Evarts,	Paddock,	Spooner,
Bowen,	Frye,	Palmer,	Stewart,
Brown,	George,	Pasco,	Teller,

Call,	Hampton,	Platt,	Vest,
Chandler,	Harris,	Pugh,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Quay,	Walthall,
Coke,	Hoar,	Reagan,	Wilson of Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call of the roll discloses forty-four Senators present. A quorum being present, the call under the order for the yeas and nays will be proceeded with.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. EVARTS. I am unable to vote. I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. PADDOCK. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. I do not know how he would vote.

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Allison,	Davis,	Hoar,	Stewart,
Blair,	Edmunds,	Jones of Arkansas,	Teller,
Bowen,	Faulkner,	Manderson,	Turpie,

Chace,	Hale,	Paddock,	Wilson of Md.
Colquitt,	Hearst,	Payne,
Daniel,	Hiscock,	Platt,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Plumb,

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire having the bill in charge to allow it to be laid aside informally, so that I may call up the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I assent to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the request of the Senator from Iowa to be that the pending bill be temporarily laid aside for the consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; I ask that it be informally laid aside for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is so ordered, unless there be objection.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to have an order made?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. BROWN. In the Forty-sixth Congress a bill was introduced in the Senate for the relief of Nathaniel P. Harbin. There was no adverse report, as I understand, and the papers are on the files of the Senate. I ask leave for his attorney to withdraw them.

The order was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That Nathaniel P. Harbin have leave to withdraw the papers in his case from the files of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had yesterday approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. 1148) to grant a right of way to the Kansas City and Pacific Railroad Company through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes;

An act (S. 2671) to create and organize the county of Latah;

An act (S. 1889) to authorize the Tennessee Midland Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Tennessee River at any point on the line between the counties of Decatur and Perry, in the State of Tennessee, it may deem acceptable;

An act (S. 2198) to authorize the building of a railroad bridge at Little Rock, Ark.; and Joint resolution (S. R. 73) relating to the disposal of public lands in certain States.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pension appropriation bill will be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5445) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, which was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the amendments may be considered as the bill is read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read and the amendments will be considered on the formal reading of the bill, if there be no objection. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 11, after the word "Mexico," to strike out "seventy-nine million" and insert "eighty million four hundred and seventy-three thousand;" so as to read:

For Army and Navy pensions as follows: For invalids, widows, minor children, and dependent relatives, and survivors and widows of the war of 1812, and with Mexico, $80,473,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 15, after the words "And provided further," to strike out:

That in all pensions to widows, payments shall be made from the date of death of the husband.

And to insert:

That all pensions which have been, or which may hereafter be, granted under the general laws regulating pensions to widows in consequence of death occurring from a cause which originated in the service since the 4th day of March, 1861, shall commence from the date of death of the husband.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for a division of the motion to strike out and insert. I desire first to have the question taken on the motion to strike out.

Mr. ALLISON. Is the question divisible?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly it is divisible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair presumes a division may be ordered if requested by the Senator from Missouri. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lines 15, 16, and 17 the committee report to strike out the words:

That in all pensions to widows, payments shall be made from the date of death of the husband.

Mr. ALLISON. It does not seem to me that that would be the proper way to put the question on the amendment. The amendment is to strike out and insert. The Senator from Missouri moves to strike out, and not to insert. I do not wish to vote to strike this clause out unless the words in italics are inserted. It ought not to be a divisible amendment, although it may be under parliamentary rules. My impression, however, is that it is not divisible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will read Rule XVIII.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

RULE XVIII.

AMENDMENTS—DIVISION OF A QUESTION.

If the question in debate contains several propositions, any Senator may have the same divided, except a motion to strike out and insert, which shall not be divided; but the rejection of a motion to strike out and insert one proposition shall not prevent a motion to strike out and insert a different proposition; nor shall it prevent a motion simply to strike out; nor shall the rejection of a motion to strike out prevent a motion to strike out and insert. But pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted shall each be regarded for the purpose of amendment as a question; and motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under this rule the Chair feels constrained to hold that the amendment is not divisible, and that the question before the Senate will be on striking out the words in lines 15, 16, and 17, and inserting the words which follow, printed in italics.

Mr. HARRIS. I raise a question of order on the amendment, that it is legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no doubt of the fact that it is legislation; but the provision is in the bill, and we are bound to deal with it in some way.

Mr. COCKRELL. If there is legislation in the bill after we strike out what the committee propose shall be stricken out, that can also be rejected. Then the whole provision will go out, and that is just what ought to be done. Neither the part proposed to be stricken out nor the part proposed to be inserted by the Senate committee ought to be left in the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. It strikes me that that is rather a broad statement. When a widow applies for a pension, or for the continuance of a pension which was given to her husband, and the Pension Bureau decides that she is entitled to it, I see no logic in the world in insisting that the payment shall begin with the date of the application. It seems to me it is entirely just that the widow should draw pension from the date of the death of the husband. Of course there are some equities in individual cases, as if a widow should wait five years or ten years, being wealthy or able to get on without assistance; but that has nothing to do with the general principle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will take advantage of its privilege under Rule XX:

The Presiding Officer may submit any question of order for the decision of the Senate.

The Chair will submit to the Senate the question whether the point of order is well taken that this is legislation.

Mr. ALLISON. I should be glad to have the Chair state the point of order. Is the point of order made by the Senator from Tennessee that the original text is not in order?

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Tennessee has no right to make a question of order upon the original text as it came from the other House; but where the Committee on Appropriations have incorporated in the form of an amendment that which amounts to general legislation, and have attached it to an appropriation bill, it is in direct conflict with the rules of the Senate and is clearly out of order. My question of order is upon the committee amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Then the Senate is in the attitude of finding objectionable legislation on the bill, and having no power or control over it in the way of amendment. Surely that can not be the intent and purpose of any rule of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I am surprised to hear the Senator from Iowa make that statement, in view of the fact that he and I have witnessed controversies over this precise question a hundred times upon this floor, and if there has been the shadow of variableness or of turning in respect of its decision, I do not call to mind the time when we have failed to rule such an amendment out of order. Notwithstanding the fact that the House bill may contain legislation, if a Senate amendment to it amounts to general legislation it has been invariably held by the Chair to be out of order, and therefore it has not been entertained, so far as my memory goes.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think the rulings of the Chair have been uniform in this regard; but it is certain that if this provision is stricken out now by a vote of the Senate it will be insisted upon by the other House, and then a conference will be appointed upon the disagreeing votes, and three conferees on the part of the Senate will do what the Senator from Tennessee says the Senate can not do under its rule.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can refuse to accede to the report of the conferees.

Mr. HARRIS. There is certainly no question about the fact that if the clause proposed to be inserted by the committee is ruled out of order and the Senate then chooses to strike out the text of the bill as it came from the other House, and leaves it an open question for the conference, the conferees may amend it in conference, and then each House will determine whether it will agree to the report of the committee or not. But my point is that the Senate ought to respect its own rules and observe its own dignity in respect to the provision, no matter what may be the result later.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from Tennessee a question?

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He speaks of what a committee of conference may do. Does he mean to maintain that a committee of conference can introduce legislation into an appropriation bill and be outside of the point of order when their report of such an amendment comes in? I should hope not.

Mr. HARRIS. I will state what I mean, Mr. President. I can not quite assent affirmatively to the suggestion that the Senator from Vermont makes; but the other House has sent us an appropriation bill which does contain a legislative provision. We have a perfect right to strike it out. We can not make a question of order upon it in the Senate and dispose of it in that way. The committee of conference has no higher right than the two Houses who constitute that committee, and general legislation upon an appropriation bill being forbidden by the rules of both Houses I should deny the power of a conference committee to insert general legislation. But where the Senate has stricken out a provision in the text of the bill the conferees on the part of the two Houses must either agree to the striking out or they must reinstate, or reinstate with an amendment or something in lieu of it, as is the usual practice. However, if I am asked the direct question, Has a conference committee the power to legislate upon a general appropriation bill? I am bound to answer, No; it has not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So say I, Mr. President. A conference committee is not a joint committee, but it is a meeting of two distinct and independent committees. Therefore, when a report is made to this body by our conferees, as it can be made by nobody else, it is a report of our own committee, and they have no more right to put legislation in an appropriation bill than anybody else. I think that is very clear.

But the difficulty is the one suggested by the Senator from Iowa, that in spite of all our efforts to keep legislation out of appropriation bills we have not had the courage (I should not dare to say the good sense, because that would imply that we have not good sense, which all of us would deny, of course) to have a rule of the Senate providing that any legislation which comes to us in a House appropriation bill should, as a matter of order, be stricken out, and after being stricken out that action should be insisted upon to the very end. The House of Representatives, having the public interests in charge as well as we, if they undertook to affirm a thing in an appropriation bill that the Senate were not willing to agree to, whether it is an item or whether it is a law, would recede of course, just as we must always do when we put an amendment on a House bill or send over a bill of our own to them to some phrase in which they are unwilling to agree; if we want the bill passed at all we must recede from that phrase.

Yet go as far as the other House is willing to go, the matter is easy enough except for the technical difficulty that our rules do not provide, as they ought and as I have tried in an humble and ineffectual way hitherto to have them provide, that all general legislation in an appropriation bill which comes from the House of Representatives should go out as a matter of order; that it should not be left to any committee to consider whether they could improve it or do something else about it, but that we should say, "We will not consider questions of general legislation upon an appropriation bill."

This provision that the Committee on Appropriations propose is a great improvement upon the proposition of the other House, but both of them, I must admit, are clearly general legislation. We ought either to waive our own rule and agree to the committee's amendment, or, without going into a consideration of the merits of either the amendment or the original proposition of the other House, we ought to strike them both out and stick to it; and there is no danger in sticking to it in respect of the other House receding, because the other House is a body of equal good sense with our own and knows the relations that exist between two independent bodies.

There is great merit apparently in what our committee propose, although the object of all our laws about limiting the time for paying pensions is to guard against fraud and the temptation of speculators to make false claims of all kinds in the name of somebody and thus be working a continual fraud upon the Treasury.

That is the theory which limits applications for pensions, and the time when they are allowed to go back to. It is not because in a case that is perfectly clear it ought not to go back in that particular case, but because in all general laws you must provide for the general public safety by having limitations in order to avoid the presentation of false and fraudulent claims. These limitations only operate upon people who neglect to apply for and enforce their rights. The Government goes upon the principle that everybody understood his rights and must be governed by some general law and provision.

But this amendment of the committee is, I have no doubt, out of order, and the House provision is equally out of order in respect of the spirit of our rules. I do not know what their rules are; perhaps I have no right to know; but certainly it is against the spirit of our rules, and being so, it ought to go out as a matter of order without regard to its merit.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to say to the Senator from Vermont that if he will formulate the rule he has just suggested as a matter of order in this body, to strike out legislative provisions in appropriation bills, as one member of the Committee on Rules I shall most cheerfully favor its adoption. But under our rules as they now stand we have no authority to do that. The only remedy we have in respect of general legislation on appropriation bills coming from the other House is the power of amendment, to strike it out.

I have agreed upon many occasions with the Senator from Vermont before to-day that this body ought to strike out general legislation from an appropriation bill, and when we have stricken it out because it was general legislation upon such bill, we ought to stand by our action and assert our view of the policy, or rather the impolicy and the vice, of putting general legislation upon appropriation bills.

I shall be very glad, if the Senator from Vermont will formulate the rule he suggests, to see it adopted and become a part of our standing rules; but as we have no such rule now, the only remedy is the question of order; and then we can strike out, if the Senator from Iowa will agree, the original provision in the House bill and let the conference committee see what they can do with it later.

Mr. HAWLEY. I can not agree with the Senator from Tennessee in the chief point he makes. We have matter in this bill which the Senate must either adopt as a whole or reject as a whole. It is a very singular condition of affairs that there shall be a clause in any bill which upon its first consideration in Committee of the Whole we must either throw out wholly or accept wholly.

If he says we can not raise the point of order on the original provision because it was put in by the other House, then we accept that proposition as in the bill like all other provisions and subject to all the liabilities of other provisions.

I can not consent that the Senate shall agree to a rule by which it shall take away from itself absolutely the power to amend. I will go as far as the farthest in striking out from every appropriation bill anything whatever in the nature of legislation. Congress spent four months eleven years ago fighting on that proposition, and the Republicans of the House of Representatives were absolutely right, in my judgment, in resisting the passage of even the appropriation bill for the support of the Army in the spring of 1877, and compelling an extra session upon that issue. I say I will go as far as the farthest; but if we are not to be able to apply our own rule against legislation to a bill that comes here from our committee, I do not care where it originated, then I want that phrase to stand upon an equal footing with every other phrase in the bill; that is, let it be open to amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to ask him, if we relax our rule or ignore it as to legislative propositions upon appropriation bills coming from the other House, does he not realize the fact that appropriation bills will become the receptacle for a large proportion of our important legislation? We had as well abandon the struggle as either to relax or ignore the provisions of our rules and let appropriation bills become the vehicles for forcing through all manner of general legislation.

Mr. HAWLEY. But it is not I who am relaxing. Suppose that this has no business on the bill as general legislation, I should rule it out; I should be in favor generally, if the Senate will agree to it, whether the point of order be made or not, that the Appropriations Committee shall report, if you choose, to strike out from even its report a clause which is distinctly legislative. I would not relax the rule myself, and I will agree upon any course that shall be thought best to enforce it absolutely and without reservation; but if we are not to enforce it, if the Senator's point is good that it is a relaxation of the rule, that we can not raise the point of order upon legislation coming here from the other House, then I say let us hold to our right to amend that legislation. It is very illogical indeed that we should unconstitutionally deprive ourselves of the full power of legislation upon every line in the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think the Senator from Connecticut need have any apprehension that the conferees on the part of the Senate would yield after the Senate had taken decided action. The proposition that came from the other House reads thus:

That in all pensions to widows, payments shall be made from the date of death of the husband.

I suppose that would include the one solitary Revolutionary widow that I believe there is, and some 11,000 widows of the war of 1812, and so on. It is proposed that the Senate shall strike that out and insert a clause which is clearly legislation. It is upon this amendment, proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, that the Senator from Tennessee has made his point of order. There can be no question but that the point of order is well taken, and that the amendment is amenable to the rule of the Senate prohibiting legislation upon an appropriation bill. If the Senate sustains the point of order which has been submitted to the Senate, I shall move to strike out the words:

That in all pensions to widows, payments shall be made from the date of death of the husband.

If the point of order is sustained, I hope the Senate will agree to strike out those words, and then it will go into conference, and I think the Senate need have no fears that the conferees on the part of the Senate will not adhere to the vote of the Senate, and will make no compromise upon this measure when they have been instructed by a vote of the Senate as to what they shall do.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to be instructed by the Senator from Missouri, or the Senator from Vermont, or some other great legal light, in regard to this matter. I understand that it has been settled by our parliamentary practice that the general appropriation bills are bills for raising revenue. They originate in the House of Representatives. The House of Representatives makes that claim, and we accede to it.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; I think not. I have never yielded it.

Mr. HOAR. We have acceded to it for many years.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the Senate has never yielded it, and I can show the Senator reports of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives repudiating that idea.

Mr. HAWLEY. Reports of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives?

Mr. COCKRELL. I say House Judiciary Committee reports have been made absolutely against the idea that the House of Representatives had the exclusive right to originate appropriation bills.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that whatever may have been said by one particular committee in the House of Representatives, or whatever may have been said by Senators in times past, it is the settled construction of the clause in the Constitution that bills appropriating money to which bills for raising revenue are in order are bills for raising revenue within the meaning of the clause which provides that they shall originate in the House of Representatives. Nobody has undertaken to insist on the right of the Senate to originate one of these bills for a generation in any practical way.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will allow me to suggest that I do not think the Senate has ever yielded to that proposition. Indeed, we pass appropriation bills for public buildings here every day and send them to the other House.

Mr. HOAR. I understand; but I refer to the general appropriation bills.

Mr. ALLISON. We have not, of course, attempted to take jurisdiction of that subject.

Mr. HOAR. Why not?

Mr. ALLISON. I think we ought to do it.

Mr. HOAR. I understand——

Mr. ALLISON. I think the Senate ought to take the initiative in regard to appropriation bills.

Mr. HOAR. What I wish to say is, that these are either revenue bills or they are not. If we yield as a matter of practice to the claim of the House of Representatives that they have a right to originate these general appropriation bills, whether we think we are right or think we are wrong, and make it the settled policy of this Government that these bills are to be treated as within the constitutional prohibition to the Senate and they must originate in the House of Representatives, that is one thing. If we do not think so, the committee of which the Senator from Iowa is chairman should introduce a certain number of general appropriation bills and send them down to the other House and stand on our rights. If we yield that right, as we have done for a generation, we are bound to assert the clause of the Constitution that goes with it, that the Senate being deprived of the power to originate bills of that class it shall have and may rightfully exercise the power to put amendments on those bills as on other bills.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why, then, did we make the rule?

Mr. HOAR. What I wish to have the Senator answer is this: We have got to take that constitutional deprivation accompanied with the duty which the Constitution has put upon it. If one branch of the Government is, for the public interest, deprived of the power of originating this class of bills, it must exercise, and it can not take away by its rule the power to exercise, the right to amend such a bill as other bills.

I do not regard it a good answer to this proposition to say we think the other House is wrong. There is not a Senator here who stands on his opinion that the other House is wrong, and asserts the right of the Senate. The other House has carried into our constitutional interpretation the doctrine that the thirteen or fourteen great appropriation bills of the year must be originated there, and that we can not touch them as initiative legislation. We yield to that doctrine, and as long as we yield to that doctrine we are bound to assert our constitutional right on the contrary to amend them as other bills.

Mr. COCKRELL. We have not yielded any particle of our right. The Senate has a constitutional right, and the right under its rules to amend all revenue bills, but the Senate has never recognized an appropriation bill as a revenue bill, nor has the House of Representatives ever claimed that an appropriation bill was a revenue bill. A revenue bill would be legislation. The House of Representatives has its rules prohibiting legislation upon appropriation bills. The Senate has its rules prohibiting legislation upon appropriation bills. The House of Representatives has no rule prohibiting legislation on revenue bills, nor as a matter of course has the Senate any such rule.

Here is an appropriation bill, pure and simple. It is not a revenue bill. It proposes nothing in the way of revenue. The other House, by inadvertence or otherwise, has inserted legislation. The Senate Committee on Appropriations proposes to strike out that legislation and insert other legislation. The point of order is made against the proposed amendment of the Senate committee. It is made for the purpose of getting at the whole question. If the Senate shall hold that that is legislation and so it shall be rejected, then a motion will be made to strike out the legislation which the other House has inserted, and I hope that motion will prevail. Then we shall have divested this appropriation bill of its obnoxious features under the rules of the House and of the Senate.

As I said, I doubt not the Senate Committee on Appropriations or its conferees will stand by the instructions of the Senate on that question, as they ought to do. I hope that the Senate will sustain the objection made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] that this is legislation, and when that is done I shall move to strike out the legislation the other House has inserted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Committee on Appropriations itself has reported to strike out this legislative clause in the House bill. It has also reported, it is true, to put in another clause in the place of it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, and I tried to have a division of the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment is an improvement upon the House provision undoubtedly. Our own committee are of opinion that the clause as it stands in the House bill ought not to be there, whatever their motive may have been.

But let us come to the substance of this business about these bills. The Senator from Massachusetts has not maintained that the Senate can not originate an appropriation bill. He has only said that it has been the practice for a good many years for the House of Representatives to originate these general appropriation bills.

Mr. HOAR. As of right, of exclusive right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As of exclusive right, he says. I do not know where the evidence of that is; but I will assume for the sake of the argument that the other House does claim that it has the exclusive right to originate these bills, on the ground, as it professes, on this assumption that I make, that they are revenue bills—not bills for raising revenue, but bills for disposing of revenue—and that the Constitution reads in its true spirit according to that theory, that all bills for disposing of the revenues of the United States already raised must originate in the House of Representatives, for they fall, as the claim is thus, under the class of revenue bills. So be it, for the sake of the argument.

Then how can the Senate constitutionally originate and pass a bill which disposes of a single penny of the public money? The Constitution does not measure this right by the amount of money that is in the bill, but by the nature of the act that is being done; and the act that its framers were trying to secure was that the immediate and most direct and most frequently elected representatives of the people should be the originators of the taxing power, of taking money out of the pockets of the people and putting it into the Treasury. That is what it was, and all of it.

But if you take the other ground, and say that a bill for paying out money from the Treasury that has once been raised is a revenue bill (and it is not easy to pay it out until it is raised, because you can not get your requisition answered, however many laws you may pass), then you come to a proposition that, to my mind, is absolutely irrefutable; but you must go the whole length of that proposition, and not divide it on the question whether the bill contains $100,000 for a public building in Washington or $100 for a pension to a poor, broken-down soldier, or whatever may be the sum or amount or purpose of the money that is to be paid out of the Treasury. It is everything under the Constitution or it is nothing.

If the Senate has no right to pass an appropriation bill that takes a million dollars out of the Treasury, because it is a revenue bill, it clearly has no right to pass a bill that takes $10 out of the Treasury, because it is equally a revenue bill. Everybody knows, of course, who has the least common sense in the world, that that thing will not stand, and it never has stood.

But the House of Representatives, it is said, has contended by action (not otherwise that I know of) that large appropriations for the general purposes of the Government to carry on a Department, like the Indian appropriation bill, for instance, should originate with it. Suppose we originate one such bill and pass it; and they say, "we will not consider it;" that is, they lay it on the table, or do nothing; and suppose they stop there? Then of course the Government would stop, if we carry it around to all the objects of appropriation; nothing could be carried on, and somebody would be very much to blame. Either the House of Representatives would not be re-elected, and it would get members of a better mind, or we should not be re-elected.

But suppose they did the other thing, which they would do, and which they have done on one or two occasions I believe in old times, just leave the Senate bill in a committee or on the table, as they do the largest part of our bills to this day which are not revenue bills, and act upon and pass a bill of their own which appropriates precisely the same amounts of money for precisely the same objects, and they send it here. We do not contend that the House of Representatives have no right to originate such a bill, and all that we know officially is that a bill of precisely the same character which we have sent to them is on their table not acted upon. I think that we could take heart of grace in such a case and pass their bill without losing anything whatever of dignity or of our constitutional rights. I do not think in such a case that the question of who shall go first in to dinner would allow us to let the people's dinner entirely cool and let the Government stop; and we should not have recognized any exclusive right in the House of Representatives to originate an appropriation bill at all.

We know that in a hundred instances nearly in every Congress, certainly two dozen or more bills of the Senate have passed and have been sent to the House of Representatives and have gone on their table or somewhere else, we do not know where, and a bill in the same language or in substance the same bill comes from the House of Representaves; and what do we do? Do we say the other House is assuming a prerogative of originating that kind of a bill to pay a pension to somebody or to erect a public building or to allow a bridge to be built, or whatever? Not by any means. We pass the House bill as a mere matter of convenience that they have sent us, not because they refused to entertain ours, but because they have passed a bill of the same character which comes here, and we gladly take it up and pass it at once in order that, both Houses agreeing to such a measure, it may pass and become a law. That is the object of it and that is all, and it is not giving away any right of the Senate or disturbing the constitutional relations of the two Houses that the other House have not acted upon a bill of that character which we have sent to them, and we have acted upon a bill of the same character which they have sent to us later. It is a mere matter of convenience in doing business.

The practice, therefore, does not make a construction of the Constitution, because the two Houses have never come to a distinct and official difference of opinion upon that question, and it is a difference of opinion that so long as the Government is to go on can really never arise, because we having passed such an appropriation bill, and the other House not acting upon it, from whatever motive, they pass one of the same kind that is satisfactory to us, as they have a right to do, and we pass it as a matter of course; and if they have any taste or sentiment about it, let them enjoy it; it is nothing to us. So I do not think that this practice proves anything in regard to what is the Constitution.

But now I come back to the point that we have under consideration. If the House of Representatives put into an appropriation bill or any other bill a clause which we think ought not to be considered in that general kind of legislation that the general object of the bill is for, we certainly may make rules for the safety of the public, as we think, and for the good order of our own proceedings, as to how we will treat such a bill. We may make a rule such as there is in the constitutions of many States already, that no bill shall contain more than one subject of legislation. Suppose we had a rule of that kind and a House bill comes here with forty subjects of legislation—an omnibus bill. We say, "We can not proceed to consider a bill of that kind; we have a standing rule prohibiting it;" and everything after the first subject shall be stricken out. We reduce it to one subject, for we say that an omnibus bill shall not be open to the consideration of the Senate to carry through the various local interests and considerations—I will not say jobs; I do not mean that at all—but the log-rolling business of putting together a variety of interests, each one of which may be good enough on its own feet or not, in order to get it through.

We have a standing rule of that kind, and so, without debate and without passing upon the merits of any of the other parts of the bill, we strike them out and send the bill back in that shape to the House of Representatives, and say we stand upon that. What can the House of Representatives do? It can say, "We will not have any bill at all, of any kind, upon any of these subjects;" or else it may say, "We will pass this bill as the Senate has passed it, having one subject only in it." That does not interfere with the independence of the two Houses. It only preserves the independence of each House, doing its own business in its own way.

We have the same right; and it is our duty to see to it that we will not tolerate legislation on a general appropriation bill which comes from the other House any more than we will tolerate putting on legislative amendments here and sending them back to the other House to endeavor to coerce them, in the mere operation of carrying on the Government, into agreeing to something which it is not convenient to consider in such a connection.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the point of order raised by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] is clearly, according to my understanding of the rule, well taken. I concur in the propriety of that rule which prohibits any amendment that proposes general legislation on an appropriation bill. I doubt not such a rule would be a wise rule in the House of Representatives. I do not know what their rules are on that point. But I dissent entirely from the view expressed here as to whether we should have a rule of our own, which would exclude from consideration an item in an appropriation bill, because in the judgment of this House it was legislation. I think it would be an attempt by the rules of the Senate to control the free action of another branch of the National Legislature.

It is competent for each House to make its own rules, and if the House of Representatives choose to have a rule which enables them to put legislation upon appropriation bills, it is their right to do so; and when that legislation comes here for our consideration we can, as an independent body, exercise and we ought to exercise our own judgment as to whether it is a wise provision of the bill. But to have a rule of the Senate which would virtually declare that the House of Representatives should put no such legislation upon a bill, even though their own rules justified it, it seems to me, would be an attempt upon the part of the Senate to control the action of the co-ordinate branch of Congress.

While I believe that it would be wise for the House of Representatives to adopt a rule similar to the one we have in the Senate, I do not believe it would be proper to undertake to control by any rule of the Senate the action of the other House in reference to anything they may see proper to put in an appropriation bill.

If the matter is submitted to a vote of the Senate, I shall vote to sustain the point of order made by the Senator from Tennessee, and I shall vote to strike out the provision, which I understand is considered to be an unwise provision, put in by the other House. But I do not want to see any rule of the Senate adopted, such as has been suggested by the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Vermont, which should exclude from consideration any item in an appropriation bill sent to us by the other House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator is right about that (and there is great force in what he says, though I do not agree with him; but he states it in the most forcible way), ought not the Senate to have the power of amending such an item in the House bill? If we can not exclude it from our consideration or from our sense of what is right about this class of bills, we certainly ought to have the power of putting it in better shape, if we can do so, than the other House have left it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know that I should oppose an amendment to our rules that would allow that to be done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That then would open the whole case for any kind of legislation.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The question before the Senate at the present time is not as to whether we should have an amendment to our rules which would allow that to be done. The proposition before the Senate is whether the amendment proposed by the committee is obnoxious to the rule of the Senate. Upon that point I have no doubt.

Since this discussion arose I have taken occasion to look into the rules of the Senate, and I am satisfied that the point of order is well taken. I simply rose to enter my dissent from the views expressed by the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Tennessee in reference to the propriety of a rule of the Senate which would exclude from consideration any item which was put into an appropriation bill by the House of Representatives that was obnoxious to a rule of the Senate, because I think that each House is perfectly competent to make its own rules and to govern its own action in reference to appropriation bills or any other bills.

Mr. HOAR. This controversy has been one of long standing. Whatever may be the reasoning of the Senator from Vermont or any other Senator upon the matter as an original question, it seems to me that it is impossible to deny that it is the practical construction of the constitutional clause that it covers the great general appropriation bills.

What was the reasoning on the part of the other House? It is true that the phrase in the Constitution is "bills for raising revenue," but under the English parliamentary system what was known as the budget was the bill which raised and expended the revenue for the general purposes of government, and the claim was that the historical purpose and the reason for putting that clause into the Constitution was to describe that kind of a bill, although the term "bills for raising revenue" was used.

That question came up in Mr. Webster's time; it came up in Mr. Seward's time, in 1855 or 1856, and it came up once after the war. Mr. Webster declared that although as an original proposition the contention of the House of Representatives was wrong and the contention of the Senate was right, yet that it was a matter which from the nature of the case must be decided by the judgment of the House of Representatives. Anybody who reflects a little on it will see that that is true, that practically it can not be otherwise, because the Senate has no constitutional objection to receiving any kind of a bill from the other House, and the other House having a constitutional objection to receiving these bills from the Senate, it follows as a matter of course that the judgment of the other House must prevail on that subject.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts how long it has been since the Senate has acquiesced in the claim of the House of Representatives to originate general appropriation bills?

Mr. HOAR. The last attempt made to the contrary on the part of the Senate, if I recollect aright, was in 1855 or 1856, with the exception of some bill which we sent down once during the war, or shortly after the war.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senate originated an appropriation bill and passed it in 1856.

Mr. HOAR. The other House rejected it.

Mr. ALLISON. They never took it up.

Mr. HOAR. That was the time when Mr. Seward entered into the discussion.

Mr. GEORGE. Had the other House previous to that time been in the habit of receiving general appropriation bills from the Senate and passing them?

Mr. HOAR. No; it never has been the habit, I understand. We have tried it two or three times, but we have always failed. Therefore it is the settled law of the land.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is not the law.

Mr. HOAR. It is the settled law of this land, a law growing, as a great deal of the common law has grown, out of a universal construction and acquiescence. Gentlemen get up once in three or four years and think that the Senate ought to assert its rights; and that it can assert its rights. The Senate can not assert its rights. As Mr. Webster originally declared, it is a question which must be settled by the House of Representatives, and it has been and is settled, and will remain settled by the House of Representatives.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let me say that because the Senate does not renew the fight every year or two, it does not follow that it confessedly abandons it. There is no statute of limitations running against a constitutional right of the Senate. It might wait fifty years and renew it. We wait as a matter of convenience; we waive no controversy upon it. We have upon our side I believe the unanimous report of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives asserting the right of the Senate to originate appropriation bills. It is not the question to-day at all. I would not seek this occasion when the question is not up to waive a right that is unquestionably ours.

Mr. HOAR. I repeat, as my judgment, that practically this is a settled question, and it is utterly idle to treat it as otherwise. The greatest constitutional authority that ever sat in this body declared that the decision of that question by the House of Representatives must, from the necessity of the case, determine it, and the House of Representatives are as thoroughly committed to that principle as to any constitutional principle whatever. That being the case, and this matter being forever to be treated, at any rate being now treated as a matter which comes here in consequence of a constitutional privilege of the House of Representatives, the Senate throws away its own constitutional privilege if it construes its rules to mean that we can not amend such a bill as other bills, because the Constitution declares expressly that the class of bills, whatever they are, which the other House is to exercise its constitutional privilege of originating shall be subject to the constitutional privilege of the Senate to amend as other bills.

That being the case, it may be that we may renew the fight, as the Senator from Connecticut calls it. There is not much fighting in our spending a week in passing an appropriation bill and sending it over to the other House and having it laid on the table, and their sending one here and our adopting it on our part. We are entirely in their power. We can not reject their bill when they send it over here, because they have a constitutional right to send it. Therefore it follows that, so long as this bill is treated by the two branches as a bill to be originated in the other House under that clause, we not only have a right to amend it, but are bound by the Constitution to treat it as a bill to be amended as other bills.

Mr. ALLISON. I cannot agree with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] as respects the power of the Senate to originate appropriation bills. I do not understand that the House of Representatives claims the constitutional right to originate appropriation bills. As was stated by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], that question was referred only a few years ago to the Judiciary Committee of the House, and a majority of them, going over the whole question, decided that the power to originate appropriation bills was equal in the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. HOAR. What did the House of Representatives do about it?

Mr. ALLISON. Do you mean what was the action of the House of Representatives on that report?

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. No action was taken. There was a minority report, and the two reports lay on the table.

I remember very well that this whole question was debated in this body and in the House of Representatives at great length when I was a member of the other House. It took place when the Senate on some bill, I do not remember what bill, proposed to remove the income tax. The question came up whether reducing revenue was raising revenue. The House of Representatives stood then upon the idea that bills for raising revenue included every bill that changed or modified existing laws as respects taxation. There was a very able report made in this body by the then Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. Scott, an able lawyer, signed also by Senator Conkling, as I remember. I know that those two Senators were upon the conference committee, because it was my fortune to be a member of it on the part of the House. They signed a report arguing with great gravity that the Senate had the power to originate measures for reducing taxation. So upon the principle of that Senate report we might now originate a bill in this body abolishing specific taxes. But nobody will claim that, I think. Certainly we ought not to make that claim now.

But the power to appropriate money is a different power from that which raises money, it seems to me. The reason why the provision was inserted in the Constitution applying only to bills for raising revenue was because the framers of that instrument did not intend that the House of Representatives should have the power which is held by the British House of Commons, the sole power to originate money bills. That is the prerogative of the House of Commons in England, and they have held from time immemorial that money bills include not only the power of taxation but the power of appropriating money.

Mr. HOAR. And the Lords can not amend them.

Mr. ALLISON. And the Lords, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, can not amend such bills.

Therefore the proposition which he has so well stated was inserted in the Constitution, saying that the Senate could amend revenue bills or bills raising revenue as they could amend other bills, because our fathers did not intend that even upon bills raising revenue by taxation the Senate should be deprived of the power of amendment complete and full; and so they inserted that provision.

I agree with what the Senator from Massachusetts states as respects our position here under our rules. If the construction which the Senator from Vermont and other Senators place upon this rule is the true construction, we have tied our hands so that we can not exercise the power of amending a legislative provision which we find in an appropriation bill, and we are put in the attitude of either being compelled to swallow this bill, defective as it may be, or to take our chances of rejecting it as a whole and sending it back to the House of Representatives. Certainly no rule which has ever been passed by this body intended such an absurdity, because we should thus practically place ourselves in the position of the House of Lords as respects money bills. We should say by such a construction of the rule that the House of Representatives may send us an appropriation bill, and put upon it such legislation as they choose, but when that legislation comes into this body we have not the power of amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Have we not always exercised that power of amendment, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. ALLISON. We always do exercise it and always have exercised it. Although the literal interpretation of the rule as stated by the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Tennessee may be the correct interpretation, I do not want to give the rule what I regard as an interpretation which ties our own hands and leaves the House of Representatives to do as they choose upon the appropriation bills. Whilst I agree that we have not the power to originate general legislation upon these bills, it seems to me perfectly clear that we have the power, or that we ought to have the power, of amendment. Take this rule as respects appropriation bills:

> No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

The spirit of that rule is that we shall not consider original legislative amendments in the Senate, but it does seem to me that a fair and liberal interpretation of it would allow us to modify a defective provision which we find in a bill coming from the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If we can modify an original legislative provision that comes from the House of Representatives, can we not add to it?

Mr. ALLISON. We might add to it, but we might add anything that is germane to the particular amendment proposed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But, if my friend will pardon me——

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have no rule in the Senate which raises the question of the germaneness of an amendment to a legislative provision. We have a provision about the germaneness of items of appropriation, but once having a legislative provision in an appropriation bill which comes from the other House, if I do not disturb my friend——

Mr. ALLISON. Not at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If we once get a legislative provision from the other House, and that is the subject of amendment, it is a subject of amendment, so far as our rules go, without any limitation at all. Any amendment that a majority of the Senate thinks fit to put to that legislative provision is only changing or adding to the legislation which the other House has sent; and the effect of that would be that our rule is gone entirely.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; but I want to have a reasonable construction of that rule. Certainly we are putting ourselves in an absurd attitude when we say that we can not perfect a provision already in the bill, and then allow this provision to be stricken out, and put it in the control of three conferees on the part of the Senate to restore it, to modify it, or do what they please with it, and then either have it adopted by a majority vote in this body or have the bill killed, because either of these things can be done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senate is of opinion that it will not deal with legislative subjects in our appropriation bills, it has only to say so to the House of Representatives, and that is the end of it, because the House of Representatives, preserving its own dignity and independence, respects ours in the same way; and therefore the House of Representatives will never insist, the Senator may be sure, that an appropriation bill shall fail because the Senate will not agree to have legislation in it. We have tried that out on one exciting occasion and succeeded, and we always shall succeed on occasions that are not exciting, of course.

Mr. ALLISON. I only make these suggestions to show that although we adhere to the strict construction of the rule proposed by the Senator from Vermont, in the end at last these legislative provisions which are found coming from the House of Representatives are modified and changed in conference committees, and finally agreed to by both Houses.

Mr. EVARTS obtained the floor.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator from New York pardon me while I read a rule applicable to the conversation which has just been going on?

Mr. EVARTS. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask the attention of the Senator from Iowa. I read a rule that I think has been overlooked:

> No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received.

That is precisely what the Senator from Iowa was saying; that an amendment to this House provision, germane and relative to it, might be considered, if we are obliged to accept the House provision.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, and if the Senator from New York will allow me a moment, the rule goes on to provide:

> Nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto.

That answers the Senator from Vermont in his statement that if we make one amendment we can make any other.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know; but that is the question of appropriation. The moment you have stepped over the line and gone into legislation your rule does not apply at all.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, the parliamentary situation in which we are placed by the views presented certainly puts the Senate in a very awkward predicament. Here we have a provision of the Constitution which attributes to the House of Representatives originating power over one great head of legislative authority. Under a construction of that clause in the Constitution it is held that general appropriation bills must originate in the House of Representatives. The Constitution, however, has been careful in guarding the power of the Senate as plenary in regard to amendments of anything that comes up under that great head of authority.

There is an effort in both Houses in the best interests of legislation that these appropriation bills shall be exclusively applied to appropriations in execution of laws authorizing the appropriations, and that new legislation shall not be interpolated in these appropriation bills. Now, we have sent up to us an appropriation bill from the House of Representatives. Inserted in that is a clause which apparently is wholly of original legislation and not of appropriation. We have then a power in the Senate to amend every part of the appropriation bill proper, but, from general legislation being lodged in the appropriation bill, it is said we can not amend the general legislation. A most extraordinary condition for a political body like this to be placed in! We have got a Constitution that gives an origination elsewhere of appropriation bills, it is said, but we are protected by a power to change them; and yet under this new order insisted upon here, if the House puts inside of an appropriation bill a matter that has nothing to do with the appropriation bill and is original legislation, we can not amend the original legislation that is hid away in an appropriation bill, though we can amend every clause and every line of the appropriation bill itself.

Look at the page on which these two propositions of strictly appropriation and of strictly legislative origination appear. There is an appropriation of $79,000,000; we can amend that to $80,473,000; but when you come down to a clause that does not relate to appropriation, but does relate to new legislation about what the pensions shall be, then we can not amend it.

Mr. President, I could wish that there might be such firmness on the part of this body as would strike out every piece of new legislation that is sent us here in an appropriation bill, and upon the gravest considerations. We have plenary authority under the Constitution in respect to new or general legislation, not under the head of "revenue," and we, therefore, can share really and responsibly both in the initiation and in the amendment of general legislation; but if a clause is permitted to come up here from the House of Representatives of general legislation imbeded in a general appropriation bill, we are dealing with that piece of legislation from the beginning to the end in vinculis. We have no freedom whatever of determining upon that item or particular piece of legislation. We can deal with it only in the position of being a part of a great and important legislative act of appropriation for the general purposes of government, and we are not free to deal with it. We have a rule that we will not propose, and any member by an objection can exclude from an appropriation bill under the guise of its amendment the introduction in this body of origination of legislation. They have, I suppose, a rule in the other House to the same effect; but there, as here, the rule may be passed over and it is passed over without an objection being raised, and it is then according to the rules of the Senate, as of the rules of the House, that the objection not being raised as a point of order, it is in to be considered on its merits.

Now the Senator from Massachusetts, as it seems to me, is quite right in thinking that when the House has overpassed that question of the point of order and of prudent and wise legislation, and has placed a legislative provision in an appropriation bill where it ought not to be, we can not look at that clause and say that we are shorn of our power of amendment of general legislation merely by its being injected in an appropriation bill. It must, therefore, be that we are equally free in regard to this clause that is now under consideration, to strike it out, which we can do, or if we tolerate its presence there as a piece of general legislation that we are to operate upon and act in making a law, we must have the power of amending that general legislation although it is included between clauses that relate to general appropriations.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I think the question before the Senate is confined to a very narrow compass. I think we must either assume a right to amend general legislation on an appropriation bill, if general legislation comes to us from the House of Representatives on a general appropriation bill, or we must insist, even to the defeat of the bill for general appropriations, that no general legislation shall be on such bills. The power of the House or the claim of the House to the exclusive right to originate appropriation bills is not found in the Constitution. It seems, however, to have been acquiesced in for so long a period that no member of this body is disposed now practically to dispute the right.

If the House claim as a constitutional privilege the right to originate and send to this body all general appropriation bills, then the right to include in a general appropriation bill is limited to the general appropriations, or, in other words, I think it a fraud upon the rules or on the right claimed by the House to originate general appropriation bills, to deny us that power, and then include in a general appropriation bill matters of general legislation concerning which we have the same power of origination as they have. A general appropriation bill which comes from the House to this body with a provision in it beyond mere appropriation, a provision of general legislation, contains within it, therefore, something outside of and beyond the claim of the House to originate these bills.

When that is done we have one of two courses to pursue. We ought to insist, in my opinion, as the first alternative, that as you claim the right to originate general appropriation bills you shall not send to us anything but what is pertinent to a general appropriation bill. If you do, we insist upon our right, which is as strong as your right, to originate all other matters of legislation, and, therefore, to originate the legislation which is improperly in the general appropriation bill, and we strike it out and stand by striking it out to the failure of the bill. If we are not prepared to do that, then it necessarily follows that when the House sends us general legislation on an appropriation bill we have the constitutional right, and it is our constitutional duty, to consider the propriety of that general legislation, to amend it in such form as we see proper. We must take either one or the other of these alternatives. I am for the first. I am for rebuking the House when it undertakes under a claim to originate solely for our consideration a general appropriation bill to insert in that bill matters which we have an equal power with them to originate. If we can not stand by that, as I think it is our duty to do, then I think we ought not to tie our hands by a rule of the Senate to prevent us from amending improper general legislation sent to us by the House of Representatives.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I have often heard discussion since I have been here of the rules which are cited to prevent the Senate from exercising its constitutional jurisdiction over any proposition that may come from the House of Representatives. To my mind the question is a plain one. The Constitution says "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." What is a rule of proceeding? It is the method in which legislation shall be conducted. What is this rule? It is prescribing the method in which the Senate shall legislate; but up to this day the Senate rules do not determine the rules of proceedings in the House, do not say to them "you shall make a bill such as the Senate thinks according to its rules of proceedings should be the proper form of legislation."

How can the Senate say that to the House? The Constitution says the House shall have the right to "determine the rules of its proceedings," and suppose the House does as it has done in this case, and as it always will do necessarily, sends us a bill with general legislation connected with appropriations, how can the Senate say, with the right of the House to determine absolutely its method of proceeding, "We will not legislate in any other way; we will put the whole legislation of the session in a bill of that description?" Has not the House, under that power conferred upon it, the power of such House to determine its rules of proceeding, absolute authority, independent of the Senate, to say in what form the bills shall be passed, whether in one form or another?

It seems to me to be a very plain question that we can not make any rule which shall prescribe to the House and the House can not make any rule which shall prescribe to us the method in which we shall determine our forms of proceeding. If that be so, what follows? It is equally true that no rule of this body can declare that the Senate shall not perform the constitutional function committed to it by the Constitution. It is manifest that such a rule, if there be one, is absolutely void. Imagine a rule which says that the Senate shall not perform its constitutional duty of trying an impeachment or of concurring in any bill which may be passed by the House or in any other of the functions prescribed to it. Certainly such a rule as that would be absolutely void and not binding on the conscience of any one.

Now what is this rule, if this construction be placed upon it, when the House of Representatives determine, with sovereign and absolute discretion, the method of proceeding in regard to legislation and sends us a bill, we should say "The Senate shall not consider nor amend it nor exercise its judgment upon it, but will limit that judgment;" and say "Why, this bill is not in the form our rules prescribe and therefore we will not exercise our judgment upon it?" It seems to me that such a position is entirely untenable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs upon the point of order submitted by the previous occupant of the chair on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the question is submitted to the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations may be considered.

Several SENATORS. What is that?

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations may be considered.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator has his right distinctly under the rule. While the question can not be divided as to the part stricken out and the part to be inserted, the rule explicitly says that either may be perfected before taking the vote.

Mr. ALLISON. But we are now on the question of order, whether the amendment is in order, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in order, so as to avoid the objection under the rule.

Mr. COCKRELL. In other words, you want unanimous consent that the clause shall remain in the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. No; I want unanimous consent for the consideration of the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations so as to avoid any question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of order having been submitted to the Senate, it must be decided unless withdrawn by unanimous consent.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. REAGAN. If it be assumed that the Senate have not the power to amend that portion of the House bill which is construed to be legislation, it seems to me that it is an extraordinary assumption, and no consent is required.

As to general appropriation bills, if I understand the question, we have a right to amend them.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the question.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand now it is supposed, because this bill appropriates money for pensions, we can not amend the provision of the bill which would be legislation under our rule. The House of Representatives have a similar rule, but if they send us a bill here which contains general legislation, undoubtedly we have a right to amend that legislation notwithstanding our rule. It would not do, I think, for the Senate to tie its hands and say that it would not legislate upon a bill sent here by the other House. I do not understand why it is that unanimous consent should be asked for on a subject like this.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to say to the Senator from Texas that under the third clause of Rule XVI, which provides that "No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill"—if that rule is to be respected and observed, there are two questions for the Presiding Officer of this body or the body itself, as the case may be, to decide; first, is this an appropriation bill within the sense of the rule? That question being determined in the affirmative, the next and only other question to be inquired into is: Is the provision legislative in its character? If so, it is forbidden by the rule.

I have not much respect for quibbling as to whether this is to be called general or special legislation. It seems to me general enough. Certain it is that it materially changes a general and public law, and so changing it, it seems to me to be broad enough, to be very general, to fall within the strict literalism and principle of this rule, and no matter whether the amendment is proposed to a legislative provision in an appropriation bill sent us by the other House, or whether it originates with our own committee or with a member of this body, if it be proposed to an appropriation bill and is in its character general legislation it is directly in violation of the third clause of the sixteenth rule of the Senate, and therefore out of order until we change that rule.

Mr. REAGAN. I have great respect for the opinion of the Senator fron Tennessee on a subject of rules. I understand that this is a bill making general appropriations for pensions, but I understand that it contains a provision not making an appropriation, but making a new law with reference to pensions. That is not an appropriation bill, and there is no way of torturing the language of the rule to make it cover general legislation in an appropriation bill. The Senator spoke of quibbling, but he did not refer to what I said, I suppose.

Mr. HARRIS. By no means. There was a remark sotto voce made behind me to which I replied on that point.

Mr. REAGAN. If this was plainly an appropriation bill I should sustain the rule decidedly as the Senator from Tennessee does, but when the House of Representatives puts general legislation into an appropriation bill, I insist it can not tie the hands of the Senate under the name of an appropriation bill and pass general legislation which we can not amend. How are we to do? Is it true that we are bound to accept what the House does or defeat the bill? Is that absolutely to be insisted on before the Senate? We either have the power to legislate under the Constitution, or we have not. The House has the power to dictate to us how we shall legislate, or it has not. If it sends us appropriation bills, we are bound by our rules not to amend them by general legislation; but if it sends us general legislation in an appropriation bill, it seems to me that our right is clear and unquestioned to amend or strike out or add to that legislation.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, if the other House puts legislation in an appropriation bill, according to the Senator from Texas, that abrogates the rule of the Senate and the Senate can put legislation on; but if the House does not put legislation on appropriation bills, then the Senate can not do it.

Now, the facts are that this question has been decided time and again by the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] when he was Presiding Officer, and by other Presiding Officers, that this kind of proposal is general legislation and is obnoxious to the rule of the Senate. It has been decided time and again, I say, and there is no question about that. It is general legislation.

Now, as to what we shall do, the Senator from Texas seems to think we must do something.

Mr. REAGAN. Allow me to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. REAGAN. It is general legislation amending general legislation, and not amending a general appropriation bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Suppose it is amending general legislation, I say the House has a rule which prohibits legislation on appropriation bills; the Senate has a rule which prohibits legislation on appropriation bills; and now, because the House may have evaded or disregarded their rule, shall we disregard ours?

The only true way to do is to sustain the point of order and have this amendment stricken out, and then agree to the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations to strike out the House clause. Then we rid ourselves of the whole thing, and that is what ought to be done in this case. Therefore, I earnestly urge that the Senate sustain the point of order, and when the point of order has been sustained and the proposed amendment of the Senate committee is stricken out, then that the Senate will immediately concur in the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations and strike out the House clause. In that way we get rid of the whole matter.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri a question; whether the result of the course he suggests will not be to strike out this three-line clause of the House, and at last send the question to a committee of conference, and whether, if so, it is not morally certain that the committee of conference will come in recommending the Senate to recede from its amendment? And further, if that is the result, whether then, practically, the House does not have the exclusive privilege of originating amendments to appropriation bills, leaving the Senate only the privilege of saying "yes" or "no" to them generally; not, in fact, the privilege of saying "no" finally, but really deprived of all privilege of amending a House provision?

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no; I do not think that follows at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator if that is not the practical result?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all. That will not be the practical result, and never has been. If the Senate sustains the point of order and the proposed amendment of the Senate Committee on Appropriations is stricken out, then the Senate will concur in the amendment of the committee striking out the House clause. Then the House can agree to that amendment or they can non-concur. If they non-concur the matter will go into conference, and I say to the Senator that the Committee on Appropriations would necessarily feel bound to stand by the action of the Senate, and that it is only a question of time when, the committee of the Senate standing by the action of the Senate, the House must recede.

Mr. President, I do not believe in the doctrine of the House of Representatives having the exclusive right of originating appropriation bills. It never has claimed that right, and it never has been conceded by the Senate. Members of the House have claimed it and individual members of the Senate have conceded it, but it has never been agreed to as a settled doctrine.

In 1881 the question was referred by the House of Representatives to the Committee on the Judiciary, and Mr. Knott, then a Representative from the State of Kentucky, and since governor of that State, on the 2d day of February, 1881, submitted to the House of Representatives a report from the Committee on the Judiciary, which is Report 147, House of Representatives, Forty-sixth Congress, third session, in which the whole question is very elaborately discussed, and in which he shows conclusively that the House has not the constitutional right exclusively of originating appropriation bills. It has that right in regard to revenue bills, and the Senate does not dispute that right; but the Senate has the right to amend those revenue bills just as it chooses, and the House has never disputed that right.

This is the condition of the thing: The House has a rule prohibiting legislation on appropriation bills. By some means this clause was put in this bill. The Senate has a rule prohibiting legislation on appropriation bills. Now the Committee on Appropriations proposes legislation as an amendment to this House legislation. That is not the only solution of the question, and it is not the proper solution of the question. The proper solution of the question is for the Senate to hold that this amendment of the Committee on Appropriations is legislation on an appropriation bill, as is clearly indicated in Rule XVI, which has been read. There can be no question of this proposition. Then the Senate will concur in the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations to strike out the legislative clause of the House bill; then it will go to a conference, and then the committee of conference on the part of the Senate will adhere to the instructions of the Senate, and the House will recede.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think the result would be that the committee of conference on the part of the Senate would recede, and I believe that is the general result under the existing practice.

Moreover, I do not consider that this amendment proposes general legislation to an appropriation bill. The House put upon the bill the simple provision that whenever pensions are given to widows payments shall be made from the death of the husband. The Senate Committee on Appropriations simply propose to say that the pensions shall commence from the death of the husband where the cause of pension originated in the service after the 4th day of March, 1861, and to make the whole provision retroactive. That is the whole length and breadth of the proposed amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, and yet we are told that under a rule which says that general legislation shall not be proposed in the Senate we can not amend a provision that pensions to widows shall commence from the date of the death of the husband so that they shall only so commence when the cause of the pension originated after the 4th of March, 1861.

It seems to me that this is a narrow and very limited construction of the rule, and that its true and sensible spirit is that, while general legislation shall not be proposed here as an original proposition, yet when the Senate is dealing with general legislation which comes on an appropriation bill from the House of Representatives it may amend that general legislation, and is not confined to the narrow line which is laid down by the Senator from Missouri and others here of simply saying "yes" or "no" to the House provision.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the propositions on which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] in their arguments stand, and that is that the Senate may judge for the House what is the force, and effect, and meaning of its own rules, and that our judgment shall be binding as to what is the rule of the House.

The Senator from Missouri says the House has a rule prohibiting general legislation on a general appropriation bill, and the Senate may so decide. That is what his argument asserts. How can the Senate decide what is the rule of the House as against the House's own interpretation of its rules? The House has sent us an appropriation bill with general legislation upon it. Who shall say that its rules prohibit it from doing so? Who shall say that it slipped in there somehow? All legislation slips in somehow. The sovereign exercise of the power of legislation by a body authorized to do it when it is made is absolute and complete. It is the one thing required by the Constitution.

The House has legislated in a particular form, it has judged of its own rules in that act, and now it comes here for what? What does the Constitution say to each individual Senator here, and there is no gainsaying that proposition? It says you shall judge and consider such propositions in the nature of legislation as the House of Representatives sends to you for consideration; you shall exercise your best judgment as to what shall be stricken out, rejected, or accepted, but whether it shall be rejected, accepted, or modified, you shall exercise upon that your judgment and discretion, and decide according to the best of your ability whether it should be changed into another form, whether it should be totally rejected, or whether it should be accepted in whole or in part. That is the constitutional duty allotted to each Senator, and there can be no doubt with regard to it.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask if we do not exercise that discretion by striking out the clause? It is not necessary to strike it out on its merits. Do we not exercise that function as legislators if we object for one reason or another?

Mr. CALL. Not at all. The difference is as wide as heaven from earth. When you say we will not amend it, although we think it better for the public interest to change it into another form, yet we will reject it, not because in our judgment the public interest so requires, but because the form in which the other House has seen fit to send it to us is objectionable to us—in that reason and in that act there is a limitation of the exercise of your discretion, and you have conceded the whole constitutional function of the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. Not at all, it seems to me. I see no reason why it may not be for the public good to carry out the rules of the Senate, to have some formal definite procedure, to insist that the House shall not mix up appropriation bills with general legislation, so that instead of dividing separate propositions of legislation into distinct and separate bills, as they ought to be, a system of legislative procedure which should bring all the legislation of the session in one bill would manifestly be against the public interest to be considered at all, and that is the principle involved here, it seems to me.

The House of Representatives sends us an appropriation bill which contains general legislation, and it might as well include all manner of subjects. It is general legislation on pensions and specific appropriations necessary to carry out existing law; so that when the Senate exercises its discretion upon the bill which is here, to exclude this general legislation, to strike it out absolutely, because that sort of confusion in the form of bills is against public interest, we are acting with reference to the exercise of a wise discretion, as much as though we rejected it; because in this particular case the pension should commence at the death or the date of the application. That is to say, it is as good a reason for striking this out, that it is bad procedure and would be generally ruinous as a legislative precedent, as it is to say that the pension ought not to commence at the date of death or the date of the application.

Mr. CALL. I will answer the Senator. The constitutional function of a Senator in the respect to which he refers is limited by the Constitution—it is limited by that provision which says the House shall determine for itself whether all subjects of legislation shall be in one bill or whether they shall be in a hundred bills, and, therefore, no Senator can rightfully say that he will not consider upon their merits the subjects-matter of legislation which the House has sent here because in our judgment to put general legislation upon bills appropriating money is improper and unwise and for the public injury. The Constitution has said you shall not so judge that matter, because the House shall have the absolute right to decide for itself; therefore you can not do it.

Again, the provision of the Constitution was doubtless intended for a good purpose. Suppose the House should say: "We will not consider any other form of legislation but this," and the Senate should say: "We will not consider any other form of legislation but this that suits our idea," how are the two co-ordinate functions to be performed? It can only be done by giving to each, as the Constitution says, the absolute power to judge and determine its own rules of proceeding; otherwise one body must give way to the other, and they can not be co-ordinate and independent in their functions. For each House to determine its rules of proceeding in respect to a subject which each House must consider requires each House to consider on its merits whatever the other may send it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the amendment in order under the third clause of Rule XVI? Senators in the affirmative will say "ay," in the negative "no." [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the form of the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Is the amendment in order under the third clause of Rule XVI?

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN]. I do not know how he would vote if he were present.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PAYNE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL]. I do not see him in the Chamber, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. EVARTS (after having voted in the affirmative). I see that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is not in his seat. I therefore withdraw my vote, as I am paired with him.

Mr. BUTLER. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]; but I understand the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] is not paired, so I transfer the pair to the Senator from Oregon and vote.

Mr. ALDRICH. My colleague [Mr. CHACE] is absent from the city, and is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I understand there is not a quorum voting. I suggest to the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], as I am paired with his colleague [Mr. HISCOCK], and he with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], that we might transfer our pairs and each vote. With the consent of the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], I will transfer my pair with his colleague [Mr. HISCOCK] to the Senator from Alabama, and the Senator from New York and I can vote.

Mr. EVARTS. Very well, I vote.

Mr. GEORGE. My colleague [Mr. WALTHALL] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Palmer,	Stewart,
Allison,	Evarts,	Pugh,	Stockbridge,
Blair,	Frye,	Quay,	Teller,
Call,	Hawley,	Reagan,	Wilson of Iowa.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate decides the amendment to be in order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], reporting this bill, to explain to the Senate what will be the effect of the legislative provision inserted in the bill by the House of Representatives. The language is:

And provided further, That in all pensions to widows, payments shall be made from the date of death of the husband.

I should like to know about how many widows there are on the pension-roll, how many widows there are who will be pensioned under the general laws hereafter, for about how many years back they will draw pensions, and how many hundred millions of dollars it will take out of the Treasury to satisfy these arrears.

Mr. ALLISON. You mean as proposed by the House bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. First, the clause as proposed by the House bill and then the amendment of the Senate committee, so that we shall see exactly what the two propositions are.

Mr. ALLISON. If Senators will turn to the report which accompanies this bill (Report No. 1285) they will find a statement of the probable cost of this bill as it is now proposed to amend it.

Mr. COCKRELL. But how is it with the House provision standing?

Mr. ALLISON. The provision in the bill as it came from the House is so vague and uncertain that I should not like to make an estimate. I think it will apply to all cases of widows' pensions, including the service-pensions to the widows of the war of 1812, and the widows of the Mexican war, and also all pensions granted by special act of Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. In other words, is not the language broad enough, "that in all pensions to widows, payment shall be made from the date of death of the husband," to include all widows who are pensioners, and would it not include the war of 1812 and the Mexican war and all other wars, Seminole, and Black Hawk, and everything of the kind?

Mr. ALLISON. The committee so construed it. Referring to the next question put by the Senator, the provision as found in the bill amended by the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate applies, I believe, to 1,702 cases of widows up to this time. They now receive a pension from the date of the allowance and not from the date of the death of the husband.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will turn to page 4 of the report he will find that it does not apply to very many widows, from the fact that up to 1880 the law provided that all widows should receive pensions from the date of the death of the husband. So it only relates to widows who have been granted pensions since 1880. The number I can not just state, but it is stated in this document, and the total amount required for payment is about $800,000, as estimated by the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that under the House bill or under your amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. Under our amendment.

Mr. FAULKNER. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as a matter of information whether the amendment of the committee as proposed does not limit this to widows who come in under the general law and are granted pensions by the Pension Bureau, while those granted pensions under special acts of Congress will not receive the benefit of this amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. Widows who have received pensions under special acts of Congress will not be included under the amendment made by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FAULKNER. What is the justice of the exclusion of those widows while you include those who are pensioned under the rules of the Pension Bureau? It is only a question generally of the construction of the evidence, the analysis of it, and the weight of it that causes Congress to overrule the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. ALLISON. That is supposed to be always the case. We did not desire to enter into the question of allowing widows arrears of pension when the pension was granted by special act of Congress, which might run one year, ten years, or twenty years, and we supposed in such cases the act should be final as to each particular case decided by Congress. Does the Senator think we ought to enlarge this provision in that respect?

Mr. FAULKNER. In answer to the Senator from Iowa, I will say that these parties ought to be put on an equality, and if they are not on an equality there is injustice.

Mr. ALLISON. I quite agree with that statement. Up to 1880 all the widows received pensions from the date of the death of the husband. Since that time they have received pensions from the time of the allowance of the pension at the Pension Office.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not from the "time of the allowance," but from the date of application.

Mr. ALLISON. I should have said date of application.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is a great deal of difference between the "date of allowance" and the "date of application."

Mr. ALLISON. The average is nine months. So it is ascertained that there are about $717,000 required to pay the widows pensioned since 1880, and for the next year 7,000 more claims will be allowed, so that the total increase of appropriation is less than $800,000.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. If I understand this amendment, it gives arrears of pension certainly from the date of the husband's death to all widows who have been pensioned under the general pension laws. I did not hear the questions asked before, and perhaps the same question has been asked, but has the Senator an estimate of the probable amount that it will take to pay the arrears consequent upon this amendment to this bill?

Mr. ALLISON. The Commissioner of Pensions states that it will take $756,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But in another place you say more.

Mr. ALLISON. That is as the Senate committee's amendment proposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But if the Senate conferees recede, as it is said they generally do, it will take a great deal more.

Mr. ALLISON. That was the statement of my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], who is not very familiar with Senate conference committees.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the report may be read and printed in the RECORD, and I hope that after that this bill will go over until morning. There are some points in the matter that I want to look further into.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri desire to have the entire report printed in the RECORD?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without reading?

Mr. COCKRELL. Without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, in reporting to the Senate H. R. 5115, "An act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes," submit the following communications relating to the bill and the amendments recommended by the committee thereto:

No. 1.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., April 24, 1888.

SIR: I am in receipt of House bill No. 5445, making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, which passed the House of Representatives on the 20th instant.

I observe that said bill contains a number of provisions, concerning which I have some suggestions to make for your consideration.

The first proposition is that "in all pensions to widows, payments shall be made from the date of death of the husband."

I have the honor to submit that the proposition is somewhat indefinite, and that it is susceptible of two distinct constructions. It is doubtful whether the House intends to grant pension from the date of the death of the husband in the case of those widows only whose claims are hereafter allowed, or means to extend the benefits of this section to all widows against whose rights the limitation contained in the arrears acts of 1879 has run. This is a very important difference and would involve the expenditure of a very large amount if the latter construction be accepted

If the benefit contained in this section will apply only to claims hereafter allowed, it is estimated that the additional cost to the Government will be an average period of nine months, at $12 per month, or a total of $108 in each case.

It is estimated that not less than 7,000 claims of widows will be allowed during the next fiscal year whose right will be favorably affected by this section, so that the additional cost to the Government during the next fiscal year by reason of this section will be $756,000. If the bill should pass the Senate with this provision retained in it, this additional sum ($756,000) should be added to the $79,000,000 appropriated for the payment of Army and Navy pensions.

If the intention be to extend the provisions of this section to the claims of all widows against whom the limitation of the arrears acts has run, a much larger sum will be needed.

A close estimate, recently made in this bureau, is that 9,959 claims of widows have been allowed since June 30, 1880, in which pension has been granted from the date of filing the application instead of from the date of death. It has also been shown that an average period of nine months elapses between the date of the death of a soldier and the date on which his widow makes application for pension. The amount required to pay arrears under this construction of the section referred to will therefore be for an average period of nine months, at $8 per month, or $72 in each of 9,959 cases, or a total of $717,048. (It should be explained that in this latter class the rate per month will be $8 per month, for the reason that the period for which the arrears will be paid will in the large majority of cases terminate prior to March 19, 1886, on which date the rate of pension to widows and others was increased from $8 to $12 per month.)

Adding this total ($717,048) to the total ($756,000) cost in claims which will be allowed during the next fiscal year, there will be a total additional cost of $1,473,048, which will be expended during the fiscal year 1889, as a result of the enactment of this proposed section, and which amount should therefore be added to the $79,000,000 appropriated in said bill for the payment of Army and Navy pensions.

I observe that the sum of $15,000 only is appropriated for stationery and other necessary expenses for the next year. The estimate for this item was $20,000, in the expectation that two new agencies would be provided for. Inasmuch as it appears that no provision is made in this bill for the establishment of the two additional agencies desired, I do not believe that this item should be for a sum less than $18,000.

The amount appropriated under this item for the present fiscal year was $12,000, and though the expenditures have been carefully scrutinized and the most rigid economy enforced, $10,142 have already been expended, leaving but $1,853 of the amount appropriated and three months still remaining of the present fiscal year. To make this showing the agents have been denied many things which have been actually necessary for the proper conduct of their agencies, so that at the close of the year there will be no balance of the appropriation and no supply on hand at the agencies of stationery and other necessary articles for the proper conduct of their agencies. It will consequently be necessary as soon as the appropriation for the next year becomes available to approve the expenditure of a large sum chargeable to this item of appropriation.

It is estimated that 56,000 new pensioners will be added to the roll during the present fiscal year, and without much doubt, nearly as many during the next fiscal year. This will involve a constantly increasing cost to the Government, including the purchase of additional office furniture, to provide for new clerks, additional printing, a greater number of official envelopes, a larger number of blanks of all kinds, and a greater cost in every respect pertaining to the work at these agencies. I earnestly request that this sum be increased to $18,000.

The amounts proposed to be appropriated for the salaries of agents, clerk-hire, fuel, lights, and rents, though low, are thought to be sufficient for the purposes named.

Your attention is respectfully invited to the provision in this bill requiring that the Secretary of the Treasury cause suitable rooms to be set apart in cities where pension agencies are located which shall be acceptable to the Secretary of the Interior for the use and occupancy of said agencies respectively.

The appropriation bill for the present fiscal year contains a provision somewhat similar to this, but qualifies it by providing that it shall be done where possible, while the provision in the bill under consideration gives no discretion to the Secretary in the matter, but it is mandatory in its terms.

While the appropriation bill for the service of the present fiscal year was under consideration by your committee in January, 1887, the Commissioner brought this matter to the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury, who, after a careful consideration of the whole matter, communicated to the Commissioner his conclusions, that it was impossible to accommodate in a Government building any one of the twelve pension agencies which were then situated in rented quarters. His communication to the Commissioner and tracings of the public buildings, showing that such accommodations were not possible, were transmitted to you by the Commissioner, with a proper letter addressed to you January 13, 1887.

I am satisfied that the same inability to accommodate these pension agencies still exists, and that this provision should be either stricken out of the bill or that some discretion should be given in the matter.

Another objectionable provision in this bill is that requiring the Secretary of the Interior to designate and provide suitable rooms in the Pension Building for the use of the pension agency in this city, and requiring that the office of said agent shall be removed therein.

There is an existing law (the sundry civil bill, approved March 3, 1887) which requires that not later than the 1st day of December, 1888, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be removed to the Pension Building the General Land Office, the Bureau of Education, the office of the Commissioner of Railroads, and Bureau of Labor. It will be readily seen that with the large force not only of this bureau, but also of the bureaus which said law requires shall be removed to the Pension Building, it will be absolutely impossible to provide accommodations therein for the pension agency.

Aside, however, from the question of accommodations, I am of opinion that the pension agency should not, under any circumstances, be moved to the Pension Building. It was at one time located in the same building with the Pension Bureau, at the corner of Twelfth street and Pennsylvania avenue, northwest. This was in 1877, and its location there soon became exceedingly objectionable on account of the annoyance to the regular Pension Bureau force by reason of the constant stream of pensioners and their witnesses who visited the agency to secure their regular pensions. And this was true, though access to the pension agency was not had through the Pension Bureau. How much more annoying would it therefore be when the pension agency, if moved to the Pension Building, can only be reached through the regular entrances to the building.

When it is known that the pension agent at Washington, D. C., makes some 3,200 personal payments at each regular quarterly payment, and that 900 of them have each to be accompanied by at least two witnesses, some idea will be had of the large number of people who visit this agency periodically, and of the great annoyance which their coming and going would occasion to the regular office force of this bureau.

I would therefore respectfully, but earnestly, urge that this provision be stricken from the bill.

If the committee desire to hear further on any of the points referred to in this letter or upon any other points germane to the bill under consideration, I will be glad to appear before them myself at their convenience, or to send Mr. H. C. Bell, chief agents' division, who is thoroughly conversant with the requirements of this service and with my views on the subject.

Very respectfully,

WM. E. MCLEAN,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. W. B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

No. 2.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., April 28, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the communication of the 26th instant, in which, by your direction, Mr. Thomas P. Cleaves, clerk of your committee, asks for an explanation of the increase in the amount ($79,000,000) appropriated in House bill No. 5445 for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, over the amount ($75,000,000) as submitted for that purpose in the Book of Estimates.

In response, I have to state that for the current fiscal year the sum of $75,000,000 was appropriated for the payment of all pensions excepting those granted by the Mexican war pension act of January 29, 1887, for which the act of March 3, 1887, provided the sum of $6,900,000, which amount was made available by said act for the payment of this latter class of pensions during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and that ending June 30, 1888.

At the beginning of the present fiscal year, out of the amount appropriated for the payment of Mexican pensions, there was available a sum slightly in excess of $6,000,000.

While this bill was under consideration by the House committee, at their request the Commissioner of Pensions appeared before them, and upon his representation that the $75,000,000 asked for would be insufficient for the payment during the fiscal year 1889 of all classes of pensions, including Mexican pensions, and that $4,000,000 additional would be required for that purpose, said committee increased the amount to $79,000,000 to provide for the payment of said pensions.

I have the honor to request that your committee will give favorable consideration to this item of the bill, as passed by the House of Representatives.

Very respectfully,

WM. E. MCLEAN,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

No. 3.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your inquiry of this date relative to certain points in the statutes relative to pensions.

Your first question is, have the widows who are pensioned on account of the disability and death therefrom of their husbands, which disability was contracted prior to March 4, 1861, received pensions from the date of death or application. In response I have to state that the existing law applicable to this class of cases is section 4713 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that when the cause of disability or death originated in the service prior to the 4th day of March, 1861, and an application for pension shall not have been filed within three years from the discharge or death of the person on whose account the claim was made, or within three years of the termination of a pension previously granted on account of the service and death of the same person, the pension shall commence from the date of filing by the party prosecuting the claim the last paper requisite to establish the same.

It is proper to state in this connection that the acts of January 25 and March 3, 1879, commonly known as the arrears acts, removed the limitation only in cases in which the disability or death resulted from a cause which originated in the service subsequent to March 4, 1861.

The law (section 4713, R. S.) just quoted is still in force, and all cases which have been allowed by this bureau since its passage have been settled in conformity with it if the cause of disability or death originated prior to March 4, 1861.

On the subject of the provision in the House bill No. 5445, that in all pensions to widows payments shall be made from the date of death of the husband, I am of opinion that if said provision is meant to apply to all cases which have been heretofore allowed widows pensioned by special acts would certainly be included in its operation.

In reply to your inquiry relative to the number of persons who have been pensioned under the Mexican war act of January 29, 1887, I have to state that there have been 15,331 allowances to survivors of that war, and 4,443 allowances to widows of those who served in that war and have since died. This total is from January 29, 1887, to April 30, 1888, inclusive.

Recurring to the provision in the bill which grants pension to widows from the date of death, I think the language used is too obscure to determine how far it will be applicable. If it be the intention of your committee to limit the additional rights to widows of those who have died from a cause contracted in the war of the rebellion and to include not only those hereafter pensioned, but all those against whom the limitation in the arrears act of 1879 has run on account of their failure to apply before the 1st day of July, 1880, I would suggest that the proviso be amended so as to read as follows:

"And provided further, That all pensions which have been, or which may hereafter be, granted under the general laws regulating pensions to widows in consequence of death occurring from a cause which originated in the service since the 4th day of March, 1861, shall commence from the death of the husband."

The language employed in this suggested proviso, "under the general laws regulating pensions," will exclude widows pensioned by special acts, and I understand that this is your intention in the premises.

If the committee desires that this provision shall be made applicable to all cases wherein pension is granted to widows on account of death resulting from a cause contracted in the military or naval service, either before or after March 4, 1861, I would suggest that this end can be accomplished by merely omitting the words "since the 4th day of March, 1861," from the above proviso.

I have nothing to add to my letter of the 24th ultimo relative to additional funds which will be required for pensions and other purposes, provided by the bill under consideration.

Very respectfully,

WM. E. McLEAN,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

No. 14.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., May 9, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your further reference, dated the 4th instant, to the proposition now pending before your committee to repeal the limitation now imposed by existing law as to date of commencement of pension in the claims of widows alone.

You ask what number of persons would be benefited if the repeal of said limitations were extended to widows whose pensions have been or will hereafter be granted for a death-cause which originated in the service and line of duty prior to March 4, 1861.

In respone, I have to advise you that a careful comparison of all accessible data and an examination of the claims on file in this bureau seem to warrant the conclusion that 1,702 widow pensioners of the Mexican, Florida, and Black Hawk Indian and other wars prior to March 4, 1861, are now alive, and would be entitled should the suggested proposition become a law. There are on file about 150 claims of this class now pending, but the claimants are presumably all dead.

It is estimated from the same careful examination of the cases referred to that the average period for which arrears would be due in said 1,702 cases will be five years.

There would therefore result upon the passage of this provision a total expenditure of $96 per year for five years in each of the 1,702 cases, or a total of $816,960.

It should be noted that this amount will be required in addition to any amount which may be appropriated to pay claims of widows in which the death-cause originated subsequent to March 4, 1861, should the limitation as to them be repealed also.

It is not improper in this connection to suggest that if the limitation be repealed as to both or either of these classes of widows, the amount necessary to pay their claims should be added to the amount proposed already to be appropriated for the payment of Army and Navy pensions for the next fiscal year.

Very respectfully,

JOHN C. BLACK,
Commissioner.

Hon. W. B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., May 3, 1888.

SIR: In response to your letter of the 25th ultimo, transmitting a copy of the pension appropriation bill (H. R. 5445) and calling attention to the provision on page 3, lines 49 to 54 inclusive, directing that "the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause suitable rooms to be set apart in the buildings under his control in cities where pension agencies are located, which shall be acceptable to the Secretary of the Interior, for the use and occupancy of said agencies respectively," and inquiring "if there are any objections by this Department to this provision," I have the honor to inclose herewith copy of a communication to the Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives, in reply to a similar inquiry on the same subject.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD,
Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., March 2, 1888.

SIR: In reply to your letter of 29th ultimo, asking whether, in pursuance of pension appropriation act for the fiscal year 1888, rooms in Government buildings have been assigned to the pension agents located in the cities of Augusta, Me., Columbus, Ohio, Concord, N. H., Des Moines, Iowa, Detroit, Mich., Indianapolis, Ind., Milwaukee, Wis., New York, N. Y., Pittsburgh, Pa., San Francisco, Cal., and Syracuse, N. Y., I have the honor to advise you that the buildings in Augusta, Me., Concord, N. H., Des Moines, Iowa, and Syracuse, N. Y., are as yet unfinished, but rooms will be assigned in pursuance of said act when the same are completed.

Rooms in the building in Columbus, Ohio, are now occupied by the pension agent, but no such assignment has been made in the buildings in Detroit, Mich., Indianapolis, Ind., Milwaukee, Wis., New York, N. Y., Pittsburgh, Pa., or San Francisco, Cal., as they were already overcrowded, as will be shown by the statement of space allotted in each, which is in course of preparation and will be forwarded at the earliest possible date.

Respectfully, yours,

HUGH S. THOMPSON,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

UNITED STATES PENSION AGENCY FOR PAYMENT OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., April 24, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the provisions for the removal of the agency for the payment of pensions to the new Pension building contained in the bill making appropriations for the payment of pensions passed by the House, I desire to invite your attention to the following:

Before the agency was removed to its present quarters it occupied rooms in the Le Droit Building, which, with the growth of the business of the office, became too limited in space for its needs, but for which a rental of $2,700 per annum was paid. The sum of $1,800 is now paid for quarters much more conveniently arranged, and with double the amount of room, and located near the Pension building, making it convenient for the officers of the bureau and this office, and for pensioners as well. This rental of $1,800 per annum includes certain furniture, carpeting, and a large iron safe, the office being fitted up by the lessor in accordance with its requirements at an expense of over $1,000.

This agency disburses over $5,000,000 annually to about 28,000 pensioners. More than 1,800 pensioners are frequently paid in person in a single day, making, with the witnesses necessary in certain cases, about 2,500 persons who come into the office in a day; and probably not less than 20,000 persons enter the office annually.

To wait on these persons requires that the rooms shall be specially adapted to the purpose, as otherwise it would be impossible. To make the change of location contemplated in the bill would necessitate changing and fitting up rooms in the new Pension building, at an expense of not less than $2,500, and for the uses of the agency at least six of the most desirable rooms in the building would be required.

Further, the responsibility involved in the disbursement of so large an amount of money makes it desirable, on the ground of the safety of the business of the agency, that it should remain in its present quarters, occupying the entire building, separate from any other business, and under the exclusive control of the agent.

I inclose an extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, giving the remarks made in the Senate upon this subject last year.

Very respectfully,

S. L. WILLSON,
United States Pension Agent.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am opposed to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, and I am opposed to the provision in the House bill. I hope that the motion to strike out and insert will not be sustained, that that will be disagreed to; and if that is disagreed to, I shall then move to strike out the House clause, which motion will be in order, and then we shall leave the bill simply a naked appropriation bill.

I do not think the estimates here made will cover one-tenth part of the amount that will be taken out of the Treasury under this bill. I do not think there has been any pretense of an estimate here in regard to the clause in the House bill as it came from the House. I do not believe any one could calculate what that would be in regard to all pension cases of widows who have been pensioned, receiving service pensions as widows of soldiers of the war of 1812, or anything of the kind. I do not think any estimate of that can be made. I think it will involve many, many millions of dollars.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator why he says that an estimate can not be made? Does he not know that they have on the files of the Interior Department a full list of all pensions that have been paid under the act of 1880? It is a matter of a very few minutes of computation in that Department, in my judgment.

Mr. COCKRELL. That would be only one class. It would not affect any of those who apply hereafter, and no man living can tell the number who have not yet applied. It is mere guesswork. I remember very distinctly the estimates that were given on the floor of the Senate when the question of arrears was brought up, and they did not come within one-tenth part, about one-twentieth part of what was the actual expenditure under that bill. The highest estimate that was made when that provision was under discussion here was about one-twentieth of what was actually expended.

The statements in this report have not been analyzed, and it is for that reason that I have asked the Senator from Iowa to allow the bill to lie over until we can be able to make some calculations. When we had this bill up before the committee I was not a member of the subcommittee and did not have the data before me, and I have not had the printed report of the committee in my hands until just now. Therefore I have had no opportunity of making a calculation and seeing exactly what will be the effect of it, and seeing to what classes of pensons it will extend.

I find that we have on the pension-roll to-day 44,961 widows without children, and we have 8,135 widows on the pension-roll with children. That makes a total of 53,096 widows. That includes all on the roll. Of this number 895 are the widows of the soldiers of the Mexican war. Under the House clause I do not think there can be any doubt that they would draw their pensions from the death of their husbands. For how many years they would draw them would depend on the date of the death of their husbands. They may have died immediately after the Mexican war. The widows have since that time become sixty-one years old, and they are entitled to pensions, and they would draw them from the date of the death of the husband, somewhere from thirty-five to forty years.

Then we come to the widows of the war of 1812. While the widows of the Mexican war are only 895 in number, the widows of the war of 1812 are 11,831. The further we get from the war the more numerous the widows become. [Laughter.] The husbands have all died, and I do not see why the same rule should not apply to the wives.

Mr. President, we then have the question which will come up here under the act passed in 1886, which increased the pension of widows to $12 per month.

In connection with these statements made by the Commissioner of Pensions and contained in this report, of which I have not had an opportunity of making an examination, I desire that this question shall lie over until morning, and then we can take it up and dispose of it in a short time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the further consideration of the pending bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. Before that question is put I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri and the Senate to the fact that at an earlier hour of to-day's session the Senate, by unanimous consent, agreed that immediately after the routine business to-morrow morning it would proceed to the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII, and continue it to-morrow and the next day, and I hope that there will be no unanimous consent that will conflict with the rule already agreed to.

Mr. KENNA. Let this go over until the other order is completed.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand the Senator from Missouri to desire a postponement?

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to make an examination of this report. It has just been printed, as the Senator well knows, and I never got the report until a few moments ago, and did not have time to analyze it in the committee. It was not printed by the committee, and I want time to analyze and make a statement and make my objections in a concise and exact form.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would call the attention of the Senate to the fact that on the 9th instant the bill (S. 566) making an appropriation for a final survey and estimates for and the commencement of the construction of a boat-railway around the obstructions to navigation at The Dalles and Celilo Falls, in the Columbia River, was made the special order after the morning business on Wednesday, May 16, which will be to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. Special orders always give way to such a rule as the Senate agrees to by unanimous consent, or to the unfinished business, if there be unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent was given for the consideration of this bill at the request of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] to-morrow at the conclusion of the formal morning business, which antedated the agreement to which the Senator from Tennessee refers. The Chair desires to be instructed as to the wish of the Senate upon these conflicting understandings.

Mr. KENNA. I have no doubt that any subsequent unanimous consent would supersede a former unanimous consent; but I notice the Senator from Oregon is not in his seat, and I should dislike by any sort of process in his absence to abrogate an arrangement made at his suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would hold, unless otherwise instructed, that the first agreement should be first executed.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not desire to have the pension appropriation bill interfere with any unanimous consent.

Mr. KENNA. I beg pardon of the Senate. I do not quite understand how the Chair can hold that the first unanimous consent should be first executed. It seems to me a subsequent unanimous consent supersedes it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule special orders are taken up in the order of time they are made. These would be in the nature of special orders.

Mr. KENNA. Suppose by unanimous consent that a special order made by unanimous consent is laid aside and something else taken up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would be a different question.

Mr. KENNA. I presume so.

Mr. ALLISON. If this matter goes over now I give notice that at the earliest convenient moment I shall ask the Senate to take up the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been assigned to any special hour to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. I will try to call it up to-morrow, as I believe I have a right to do.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

Mr. BLAIR. I call for the consideration of the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The consideration of the pension appropriation bill being postponed until to-morrow, the Senate resumes the consideration of House bill 8560.

Mr. BLAIR. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (H. R. 8560) to establish a department of labor, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be at the seat of Government a Department of Labor, the general design and duties of which shall be to acquire and diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with labor, in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word, and especially upon its relation to capital, the hours of labor, the earnings of laboring men and women, and the means of promoting their material, social, intellectual, and moral prosperity.

SEC. 2. That the Department of Labor shall be under the charge of a Commissioner of Labor, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; he shall hold his office for four years, unless sooner removed, and shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum.

SEC. 3. That there shall be in the Department of Labor, to be appointed by the Commissioner of Labor, one chief clerk, at a salary of $2,500 per annum; four clerks of class four, all to be statistical experts; five clerks of class three, one of whom may be a stenographer; six clerks of class two, one of whom may be a translator and one of whom may be a stenographer; eight clerks of class one; five clerks at $1,000 per annum; one disbursing clerk, who shall also have charge of accounts, at a salary of $1,800 per annum; two copyists at $900 each per annum; two copyists at $720 each per annum; one messenger; one assistant messenger; one watchman; two assistant watchmen; two skilled laborers, at $660 each per annum; two charwomen, at $240 each per annum; six special agents, at $1,600 each per annum; ten special agents, at $1,400 each per annum; four special agents, at $1,200 each per annum; and an allowance to special agents for traveling expenses not to exceed $3 per day while actually employed in the field and outside of the District of Columbia, exclusive of actual transportation including sleeping-car fares; and such temporary experts, assistants, and other employés as Congress may from time to time provide, with compensation corresponding to that of similar officers and employés in other Departments of the Government.

SEC. 4. That during the necessary absence of the Commissioner, or when the office shall become vacant, the chief clerk shall perform the duties of Commissioner.

SEC. 5. That the disbursing clerk shall, before entering upon his duties, give bond to the Treasurer of the United States in the sum of $20,000, which bond shall be conditioned that the said officer shall render a true and faithful account to the Treasurer, quarter-yearly, of all moneys and properties which shall be by him received by virtue of his office, with sureties to be approved by the Solicitor of the Treasury. Such bond shall be filed in the office of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, to be by him put in suit upon any breach of the conditions thereof.

SEC. 6. That the Commissioner of Labor shall have charge in the building or premises occupied by or appropriated to the Department of Labor, of the library, furniture, fixtures, records, and other property pertaining to it, or hereafter acquired for use in its business, and he shall be allowed to expend for periodicals and the purposes of the library, and for the rental of appropriate quarters for the accommodation of the Department of Labor within the District of Columbia, and for all other incidental expenses, such sums as Congress may provide from time to time.

SEC. 7. That the Commissioner of Labor, in accordance with the general design and duties referred to in section 1 of this act, is specially charged to ascertain, at as early a date as possible, and whenever industrial changes shall make it essential, the cost of producing articles at the time dutiable in the United States, in leading countries where such articles are produced, by fully specified units of production, and under a classification showing the different elements of cost, or approximate cost, of such articles of production, including the wages paid in such industries per day, week, month, or year, or by the piece; and hours employed per day; and the profits of the manufacturers and producers of such articles; and the comparative cost of living, and the kind of living. It shall be the duty of the commissioner also to ascertain and report as to the effect of the tariff, and the effect thereon of the state of the currency, in the United States, on the agricultural industry, especially as to its effect on mortgage indebtedness of farmers; and what articles are now controlled by trusts, and what effect said trusts have had on limiting production and keeping up prices. He shall also establish a system of reports by which, at intervals of not less than two years, he can report the general condition, so far as production is concerned, of the leading industries of the country. The Commissioner of Labor is also specially charged to investigate the causes of and facts relating to all controversies and disputes between employers and employés as they may occur, and which may tend to interfere with the welfare of the people of the different States, and report thereon to Congress. The Commissioner of Labor shall also obtain such information upon the various subjects committed to him as he may deem desirable from different foreign nations, and what, if any, convict-made goods are imported into this country, and if so, from whence.

SEC. 8. That the Commissioner of Labor shall annually make a report in writing to the President and Congress of the information collected and collated by him, and containing such recommendations as he may deem calculated to promote the efficiency of the Department. He is also authorized to make special reports on particular subjects whenever required to do so by the President or either house of Congress, or when he shall think the subject in his charge requires it. He shall, on or before the 15th day of December in each year, make a report in detail to Congress of all moneys expended under his direction during the preceding fiscal year.

SEC. 9 That all laws and parts of laws relating to the Bureau of Labor created under the act of Congress approved June 27, 1884, so far as the same are applicable and not in conflict with this act, and only so far, are continued in full force and effect, and the Commissioner of Labor appointed under said act, approved June 27, 1884, and all clerks and employés in the Bureau of Labor authorized to be appointed by said act or subsequent acts, shall continue in office and employment as if appointed under the provisions of this act, and until a Commissioner of Labor, other officer, clerks, and employés are appointed and qualified as herein required and provided; and the Bureau of Labor, as now organized and existing, shall continue its work as the department of labor until the department of labor shall be organized in accordance with this act; and the library, records, and all property now in use by the said Bureau of Labor are hereby transferred to the custody of the department of labor hereby created, and on the organization of the department of labor on the basis of this act the functions of the Bureau of Labor shall cease.

SEC. 10. That on the passage of this act the Commissioner of Labor shall at once submit estimates for the expenses of the department of labor for the next fiscal year, giving in detail the number and salaries of officers and employés therein.

Passed the House of Representatives April 18, 1888.

Attest: JNO. B. CLARK, Clerk.

Mr. BLAIR. I present in this connection a letter from the Commissioner of Labor, written in response to an inquiry on this subject, which I ask may be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of yours of May 1, making inquiries as to the present cost of the Bureau of Labor as now constituted, and of the Department of Labor as proposed in House bill 8560.

The total cost of the Bureau of Labor as now constituted is about $108,000 per annum, the salary list being $52,960, the miscellaneous list $39,230, while between $15,000 and $16,000 is borne on the miscellaneous appropriations of the Department of the Interior for printing, stationery, incidental expenses, rent, etc. The expense under the proposed bill, as near as I can estimate it, would be $152,760 per annum. It might run over or fall a little short of this, as miscellaneous expenses might demand. This would be made up of salary list—$84,660, according to the equipment specified in the bill—while the miscellaneous expenses, for subsistence, transportation of agents, experts, etc., printing and stationery, necessary incidental expenses, rent, library and periodicals, etc., would be $68,100. The expense, therefore, of the Department of Labor as proposed would be between $41,000 and $42,000 more than the expense of the present bureau. This additional expense, however, will in a large measure be quite necessary to be added to the present expense of the Bureau of Labor, should it continue. This necessity arises from the character of the work performed.

The force provided in the pending bill is a practical increase of 9 persons in the office force and 2 in the field. We have employed in the office 20 persons on the regular classified list, and 5 unclassified, making a total of 25 in office. The new bill calls for 40 office force. The bureau has employed 18 regular agents and 6 temporary agents, on the average, making a total field force, on the average, of 24, or, with the present office force, 24 plus 25, a total of 49 persons. The pending bill calls for 20 field agents, which added to the proposed office force of 40, would make 60 persons employed in all, or a total increase of 11. The pending bill would make the office force regular instead of irregular, as at present, and would balance the forces in a proper way. The present forces are not well balanced. The experience of three years emphasizes the fact that the composition of the force, as called for by the pending bill, would be far more adequate to the work of the bureau.

The demands of Congress and the public on the time of the bureau are increasing, and in order to carry out the intention of Congress in the establishment of this bureau, as I have already intimated, the force must be increased. I therefore feel that I can assure you that the pending bill makes no increase in the necessary expenses of Government that ought not to be added to the expense of the present bureau. Further, while there is nothing proposed in the pending bill in the way of duties which could not be legitimately performed under the law establishing the Bureau of Labor, the pending bill to create a Department of Labor makes certain duties specific, and these duties are of such a nature that much expense must naturally be incurred. You will recognize at once that a considerable portion of the increase is already borne by appropriations made for the Department of the Interior and its bureaus which, under the new bill, would be made directly for the Department of Labor.

Trusting I have met your inquiries fully, I am,

Very respectfully, yours,

CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Commissioner.

Hon. HENRY W. BLAIR,
United States Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no desire to make any remarks further than to say that I think the bill is entirely correct, and I hope it will be passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I see no earthly necessity for the passage of this bill to establish a department of labor. I hold in my hand the act of June 27, 1884, which is certainly all that is required on this question. It is entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Labor." I call the attention of the Senators to the provisions of this law:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be established in the Department of the Interior a Bureau of Labor—

This bill proposes a department of labor—which shall be under the charge of a Commissioner of Labor, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Commissioner of Labor shall hold his office for four years, and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed, and shall receive a salary of $3,000 a year. The Commissioner shall collect information upon the subject of labor, its relation to capital, the hours of labor, and the earnings of laboring men and women, and the means of promoting their material, social, intellectual, and moral prosperity.

The Secretary of the Interior upon the recommendation of said Commissioner, shall appoint a chief clerk, who shall receive a salary of $2,000 per annum, and such other employés as may be necessary for the said bureau: Provided, That the total expense shall not exceed $25,000 per annum. During the necessary absence of the Commissioner, or when the office shall become vacant, the chief clerk shall perform the duties of Commissioner. The Commissioner shall annually make a report in writing to the Secretary of the Interior of the information collected and collated by him, and containing such recommendations as he may deem calculated to promote the efficiency of the bureau.

This act was approved the 27th of June, 1884, and under it Carroll D. Wright was appointed Chief of the Bureau of Labor. I hold in my hand the first annual report of the Commissioner of Labor, 1886, entitled on the back, "Industrial Depressions." It is the first report made by the Commissioner of Labor and seems to be quite full on many points. It contains:

Letter of transmittal.

Convict-labor laws in the United States.

Mr. President, it does seem to me that the Bureau of Labor already existing meets every want that is required in behalf of the laboring people of this great country, and I believe the law creating the Bureau of Labor is almost in the language of this bill. About the only difference I see between the real provisions of the existing law and of this proposed law will be found in the third section, and that is—

That there shall be in the department of labor, to be appointed by the Commissioner of Labor—

Not to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, as now, but by the Commissioner of Labor—

One chief clerk, at a salary of $2,500 per annum; four clerks of class 4, all to be statistical experts; five clerks of class 3, one of whom may be a stenographer; six clerks of class 2, one of whom may be a translator and one of whom may be a stenographer; eight clerks of class 1; five clerks, at $1,000 per annum; one disbursing clerk, who shall also have charge of accounts, at a salary of $1,800 per annum; two copyists, at $900 each per annum; two copyists, at $720 each per annum; one messenger; one assistant messenger; one watchman; two assistant watchmen; two skilled laborers, at $600 each per annum; two charwomen, at $240 each per annum; six special agents, at $1,600 each per annum; ten special agents, at $1,400 each per annum; four special agents, at $1,200 each per annum; and an allowance to special agents for traveling expenses not to exceed $3 per day while actually employed in the field and outside of the District of Columbia, exclusive of actual transportation including sleeping-car fares; and such temporary experts, assistants, and other employés as Congress may from time to time provide, with compensation corresponding to that of similar officers and employés in other Departments of the Government.

That seems to be about the only substantial difference—an increase of the number of officers and giving the appointment to the Commissioner of Labor.

Mr. BLAIR. That is the substance of the difference between the existing bureau and what it is proposed to make it. It is proposed that this department of labor shall correspond in its scope and work with the same unlimited freedom of exercise of its powers that is now possessed by the Department of Agriculture, that the great laboring interests of the country may be under a department in the same way that the agricultural interest of the country is already provided for; and I may say that it is modeled substantially after the organization of the Agricultural Department. It is not, of course, with any contemplation of a Cabinet position for the head of it. So far as the increased expense is concerned, it is, as the Senator will observe—I think he was out when the letter of the Commissioner was read, sent in response to inquiries made by the Senate committee—that the present expenditure is in part under the Secretary of the Interior, and it is so mixed up that it is impossible to eliminate it and apply it to the expenses of the Bureau of Labor proper. The expense now, I think, is about $125,000. Under this bill it will be about $150,000. Some addition of clerical force is necessary, in order to make the bureau or department correspond to its growing wants. The bill is one about which there has been no controversy or dispute. It is based on previous legislation, and comes to us from the House of Representatives, unanimously passed by that body, unanimously reported by the Committee on Labor of theHouse, and passed after discussion without a dissenting voice from any party or any individual whatever.

I have nothing further to say, but hope the Senate will dispose of the bill at present.

Mr. REAGAN. Before the bill is disposed of I desire to call attention to the ninth section, beginning at line 6, which reads:

> The Commissioner of Labor appointed under said act, approved June 27, 1884, and all clerks and employés in the Bureau of Labor authorized to be appointed by said act or subsequent acts, shall continue in office and employment as if appointed under the provisions of this act, and until a Commissioner of Labor, other officer, clerks, and employés are appointed and qualified as herein required and provided.

Mr. BLAIR. That is in order that there may be no interruption of work, that the existing bureau may continue until gradually it is merged and in fact is entirely merged in the proposed department. There have been some additions made to the department, and this personnel will carry on the work until changes are subsequently made and additional appointments——

Mr. REAGAN. But what strikes me is that the power of appointment is by the Constitution vested in the President, heads of Departments, or courts of law. It has not been the custom heretofore to appoint officers by act of Congress.

Mr. BLAIR. The bureau is simply merged and the name changed to a department.

Mr. REAGAN. I should like to have the bill go over until morning. I must think that the Commissioner of Labor has underestimated the increased expense involved in this bill, and I should like an opportunity to look into it. He makes out that there is an increase of $30,000. There are twenty agents here authorized to be appointed by the Department with salaries, and with an allowance for traveling expenses, not exceeding $3 a day, "exclusive of actual transportation, including sleeping-car fare." If twenty agents should be put in the field for half the year, getting $3 a day and the expense of transportation, with sleeping-car fare, I apprehend it would make a very serious difference in the amount estimated for this purpose.

Besides that, it seems to me that under the act of 1884, with the power given to the Commissioner of Labor and under the organization of the Bureau of Statistics, all the possible information is obtained that we could obtain under this act; that we gain nothing by it; we do nothing by it except to multiply officers and increase salaries. No man can watch the progress of the Government without feeling apprehensive that we are making an alarming increase of officers. We should not go further in that direction unless the increase proposed produces to the country some substantial good.

Of course I understand that this will be claimed as a great benefit to labor. How does it benefit labor? We have officers collecting all the information that can be collected under this act through the Bureau of Labor under the Secretary of the Interior, and through the Bureau of Statistics under the Secretary of the Treasury. We can get all the information that this bill will give us without increasing the number of officers and increasing the expenditures as provided for in this bill.

I know there is a sort of habit now that when labor is mentioned men are required almost to stand on their heads. I do not propose to be one of that class, and I feel that I have a right to speak upon the subject, because I was born and raised in the ranks of labor and not in the ranks of demagogues, not in the ranks of those who appeal to class prejudices. I believe it our duty to legislate for the welfare of this country, and not to legislate with reference to foolish prejudices where no good can result, but only an increase of burdens upon labor by the increase of officers and the multiplication of expenses.

The bill has come up suddenly to me, and I should be glad to have it go over till morning, so that further time can be given for its examination.

Mr. BLAIR. I should be very glad to complete the consideration of the bill to-night. I did not anticipate any opposition to it. I never heard of any before. I know it is generally approved and great anxiety felt for the enactment of the bill into a law by those whose interests (whether supported by demagogues or others) are supposed to be served by the bill.

The Senator from Missouri has read to us in extenso the statement of the contents of the reports of the present bureau, and has been so gracious as to say that they indicated excellent labor on the part of the bureau; but that is no argument against this bill, which changes the form of the existing organization to make it more efficient at a slight increased expense—nothing beyond what seems to be the actual necessity of the bureau under the changed form; and it is to be called a Department.

If the Senator from Texas insists on a postponement that he may discuss the bill further, I have nothing to say, but I should be glad if he would allow final action to be taken to-night.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question. Has the Senator from New Hampshire information authorizing him to say that the laboring men of this country are in favor of the bill?

Mr. BLAIR. I understand they favor it universally. Their great organizations indorse it.

Mr. VOORHEES. If the Senator from New Hampshire will yield to me I will move an adjournment. It is perfectly manifest that we shall not get a vote to-night, and there is not a quorum here either.

Mr. BLAIR. I will ask that the bill be disposed of to-morrow, notwithstanding any special assignment which has been made for the consideration of the Calendar, beginning early. I shall ask that, because I think it important to dispose of the bill promptly.

Mr. HARRIS. I give notice to the Senator from New Hampshire that I shall insist upon carrying out the consent rule that was entered into this morning.

Mr. BLAIR. This bill was taken up on motion.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] will allow me, I will move an executive session.

Mr. VOORHEES. I withdraw my motion for that purpose.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the pending bill remains the unfinished business. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 16, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate May 15, 1888.

ASSAYER.

Frank Nicholson, of Missouri, to be assayer of the United States assay office at St. Louis, Mo.

MELTER OF MINT.

John W. Browning, of Colorado, to be melter of the mint of the United States at Denver, Colo.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 15, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PERRY, for seven days, beginning this day.

To Mr. BACON, indefinitely, on account of important business.

CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION, OHIO VALLEY.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa, Mr. CLEMENTS, and Mr. BUTTERWORTH as managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 9711) making an appropriation to enable the several Executive Departments of the Government and the Bureau of Agriculture and the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and Commission of Fish and Fisheries, to participate in the Centennial Exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States, to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio, from July 4 to October 27, 1888.

CORRECTION OF A BILL.

The SPEAKER. In House bill No. 7111, granting a pension to Caroline Pautel, the name of the beneficiary is spelled in two different ways in the body of the bill. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] asks unanimous consent that the spelling of the name where it last occurs in the bill be corrected.

There was no objection and it was so ordered.

BRANCH SOLDIERS' HOME, GRANT COUNTY, INDIANA.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up and put upon its passage the bill (H. R. 8391) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers in Grant County, Indiana, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I must object, Mr. Speaker.

WASHINGTON AND IDAHO RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up and put upon its passage the bill (S. 38) granting to the Washington and Idaho Railroad Company the right of way through the Cœur d'Alene Indian reservation.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the right of way is hereby granted, as hereinafter set forth, to the Washington and Idaho Railroad Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the Territory of Washington, for the extension of its railroad through the lands in Idaho Territory set apart for the use of the Cœur d'Alene Indians by executive order, commonly known as the Cœur d'Alene Indian reservation, beginning at a point on the westerly line of said reservation, near the junction of the Washington and Idaho Railroad with the Idaho Branch of said road, near Lone Pine, in Washington Territory, and running thence in a northerly direction across the Cœur d'Alene Indian reservation to a point in Washington Territory, and running thence in a northerly direction across the Cœur d'Alene Indian reservation to a point near the mouth of the St. Joseph's River, on the Cœur d'Alene Lake, thence in a northeasterly direction along the east side of the Cœur d'Alene Lake to the Cœur d'Alene River, and thence in a generally easterly direction, by the Cœur d'Alene Mission, to the east line of the reservation.

SEC. 2. That the right of way hereby granted to said company shall be 75 feet in width on each side of the central line of said railroad as aforesaid; and said company shall also have the right to take from said lands adjacent to the line of said road material, stone, earth, and timber necessary for the construction of said railroad; also, ground adjacent to such right of way for station-buildings, depots, machine-shops, side-tracks, turnouts, and water-stations, not to exceed in amount 300 feet in width and 3,000 feet in length for each station, to the extent of one station for each 10 miles of road.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to fix the amount of compensation to be paid the Indians for such right of way, and provide the time and manner for the payment thereof, and also to ascertain and fix the amount of compensation to be made individual members of the tribe for damages sustained by them by reason of the construction of said road; but no right of any kind shall vest in said railway company in or to any part of the right of way herein provided for until plats thereof, made upon actual survey for the definite location of such railroad, and including the points for station-buildings, depots, machine shops, side tracks, turnouts, and water stations, shall be filed with and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, which approval shall be made in writing and be open for the inspection of any party interested therein, and until the compensation aforesaid has been fixed and paid; and the surveys, construction, and operation of such railroad, including charges of transportation, shall be conducted with due regard for the rights of the Indians, and in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may make to carry out this provision: Provided, That the consent of the Indians to said right of way shall be obtained by said railroad company in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe, before any right under this act shall accrue to said company.

SEC. 4. That said company shall not assign or transfer or mortgage this right of way for any purpose whatever until said road shall be completed: Provided, That the company may mortgage said franchise, together with the rolling-stock, for money to construct and complete said road: And provided further, That the right granted herein shall be lost and forfeited by said company unless the road is constructed and in running order across said reservation within two years from the passage of this act.

SEC. 5. That said railway company shall accept this right of way upon the expressed condition, binding upon itself, its successors and assigns, that they will neither aid, advise, nor assist in any effort looking towards the changing or extinguishing the present tenure of the Indians in their land, and will not attempt to secure from the Indian tribes any further grant of land or its occupancy than is hereinbefore provided: Provided, That any violation of the condition mentioned in this section shall operate as a forfeiture of all the rights and privileges of said railway company under this act.

SEC. 6. That Congress may at any time amend, add to, alter, or repeal this act.

SEC. 7. That this act shall be in force from its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHIVELY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JESSE COE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HUNTER] had a bill before the House when the hour of adjournment arrived yesterday. The bill has been read, but the Clerk will again report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Jesse Coe, of Monroe County, Kentucky, the sum of $450, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for horses taken from him by the United States Army and used by the same during the war of the rebellion.

The committee recommended an amendment striking out "four hundred and fifty" before the word "dollars" and inserting "three hundred and seventy-five."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HUNTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MAP OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. MANSUR, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 168) to authorize the printing of 15,000 copies of the Map of the United States, edition of 1887; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

SANDY HOOK SHIP-CHANNEL.

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ask unanimous consent for the immediate adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA] is not a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have authorized me to present the report.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not understand, Mr. Speaker, how the gentleman from New York can present a report from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has just called the gentleman's attention to the fact that he is not a member of the committee.

Mr. SPINOLA. But the members of the committee have authorized me to present the report.

The SPEAKER. But a report from a committee must be made at least in the name of some member of the committee and by authority of the committee.

Mr. LEE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar and put upon its passage House bill 8843.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, what becomes of the report from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors?

The SPEAKER. There is no report.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. By an order of the House heretofore made, this day was set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, in such order as that committee might indicate. Of course, if the committee indicate no bills which they desire to have considered, the regular order will be the call of committees for reports.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I move that it be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. It can not be dispensed with.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. Of course, the special order will not be called unless the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds ask for it. The regular order is insisted upon. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] moves that the morning hour for the presentation of reports of committees be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I now ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to make be allowed to hand them in at the Clerk's desk for reference to the appropriate Calendars.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the leave asked by the gentleman from Kentucky will be granted. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the clerk's desk.

F. VARIN.

Mr. BLISS, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. 6607) for the relief of F. Varin; which was laid on the table.

He also, from the same committee, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9801) to refer the claims against the United States of F. Varin to the Court of Claims; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, HUNTSVILLE, ALA.

Mr. BLISS also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. 5734) to reimburse the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Huntsville, Ala.; which was laid on the table.

He also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. 5735) to refer the claim against the United States of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Huntsville, Ala., to the Court of Claims; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 8105) for the relief of Joseph E. Montgomery; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WARREN MITCHELL.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 327) for the relief of Warren Mitchell; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF LEWIS W. WASHINGTON.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1725) for the relief of the legal representatives of Lewis W. Washington, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PENNSYLVANIA WAR CLAIM.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2329) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to re-examine and reaudit the claim of the State of Pennsylvania for advances made and money borrowed by said State to pay the militia called into the military service by the governor under the proclamation of the President of June 15, 1863; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. FORD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 762) for the relief of William Crouse; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MILWAUKEE, LAKE SHORE AND WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. HUDD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9958) granting to the Milwaukee, Lake Shore and Western Railway Company the right of way through the Lac de Flambeau Indian reservation, in the State of Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. STEELE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 6556) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the muster and pay the military officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces," approved June 3, 1884, and further amended February 3, 1887; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FORT RUSSELL MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. MAISH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1804) to authorize the Cheyenne Street Railroad Company to build its road on and across the Fort D. A. Russell military reservation; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FORT LEAVENWORTH MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. MAISH also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1747) to authorize the sale of a tract of land in the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LUCY A. JORDAN.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 9463) granting a pension to Lucy Jordan; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. HELEN B. BROWN.

Mr. GALLINGER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9697) granting a pension to Mrs. Helen B. Brown; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GETTYSBURGH ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported joint resolution (H. Res. 169) to appropriate $25,000 for a celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the battle of Gettysburgh; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1959) authorizing the Secretary of War to issue to the governor of the Territory of Montana military stores for the use of the regularly-enlisted, organized, and uniformed active militia; and the same was referred to the Committee on the Militia.

On motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Robert W. Dunbar, for payment of his claim against the United States; and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

C. I. NOURSE.

Mr. MANSUR, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 5784) for the relief of C. I. Nourse; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADDIE BELL.

Mr. MANSUR also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1506) for the relief of Addie Bell; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LABAN HEATH & CO.

Mr. MANSUR also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (S. 903) for the relief of Laban Heath & Co., of Boston, Mass.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL CEMETERY, HAMPTON.

Mr. MAISH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9442) to provide for widening the entrance to the national cemetery at Hampton; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN REILLY.

Mr. CAREY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 6299) directing the Secretary of War to issue an honorable discharge to John Reilly; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TARIFF.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the tariff bill.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, no member of this House need apologize for asking and insisting upon being heard upon a question which is of such vital concern to all his constituents.

All the other bills before this body taken together dwarf into insignificance when compared with this in immediate results and far-reaching consequence.

This is the only bill pending here that reaches to every home in the country in a measure, which will make its influence immediately felt. It relates to taxation—not merely to the rate of tax which may be imposed upon the citizen, but at the same time deals with his ability to pay the rate when fixed.

We are, it is hoped, at the close of the consideration of this bill, by our votes to indicate clearly—if we do not in fact absolutely determine—what, in a most important particular, the economic policy of the Government shall be. And the people in November next will approve or condemn our action; either they will commit our economic policy to the control and care of the Democratic party or restore the Republicans to power in the nation. Truth, justice, and the highest interests of the country demand that there shall be no paltering in a double sense, "keeping the word of promise to the ear to break it to the hope."

That the people may not be misled, let the issue joined between the majority, the Democratic side of the House, and the minority, the Republican side of the House, be fully and fairly stated.

We can not deceive ourselves if we try. We may attempt to deceive the country by presenting a Janus face in the tariff plank of a party platform. But, sir, the end to be attained, which is admittedly the good of the whole country, needs not the aid of agencies of such doubtful honesty, and more than doubtful propriety.

Let us hope, in the interest of the great cause we would serve, that the issue joined in the tariff planks of the national platforms will be so distinctly stated as to indicate that the resolution was drawn by patriotic statesmen, and not by time-serving and juggling politicians.

Whether the tariff needs revision is not the issue joined between us. Upon that point there is no controlling difference of opinion. Whether the duty is too high upon this article or too low upon that is not the line upon which we divide. Whether a rate of duty yielding a much less revenue might be so adjusted as to afford all needful protection to our industries is not the question upon which we are in antagonism. These are matters of detail, and concerning which there might be wide diversity of opinion, not only between the political parties but among the members of each. These issues would naturally grow out of conditions which affect the application of an economic policy, admitting the wisdom of the policy itself.

The controversy arises out of an irreconcilable difference of opinion between the political organizations represented upon this floor as to the wisdom and justice of the protective system. You assail it as being unsound in principle and iniquitous in its operation. We defend it as being alike wise in theory and beneficent in its results.

You assert (and each speaker who has addressed the House from the Democratic standpoint has endeavored to maintain) that to levy a duty on imports, except for the purpose of raising needed revenue, is at once unconstitutional, unwise, unjust, and indefensible, while we assert the exact reverse, insisting that not only may duties be levied with reference to revenue, but with reference to the protection of our home industries as well, and beyond that, that such duties are indispensable to the development of our national resources.

You assert, and have endeavored to prove, that the direct and inevitable result of a tariff levied for the purpose of protection, and to the extent that it is so levied, is to exact tribute of the many for the benefit of the few; that the direct tendency of the system is to found and foster monopoly, to make the rich richer and the poor poorer; that all these evil results are the legitimate outgrowth of the system, and that being so, it is the irresistible logic of the situation that if you are honest, as you are, your end, aim, and deliberate purpose must be to destroy this system.

What we account a blessing in the present system our Democratic friends condemn as a curse. It follows, therefore, that the political parties divide on the wisdom of protection as an economic policy.

We can not deceive ourselves if we try, and I doubt if we can deceive the country if we make the effort, as to the real obstacle which stands in the way of a proper and needed revision of the tariff.

It will not be found in the inability of this House to revise it in conformity with the just and reasonable requirements of the protective system, if that was in truth your end and aim. Nor would it be found in any unwillingness on our part to aid you in so doing. But that is not the prime object of your endeavor. The obstacle is found in the fact that you, while revising, are seeking to destroy.

The logic of your position (and you stand by it) is that you should, if possible, while providing for needed revenue, destroy a policy which you regard as unequal, unjust, and iniquitous, and which is, you assert, the founder and cherisher of monopolies.

With your convictions upon this subject you would be untrue to the obligations of your oaths, false to the duty devolving upon you as the representatives of the people, if you did not, even as you are doing, endeavor to tear up the iniquity by the roots, and the country may rest assured if you do not succeed it will not be your fault.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to discuss the details of the pending bill (that can be done when we come to consider it under the five-minute rule), but to address myself to the main question, which involves the maintenance or overthrow of the protective system.

The people of the country do not possess the discernment for which I give them credit if they fail to appreciate the precise situation presented here. They will not be misled by the cry of our friends upon the Democratic side of the House that they are anxious to revise the tariff, but that the Republicans are a stumbling block and rock of offense in the way.

The first question the intelligent voter will ask himself is, "How do I stand on the main proposition? Do I desire the maintenance or the destruction of the protective system?"

He will answer that question by his vote next November. He will say if the protective policy is beneficent it should be under Republican care, and not within Democratic control. Let no one mistake the issue. Let no one on this side suppose for a moment that our battle with the Democratic party is over the mere matter of adjusting the tariff with reference to the protection needed. This is a matter of detail. Our contest is to maintain the system against their studied efforts to destroy it. The details we will settle afterwards.

It is interesting to note with what adroitness our friends on the other side endeavor to divert the attention of the country from the real purpose which underlies and is the mainspring of their effort; as if the political ways parted when we come to consider the duty on rice, the duty upon sugar, or upon glass.

This pretended revision is the Trojan horse by means of which you hope to gain admission to our camp.

I ask you, I ask the country, if it is in the logic of the situation that you can revise, except to destroy. Will you seek to make strong or preserve in health that which you say should not exist at all?

If it should be destroyed, the work of so-called revision has been committed to those who will rejoice in the service, the Democratic party. If it is to be maintained and revised with reference to the performance of its legitimate and proper functions, this nation should place (and, in my judgment, will place) the system in the care and keeping of the Republican party.

I am conscious of the fact that we are discussing a dry subject. But we can not be forgetful of another fact. There is not a hearthstone in the United States that will not be affected for good or ill by the passage of the Mills bill. Its passage will be a direct condemnation of the protective system. Its defeat will indicate not that the tariff is perfect, but that the Democratic party is not a fit instrument to remove its imperfections.

Let us inquire what the proper functions of the protective system are, for they should not be misapprehended.

First, let it be borne in mind that it deals with conditions and not with boundary lines, except as the latter mark the presence of the former. The just measure of its usefulness will not be found in the weight of shekels it has secured to those engaged and employed in the various industries of our country.

Desirable as the accumulation of wealth was, and is, the protective system had, and has, a nobler mission than the development of the mere physical resources of this nation. That development might have been possible under a monarchical form of government controlling and employing a race of slaves.

In the course of this argument I desire to notice the points made against the policy of protection by the advocates of the Mills bill. First, whether in its mission it tends to establish monopoly. Whether it does, in fact, levy tribute upon the many for the benefit of the few. Whether it does make the burden of taxation unequal. Whether it tends to increase the price of commodities in the market. And then seek to learn whether its influence has been, as we claim, to multiply and diversify industries. Whether the result has been, as we assert, to build up a home market and to continue it, and in the same connection inquire into the relation of the agricultural industries to those of the manufacturer, and see how far the assertion that farmers are bearing more than their share of the public burdens are borne out by the facts.

I wish to consider also the influences which have tended to cause disturbance in the ranks of wage-workers and set capital and labor by the ears. In connection with these inquiries I will call attention to the influence of the two systems in the States where any such bear sway, and determine the value of the philosophy by the results of adherence to the practice it enjoins.

What gave rise to the protective system?

This House and the country need not be told that it was the purpose of our fathers, in the establishment of the government we enjoy, to lay the foundation here of a new order of things, which looked not alone to the development of the material resources of this country, but to the moral and intellectual growth of each individual citizen; in this latter growth, rather than in the development of the material resources of the country, our fathers recognized the true foundation upon which to build a nation's greatness, and permanently secure the freedom and prosperity of all our people. And as a logical result it was their active concern to provide the opportunity for the head of each family to bring to his home prosperity, comfort, and happiness, the legitimate offspring of intelligent effort guided by virtue. I will adopt in brief language used by me in speaking at another place and on another occasion.

In this work the fathers built even better than they knew.

The maxims of the English law—the spirit of the English constitution wherein it was a bulwark of freedom—they adopted. But in their effort they kept steadily in view the fundamental idea of establishing a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people." They were conscious that the homes of a country are the source of its greatness and power; that as we multiply the number of homes where virtue and intelligence exert controlling influence we increase the happiness of our people, and make sure and fast the pillars which uphold the state.

Our fathers realized that a philosopher placed in the midst of poverty and squalor will gravitate toward vice and corruption. They knew, and we realize in as full a sense, that as needful comforts and conveniences abound in a home, so are the inmates of that home elevated and refined, dignified and ennobled.

Our system of Government has no higher or nobler mission than to multiply the number of happy homes in the United States. Can laws perform a better work than to place the wage-worker of my country above and out of the influence of those conditions in the Old World which in a large degree tend to make men and women mere beasts of burden? Can a system of political economy be justly condemned which seeks to enable the man who produces the wealth of a nation to become, with his wife and children, the sharer in and partaker of the fruits of his toil? This is the mission of the protective system.

I contend that the preservation of that system as an economic governmental policy is to-day and must be for years indispensable to the national prosperity; and that it must be preserved as a system.

Now, does it perform the service we claim for it?

You say it imposes burdens in that it increases taxation without corresponding benefit. We answer that it imposes the shadow of taxation that we may enjoy the substance of substantial prosperity.

Mr. Chairman, a careful examination of the circumstances which give rise to imposition of so-called tax as an incident of the protective policy, and the resulting increased ability of the citizens to pay it, will satisfy even my honored friend, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means (and that would seem to reach the case and condition of my other friends from Kentucky, Tennessee, and Arkansas) of the wisdom and justice of the protective system.

With great respect I submit to those honorable gentlemen that they stop their investigation when they have viewed what they regard as the burden of tax imposed by the tariff.

They seem not to consider the increased ability to pay, which results from the influence of the trade regulation of which the alleged tax is an incident.

If it is admitted, as claimed, that the system imposes taxes, the answer is that it is in the nature of an investment, the resulting profit being such as each year to repay with usury the capital invested.

If I am right in this, can you successfully deny the wisdom and justice of the policy which in the last analysis is but a governmental business venture in the interests of all our people? The issue joined between us is as to whether we shall change our business method. An inseparable attendant on our present governmental business policy involves the imposition of duties levied for protection. And I repeat that under our system these duties are levied as plain business investment and with confidence that the capital will be returned to each citizen with usury.

But is it true to say that in maintaining a protective duty we lay a tax upon our people? We do not, in strictness, do any such thing. The exact business proposition resolves itself into this: In the interests of our people we have adopted certain regulations in restraint of import trade with foreign nations. If our citizens trade with the citizens of those nations they do it under and in accordance with the regulations prescribed. These laws of trade and commerce in their operation have two objects in view: one, to raise the revenue to defray the expenses of the Government; the other, to so regulate the admission of foreign products to our home markets as to secure our citizens against the disastrous influence of that foreign competition which unrestrained would greatly hinder if not absolutely prevent the establishment and maintenance of industrial plants in the United States.

We say that whatever, if any, of temporary inconvenience our people may suffer from these trade restrictions is more than compensated in the direct advantages which will result from their influence in the encouragement of productive effort among our people. We assert, and the proof of the correctness of the assertion is ample, that under the influence of this restraint of trade with foreign nations our own resources will be rapidly developed, our industries multiplied and diversified, and that the comforts and conveniences of life will more abound; and, concurrently with all this, wages will be advanced, while the cost of things needful in life will be reduced. A home market, confessedly the most desirable, will be created, the industrial independence of the Republic secured, and prosperity and happiness come and abide with us.

Although the results have conclusively justified every hope and expectation of the champions of protection, yet we have to-day, as if the experiment were new and untried, to stand here and defend it. They (I refer to these misguided Democratic brethren on the other side) insist that our prosperity has not been the result of the protective system, but has come to us in spite of it. We are asked the question a thousand times each campaign, and it has been in substance repeatedly asked during this debate: Does protection protect? I propose to add my answer to those of my honored friends on this side who have preceded me.

First, let us agree on certain business propositions which are so self-evident as to be properly ranked among the axioms which guide the business world in the prosecution of its various ventures.

I am now dealing with our own country and with our own people.

Manufacturing plants could not be established without capital. Capital will not seek investment without reasonable hope of adequate return.

Both capital and plants were essential to the procurement and employment of skilled workmen, and all these are together the foundation upon which must rest prosperous trade and commerce, since they furnish the source and supply of that which is the subject-matter of both.

Capital will protect itself, even if it has to leave the workmen in idleness and consequent destitution.

In a contest with workmen, capital has the advantage. This is certain, and for the reason that capital can wait longer for a dividend than labor can for a breakfast.

I want to supplement these cold business maxims by a few others that are leavened with the humane and Christian spirit of our free institutions. One is that labor should have its full and equal distributive share in the profit resulting from its joint effort with capital.

To authorize or permit a condition or system which would compel capital either to withdraw from the field of competition or withhold from labor its due is alike inhuman and directly at war with sound public policy. I shall maintain that the protective system is designed to, and in its operation does, avoid the evils we would shun and multiply the blessings to which we would attain.

Does protection protect? Palpably it so regulates trade and commerce with foreign nations as to shield our industrial enterprises from the destructive influence of conditions beyond the sea, in the presence of which the healthful growth of the industrial arts in our midst would have been impossible, and for reasons so obvious and so frequently cited on this floor that to repeat them would seem needless.

Does protection multiply our industries? No, not directly; but its influence is the parent of conditions which give rise to the multiplication of our industries. It is the immediate cause and source of multiplication and diversification of industry.

By multiplication of industries we mean the creation of those that are new; such as the creation of a new method of performing a given labor, as in making horseshoes by machinery instead of by hand; printing by the use of the power-press instead of by hand; in the use of cyclones to reduce and pulverize substances instead of using a mortar of stone or iron crushers. In these and other instances we manufacture the machines to do the work instead of doing the work itself with our hands. And these instrumentalities are the product of new industries in all the mechanical arts.

And in the invention and production in the arts of these new machines and devices our industries are multiplied and diversified indefinitely, and, as a result, employment is given to vast numbers of men, women, and youths, who at once create and supply a home market.

All this Mr. Calhoun, in 1816, standing in his place upon this floor as the champion of the protective system, with prophetic vision saw and distinctly pointed out to the House and the country. I shall refer to his evidence later on in my remarks.

Now, I want the attention of my distinguished friend from Texas, with whom I have had many interesting talks as to the source of the multiplication of our industries.

I have on previous occasions called the attention of this House and the country to the influence of the inventive genius of our people upon its industrial development.

I have said, and do still maintain, that in that inventive genius will be found the germ of our unequaled industrial prosperity. And just at this point I anticipate the question of my friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] who has in his bill placed the ax at the root of the tree of protection. He will ask me if the multiplication of our industries is so largely due to the genius of invention. "Why do you give protection the credit for it and continue the policy?" The idea being that since invention multiplies and diversifies our industries, and the letters patent which for a term of years vest in the inventor and his assigns the exclusive ownership of the thing invented, and so preserve to him the exclusive right to manufacture, use, and sell the invention covered by the letters patent, a protective tariff is needless.

On its face the point seems strong, and in the argument is well taken, if the scope and influence of the patent system is as broad and full as is supposed.

But I assure the gentleman that a more careful investigation of the character of our industrial growth as it rests upon the development of the mechanical arts will tend to greatly modify his views, if it does not radically change them.

I beg to call attention to the fact that these patents granted to inventors are for improvements in the arts to which they attain.

An improvement in the shuttle used in a sewing machine, valuable and useful as it may be when used in the machine, is of little consequence to a manufacturer if he finds it impossible to make the machine itself.

An improvement in the device for working a sickle on a mowing machine is unimportant to a manufacturer if he can not make the machine of which the improvement is but a supplemental adjunct.

There are in one sense few new industrial arts. There are many new and useful improved devices used in the arts—improvements of greater or less consequence in the machines and implements which form the base of a particular art.

It follows that to protect the improvements in a given art you must protect our manufacturers in the production of the implement, machine, or device in connection with which such improvements are used. These improvements are in many, I may say in most, instances compared to the importance of the machine itself in large measure inconsequential, but still mark desirable and substantial progressive development, and supply better and more ample facilities in the conduct of human affairs, and their improvements and agencies have placed innumerable articles on the free-list. Thus the conditions to which our friends on the other side would attain will be soonest reached by pursuing the even tenor of our way along the highway of protection.

The protective system upholds the art, the inventive genius—perfects and completes it. Its influence is in a measure hidden, but it is none the less potent and far-reaching. It may be said of it, "Causa latet, vis est notissima"—the cause is hidden, but the effect is notorious. Destroy the protective system and you destroy that which depends upon it. "You take my house when you take the prop that doth sustain my house; you take my life when you do take the means whereby I live."

But let us turn and scan the results which should approve or condemn the protective system. It is familiar to us all that when the fathers were seeking to determine what the economic policy of the Government should be, then, as to-day, free trade and protection, as a distinct system, were struggling for supremacy. With reference to the protracted contest, I assert that if there was reason at any time during the history of this Republic which justified the levying of a duty for protection, so long as that reason exists so long is the system itself defensible. That is logical and the soundness of the proposition will not be questioned.

Can any intelligent mortal entertain a doubt that a protective tariff was indispensable to the establishment and growth of our industries and the development of the resources of the nation in all that was essential to the freedom, independence, prosperity, and the happiness of our people? If there is a doubter in the face of the testimony and experience of the fathers, supplemented by our own, he suffers from a weakness that is congenital, and no argument submitted here can influence his action.

Stating the proposition in another form, let me assert that which can not be gainsaid: that if for reasons sufficient in the early history of the Republic a protective policy was judicious and humane the same system must be equally wise, just, and humane to-day if the reasons still obtain which approved it a century ago. There is no escape from this. If our fathers, for good reason, found it necessary, as confessedly they did, during the earlier period of the existence of the Republic, to invoke the aid and shield of the protective system, unless the reason no longer exists, the system which rests upon that reason, or upon the same or like conditions, should still be maintained.

I shall have occasion to print, for I will not have time to read them, the opinions expressed by men of all parties as to the indispensable necessity of a protective tariff in the early history of our Government. I shall refer to, though the time will not permit me to quote at length, what those whom we are accustomed to account wise in their day and generation have said upon this subject, and the reasons they gave for the faith that was in them. I shall insert in my printed remarks the testimony they bore, but will not have time to read them to the House.

Now let me recur to the conditions which gave rise to this system of protection, not because it is essential to the argument addressed to you, but because it may be useful to the larger audience I hope to reach outside of this Capitol.

Our fathers found our country possessed of abundance of material exhaustless in quantity, excellent in quality, and infinite in variety. Then, as now, even in our own markets, we had the world for competitors. In the face of competition then the young Republic lacked established plants, lacked the capital to establish them, was wanting in skilled workmen. They found also that American freemen must enter the field as competitors of toilers on the other side, the result of whose efforts barely enabled them to exist.

At that time, in the midst of hard lines, this latter factor in the problem (I refer to wages), which has become since the controlling one, was not so thoroughly considered; not because our ancestors were less humane or less considerate of the rights and claims of the skilled artisans, mechanics, and workmen of their own country, but the question itself was not so important and controlling then as now. The wage was the smaller factor in the problem of competition then; it is the largest and the controlling factor in the economic problem to-day.

But against the hard conditions I have mentioned the young nation entered the lists to compete for the poor favor of selling in our own markets and to our own people. Men then, as now, would exercise their right to buy where they could cheapest and sell where they could realize the largest price. There is no sentiment in trade. We will buy an English or a German coat for $10 in preference to paying $12 or $15 to our own countrymen for the same article, though our industries perish. Buying and selling is not matter of sentiment, but matter of business.

It was clear that the result must be that if the Old World, with its countless laborers, with its established plants and boundless resources in capital, its skilled and cunning workmen, could enter the markets of the United States without the restraint of a duty imposed to regulate trade, our people would be unable to compete with the producers on the other side, even in our home market. That this was so, and is so to-day, is too clear to need argument. It was the experience of the United States immediately after the war of 1812, when England flooded our markets with goods of every kind, and to such an extent and at such low prices that the mills, shops, and factories upon this side stood idle. In the presence of such competition it could not be otherwise.

The necessity for providing against the baneful influence of this competition which paralyzed our industries, and at last tended to impoverish and humiliate our workmen, and left us helpless and prostrate in the field of industrial effort, was apparent to the men of that day who controlled the affairs of this nation. It was then that Mr. Calhoun, the representative of South Carolina, appeared upon this floor as the earnest and able champion of the protective system. He found the agricultural interests of his own State suffering in competition with India, and the fact was cited by a gentleman speaking of that competition, that it was in vain for our country to successfully grow cotton and weave cotton fabrics in competition with India where the raw material was 4 pence a pound and the wages of the laborer in weaving 4 pence a day.

It will be remembered that not many years prior to that time Whitney had invented the cotton-gin, and upon the other side the spinning-jenny and the power-loom had been given to the world by the genius of English operatives, and these agencies, going hand in hand, gave a new impetus to the growth of cotton, and under the influence of that new impetus all the Southern fields became white with the harvest.

Against the destructive influence of competition with India, Mr. Calhoun, standing in his place in the House of Representatives, advocated the imposition of a protective tariff; and a protective tariff was levied upon goods imported from the other side.

One item in that schedule levied a duty of 3 cents a pound on cotton, which was about 75 per cent. of the cost of its production by their Indian competitor.

I call the attention of my honorable friend from South Carolina, the worthy successor of Mr. Calhoun, to the language of the latter, when he stood as one of the foremost champions of the policy which his successors upon this floor so earnestly condemn and seek so eagerly to destroy.

Then Mr. Calhoun was not dealing with abstract philosophy, but was evolving a system for himself from existing conditions and facts, which refused to be ignored.

Speaking upon the tariff bill in 1816, Mr. Calhoun, deprecating the evils which would attend upon its defeat, said:

> When our manufactories are grown to a certain perfection, as they soon will be under the fostering care of the Government, we will no longer experience these evils. [Evils resulting from this unequal competition.] The farmer will find a ready market for his surplus, and what is of equal consequence, a certain and cheap supply of all his wants.

It is interesting to observe that South Carolina, which leads the van in opposition to the protective system, did not always adopt this view. As I have before said, her leading statesmen in 1816 recognized the importance of protecting, in a radical manner, the industries of South Carolina.

The few struggling cotton-mills of New England in the early part of this century found it cheaper to buy India cotton than to buy that produced in the Carolinas, and under the operation of that law which our friends upon the other side so constantly invoke—the right to buy where we can buy cheapest—the mill-owners of New England bought India cotton, and our merchants purchased India cotton fabrics.

There could hardly be a complaint in the Carolinas that they did not have cheap labor; but cheap as their labor was, the labor of India was still cheaper. The result was that New England merchantmen and English vessels brought from India cotton to supply New England mills and cotton goods to supply the American market. At that time certain Representatives from New England talked persuasively against an import duty, but placed their opposition on the ground of its injurious effects upon the India shipping interest, in which New England then employed forty ships. It was but a few years until our friends from south of the Potomac had gained and held the coign of vantage against the producers of cotton throughout the nations of the world, and strangely enough, after having first enjoyed the blessings of a protective system and in the midst of their own flourishing condition, turned to deny to the struggling industries of the other States the protection indispensable to their establishment and growth.

The cultivation of cotton becoming independent of all competition, the Southern statesmen turned from the championship of that industry to defend the peculiar system of labor employed in its prosecution, and from that day slavery and free trade established and maintained an offensive and defensive alliance and waged relentless war upon the protective policy. They were enabled to—as indeed they did in a large degree—dominate the country, and our economic policy oscillated between free trade and protection, and our industries had a desperate struggle for existence; and every spurt of success which came to them under the influence of war or newly-discovered gold mines was, by our free-trade friends, accounted to be the direct result of progress in the direction of free trade.

I am aware that it will be said that if conditions warranted a protective tariff in 1798 or 1816, it can not be made to appear that such conditions exist to-day, and, the reason ceasing, the rule should cease with it.

I challenge the correctness of the assertion that there has been such change in our condition as to render the protective system of to-day defenseless.

And now I desire to consider for a moment the changed conditions to the extent that there has been change, so as to determine whether in point of fact, admitting that a protective tariff was desirable in the early history of the Republic, it, on account of the alleged changed conditions, should be condemned to-day.

Without reviewing the history of our progress, we admit that we no longer are at the disadvantage of lacking established plants, nor do we lack capital; and it is but justice to my countrymen to say that as artisans, mechanics, and skilled workmen they are unsurpassed in the world. These three factors are eliminated from the industrial problem, but there remains still the fourth, the most important and controlling factor to-day; one that was inconsequential then. The plants are here, the capital is here, the skilled workmen are here, but the starvation wages are not here and in God's providence never will be here if the Republican party shall write the laws of the land. [Applause.]

The difference in wages at the beginning of the century was unimportant. The rates of duty were relatively higher than they are now. The difference in wages paid in the Old World and upon this side was not radically different at the organization of our Government, and for some years afterwards; nor would they have been different to-day if the economic policy which controlled for a term of years, and which is seeking to control in this House to-day, had continued to bear sway.

In the prosperity upon the other side, the wage-worker—the producer, if you please—was not permitted adequately to share.

In most of the countries there during the years that have elapsed, notwithstanding his larger contribution in producing results, his wages have not been materially advanced; and it is proper to say just here that he was not and is not yet a part and parcel of the government. He had not the political power to redress his wrongs and vindicate his rights. Revolution was his only remedy.

Now mark the difference. Under the beneficent influence of our Government, of which every citizen is a part, the progress made in industrial development attests the presence in the homes of the workmen of the land better conditions and influences that are ennobling and refining.

They find opportunity for increased comforts in the fact that the prices of things needful in life have been constantly reduced, while the rate of wages paid has been constantly advanced, mounting up 25, 50, 75, 100, and in many instances 300 per cent. above what it was when the economic philosophy of our Democratic friends held sway in the Government.

And, I repeat, capital, established plants, and skilled workmanship are not to-day the controlling factors in the industrial problem.

With us the paramount question is, shall those who contribute to our prosperity by their labor, the wage-workers, be remitted to the condition of those upon the other side of the water, or shall they continue to share, as now, in the profits resulting from a union of capital with labor in the field of productive effort?

Doubtless nine out of ten of the communications received by gentlemen upon this floor from their constituents protesting against the assault in the Mills bill upon the industries in which those constituents are employed, refer to the difference in cost of production between their shops, mills, or factories and the cost of similar articles imported from foreign countries as due to the increased wages paid in the United States. In the production of the greater part of the output of our manufacturing establishments labor contributes the larger share; such contribution ranging from 10 to over 99 per cent.

There are industries which employ many skilled workmen in which 40 cents' worth of material, after being manipulated by the skilled mechanic and passes from his hands a finished product, sells in the market for as much as $80. This is, of course, an exceptional case, but not so exceptional or extreme as many suppose. But I use it as an illustration, because it marks so palpably the point I wish to make touching the influence of foreign competition with our own skilled labor. The industry I referred to is the manufacture of the small screws and springs used in making watches.

In that industry upon the other side the wages paid range below 40 per cent. of what is paid the skilled mechanic in the United States engaged in the same employment.

It would hardly be claimed in the instance cited that a duty of 10, 20, 30, or 50 per cent. would correct the inequality between our home manufactures and their foreign competitors.

I have studied with care to ascertain the per cent. that labor contributes in the production of the articles supplied by our leading industries, and am satisfied that the difference which obtains between the per cent. apportioned to labor here is so much greater than that which is accorded to labor upon the other side that a carefully devised protective tariff is indispensable to the preservation of our industrial enterprises if the rights of workmen here are fairly considered and honestly provided for.

It is clear that we can not prevent employers in foreign countries from levying unjust and cruel exactions upon their employés. They may, if they will, coin money of the bone and muscle of those who labor for them; but we can provide against the destructive influence of such competition upon our own workmen by excluding foreign goods from our market, except upon terms which shall keep far from us the conditions which are the curse that rests upon the industrial classes of the Old World.

The various objections to the protective system urged by our friends upon the other side have been fully met by gentlemen who have preceded me. The proposition that the cost to the consumer in the United States is increased in exact proportion to the duty levied has been shown over and over again by my associates to be alike untrue in fact and absurd. There is still less justice and truth in claiming that the amount levied for the purpose of protection is so much taken from the consumer and placed in the pocket of the manufacturer.

If an article costs a dollar in Italy, and by reason of a higher rate of wages here it costs a dollar and twenty-five cents, and the expense of placing the Italian article upon our market is 5 cents, and the duty imposed by our Government is 20 cents, is it not something worse than folly to claim that that duty of 20 cents goes into the pocket of the manufacturer as profit? It does go directly into the pocket of the wage-worker, and represents the difference in compensation between the amount paid the workmen here and in Italy.

Does the protective duty increase the cost to the consumer? And if so, for how long? In the first instance the cost of an article may be temporarily increased. It is not always so, but that is the philosophy of the situation. Granting, for the sake of the argument, that the cost is temporarily increased, does the end justify the means? Is it exceptional to practice self-denial and rigid economy this year in order that prosperity may abound the next? Is it not the practice of every-day life when in hard lines to suffer inconvenience to-day to secure the better condition to-morrow? Following swiftly on the heels of this inconvenience of to-day we have, as compensation, permanently reduced prices and increased prosperity as lasting as the influence to which it is due.

The experience of this nation abundantly attests that the temporary disadvantage resulting from the self-denial practiced, and which is self-imposed, compared with the consequent advantage which is born of that self-denial, is absolutely inconsequential.

There has been during this debate an earnest endeavor to link the creation of trusts, syndicates, and combines to the protective policy and make it responsible for the existence of these ulcers upon the body-politic. They have no proper relation to each other, nor is either dependent upon the other.

No man upon this floor shall be before me in condemnation of these organizations. I do not hesitate for one moment to assert that the most serious menace to republican institutions in this country will be found in the power and influence of aggregated capital and the pretentious insolence of overgrown wealth. And I am not alone upon this floor in the conviction that unless they are speedily throttled they will have upon the throat of the Republic so firm a grip that nothing short of revolution will compel them to relax their hold. This is strong language, but I mean every word of it. I do not stand here to condemn as moral monsters the individuals engaged in these various enterprises or organizations, for I recognize the fact that there is a vast deal of human nature in utilizing opportunities and conditions to better one's condition, increase his wealth, and extend his influence; but they are none the less dangerous to the well-being of my country that the men interested therein are reputable citizens and have not violated the letter of the law of the land.

When the bill that deals with them comes before this House, if the committee having it in charge can muster courage to report it, I shall bear witness of no doubtful import as to our duty.

Recurring again to the influence of the industrial system we are building up, it was urged, in an earlier day, and latterly as well, that the growth of our manufacturing industries tended to dwarf the manhood of those employed in them. I dissent from that proposition. I speak now of my own country.

Let it be remembered that, with the growth of our industries the opportunities for increased convenience and comforts grow with equal pace. Let it not be forgotten that the men who work in the mills, factories, and shops are potent factors in this Government, and have a voice in declaring the law which regulates the conditions under which they labor. Their children go to school and become familiar with the duties and obligations of the citizen, and learn what the proper functions of the civil government are.

What is said as to the influence of certain employment may indeed apply to the condition of operatives upon the other side, but it can have no application to our own fellow-citizens.

The city of Cincinnati which, with my honored colleague, General BROWN, I have the honor to represent, is known to you as a hive of industry. One or two wards in my district have within their limits a greater number of skilled artisans and mechanics than can be found elsewhere in this country upon the same amount of territory. I challenge any State or city on earth to produce rarer mechanical skill or a more intelligent and prosperous people.

Mr. Chairman, these conditions are not evidenced alone in the skill and cunning shown in their several callings. It is shown in those adornments of mind and character which are inseparable from the prosperity and happiness that abound in their homes.

I will engage to go with you, Mr. Chairman, into any shop or factory in my district where the workmen I have alluded to are employed and select a man at random, and you will not find one who can not read the Constitution of his country in one or two languages, or who does not understand the rights it secures and the obligations it imposes. Go with him to his home. In that home you will find not merely the ordinary comforts and conveniences of life, but also the incontestible evidence of education and refinement. Books and music will be found there. The daughter of that household will be found not only equal to the discharge of the duties which pertain to housewifery, but taking her place at the piano she will discourse the rarest music from Wagner, Beethoven, and other masters in that science. Upon the walls you will find paintings which are the handiwork of members of that family. There will be found worthy example upon the part of the parents, and filial piety upon the part of the children.

One other thing you will find: that the head of that family and the boys who come after him are intelligent and earnest advocates of the protective system.

I am not willing to exchange scenes and conditions such as I have described for any that can be found where the philosophy of free trade bears sway and shapes the industrial policy of the people.

Sir, I need not cross the water for the purpose of pointing out the influence of the policy of free trade and all that appertains thereto, and that of the protective system. Our own country furnishes abundant evidence by which we can re ach a correct and just conclusion.

I propose, sir, in no invidious spirit, but in simple justice to the people I represent, and in justice to the people of this whole country, to present to the House and to them some comparisons as to the progress made in the several States in everything that goes to make up an enlightened and progressive civilization.

There are certain States which make relentless war upon the protective policy, and certain other States which as constantly defend it, and are seeking to defeat the wrecking policy proposed in the Mills bill.

Mr. Chairman, it has been plainly intimated time and again upon this floor that those employed in the mills, factories, and shops of the manufacturing States, and especially in New England, are in a measure robbed. That is not the language used, but is the logic of what is said. I propose to ascertain how far the facts sustain the assertion and find where the most conclusive evidence of prosperity and happiness is to be found.

I shall not stop to examine merely the manufacturing interests of the country, but will look into the condition of every industry and calling which has relation to the prosperity of the section where it is carried on.

Our friends upon the other side have appeared especially anxious in regard to per cent. of wages paid.

I hope I may be pardoned for occasionally referring to the "Buckeye" State, and certainly no gentleman upon this floor should feel less pride than I do in that Commonwealth.

We can say to the East and South, "We are your children; our parents brought with them to Ohio the characteristics of your people. If we have achieved a measure of success you can rejoice at it, for we are your children."

We turn to the West, and there we find the sons and daughters of Ohio, the brothers and sisters of our people. Our prosperity is but an evidence of the greatness and strength of the whole country.

I recur again to the matter of wages, and call attention of my friends upon the other side to the startling fact that the "Buckeye" State alone pays in wages to the workmen employed in the manufacturing industries prosecuted within her border $6,000,000 more than is paid to all the wage-workers employed in the thirteen States, Delaware, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Virginia. Yet these States have an aggregate population of nearly 15,000,000, while Ohio has a population of 3,193,000. A fact not less important is this: that while those States pay to those employed but $270 per capita, Ohio pays $333.

The following is the showing in detail of the total wages paid in the States named:

States.	Wages paid.	Population.
Delaware	$4,267,000	146,608
West Virginia	4,313,000	618,457
North Carolina	2,741,000	1,399,750
South Carolina	2,836,000	995,577
Georgia	5,266,000	1,546,180
Florida	1,271,000	269,493
Alabama	2,501,000	1,262,505
Mississippi	1,193,000	1,131,597
Louisiana	4,360,000	939,946
Texas	3,343,000	1,591,749
Tennessee	5,255,000	1,542,359
Kentucky	11,658,000	1,648,690
Virginia	7,425,000	1,512,565
Total	56,419,000	14,591,475
Ohio	62,104,000	3,198,062

Ohio, $333+ per capita of persons employed.

The thirteen States employ 223,707, mostly men; per capita $270 +.

I am aware that honorable gentlemen will answer, "But the States you mention are not manufacturing States." So it would seem from the showing, but whose fault is it that they are not manufacturing States? Can you give any good and sufficient reason why the iron has slept in your mountains undisturbed during the last century?

Why does your coal remain in the hills undug?

Why is it that the water in your rivers runs listlessly to the sea, bearing upon its bosom little commerce and turning no wheel of industry?

Is it our fault that the waters of the James, the Alabama, the Cumberland, and the Kentucky do not turn as many wheels of industry as the waters of the Connecticut and the Merrimac, and those which flow the rivers of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and the West? [Applause.]

Sir, it is not because nature has not been prodigal in giving to you all the resources in raw material essential to great industrial progress. The reason must be found in your adherence to that philosophy which is evolved from ideal conditions and hypothetical facts, and shuts its eyes to accomplished results.

Sir, the object-lessons I place before you to-day should be conclusive alike against your philosophy and your practice. [Applause.]

I call attention now to the cities of the Union where various industries are carried on, and also to the States as a whole, to ascertain the ratio of persons employed and the rate of wages paid per capita. Here is the exhibit.

The comparison is between several cities to which I now call attention:

CINCINNATI.

Population	256,000
Total number of persons employed in manufacturing industries	54,530
Males	39,000
Females	10,495
Youths	5,035
Total wages paid	$19,554,000.00
Per capita	$358.50

Ratio of population, 1 in every 4.

CHARLESTON.

Population	49,984
Total number of persons employed in manufacturing industries	2,146
Males	1,788
Females	130
Youths	228
Total wages paid	$669,000.00
Per capita	$311.03

Ratio of population, 1 in 23 employed.

LYNN, MASS.

Population
Total number employed	12,439
Males	8,891
Females	3,489
Youths	57
Total wages paid	$5,833,000.00
Per capita	$469.00

Ratio of employed to population, 1 out of every 2½.

LOWELL, MASS.

Population	59,475
Total number employed	20,039
Males	9,218
Females	9,503
Youths	1,318
Total wages paid	$5,907,000.00
Per capita	$294.20

Ratio of employed to population, a little over 1 in 3.

CHICAGO, ILL.

Population	503,000
Total number employed	79,414
Males	62,431
Females	12,185
Youths	4,798
Total wages paid	$34,653,462.00
Per capita	$436.30

Ratio of employed to population, 1 in 6.

ST. LOUIS, MO.

Population	351,000
Total number employed	41,825
Males	37,980
Females	4,761
Youths	3,084
Total wages paid	$17,743,532.00
Per capita	$424.45

Ratio of employed to population, 1 in 8.

BOSTON, MASS.

Population	363,000
Total number employed	59,213
Males	39,810
Females	18,150
Youths	1,253
Total wages paid	$24,024,000.00
Per capita	$421.75

Ratio of employed to population, 1 in 6.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Population	868,000
Total number employed	185,527
Males	113,025
Females	56,818
Youths	15,684
Total wages paid	$64,265,000.00
Per capita	$340.75

Ratio of employed to population, 1 in 4.

LAWRENCE, MASS.

Population	59,151
Total number of persons employed	16,719
Males	7,819
Females	7,988
Youths	902
Total wages paid	$5,549,000.00
Per capita	$331.75

Ratio of employed to population, every 2½.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.

Population	216,000
Total number of persons employed	8,894
Males	7,668
Females	1,226

Youths	552
Total wages paid	$3,718,000.00
Per capita	$391.00

Ratio of employed to population, 1 in 22.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Population	104,857
Total number of persons employed	22,891
Males	16,500
Females	5,125
Youths	1,716
Total wages paid	$9,464,110.00
Per capita	$413.50

Ratio of employed to population, 1 in 4.

RICHMOND, VA.

Population	63,600
Total number employed	13,047
Males	9,218
Females	2,872
Youths	1,957
Total wages paid	$3,206,456.00
Per capita	$214.00

Ratio of employed to population, 1 in 4½.

AUGUSTA, GA.

Population	21,891
Total number employed	1,680
Males	867
Females	511
Youths	302
Total wages paid	$448,825.00
Per capita	$267.75

Ratio of employed to population, 1 in every 13.

DUBUQUE, IOWA.

Population	22,254
Total number employed	2,903
Males	2,619
Females	292
Youths	92
Total wages paid	$1,339,730.00
Per capita	$461.50

Ratio of employed to population, 1 in every 7.

LOUISVILLE, KY.

Population	123,758
Total number of persons employed	17,448
Males	13,480
Females	2,829
Youths	1,139
Total wages paid	$5,835,545.00
Per capita	$334.55

Ratio of employed to population, 1 in every 7.

It will be observed that the ratio of women and youths in the cities in the States advocating the protective system is greater than in the free-trade States, showing a wider range of opportunity; but what is still more significant, the ratio of those employed to the whole population is still greater. For instance, Cincinnati employs 1 in every 4; Charleston, 1 in 23; Boston, 1 in 6; St. Louis, 1 in 8; Philadelphia, 1 in 4; New Orleans, 1 in 22; Lowell, Mass., more than 1 in 3; Richmond, Va., 1 in 4½.

Passing from the cities to the States, the showing is more palpable against our free-trade friends. The showing is as follows:

Compare Wisconsin with North Carolina:

NORTH CAROLINA.

Population	1,400,000
Product of manufactories	$20,095,000.00
Per capita	$14.00

WISCONSIN.

Population	1,315,000
Product of manufactories	$128,255,000.00
Per capita	$97.00

MISSOURI AND ILLINOIS.

Missouri:
Population	2,168,000
Product of manufactories	$165,386,000.00
Per capita	$73.00
Illinois:
Population	3,078,000
Product of manufactories	$414,865,000.00
Per capita	$131.00

VIRGINIA AND MICHIGAN.

Virginia:
Population	1,512,500
Product of manufactories	$51,781,000.00
Per capita	$34.00
Michigan:
Population	1,637,000
Product of manufactories	$150,715,000.00
Per capita	$92.00

OHIO AND GEORGIA.

Georgia:
Population	1,542,000
Product of factories	$36,440,000.00
Per capita	$23.00
Ohio:
Population	3,198,000
Product of manufactories	$348,298,000.00
Per capita	$108.00

NEW JERSEY AND MARYLAND.

Maryland:
Population	935,000
Product of factories	$106,800,000.00
Per capita	$114.00
New Jersey:
Population	1,131,000
Product of factories	$254,380,000.00
Per capita	$224.00

IOWA AND MISSISSIPPI.

Mississippi:
Population	1,132,000
Product of factories	$7,518,000.00
Per capita	$6.62
Iowa:
Population	1,625,000
Product of factories	$71,045,000.00
Per capita	$43.00

But to make the showing more complete, and, as you doubtless claim, and possibly with justice, to equalize matters, we will turn to agriculture; but, unfortunately for tariff-reform philosophy, the showing is no better. Take Ohio and Georgia:

OHIO.

Number employed in agriculture, in round number	357,500
Product of farms, exclusive of live-stock and farming implements	$156,777,000.00
Population	3,198,000
Per capita	$304.00

It is proper to add that there are 247,200 farms, which will indicate that there are employed as wage-workers or renters 150,300.

GEORGIA.

Population	1,542,180
Number employed in agriculture	402,400
Value of farm product, exclusive of live-stock and farm implements	$95,913,000
Per capita	$155.00

Take Missouri and Illinois:

ILLINOIS

Population	3,077,871
Number employed in agriculture	406,370
Value of product exclusive of live-stock and farm implements	$203,989,000.00
Per capita	$476.00

MISSOURI.

Population	2,168,380
Number employed in agriculture	355,300
Value of product of farms exclusive of live-stock and farming implements.	$95,913,000.00
Per capita	$270.00

Take Alabama and Wisconsin.

ALABAMA.

Population	1,262,505
Number engaged in agriculture	380,630
Value of farm products, exclusive of live-stock and farm implements	$56,873,000.00
Per capita	$142.00
Number of farms	135,964
Number of acres tilled	18,855,324

WISCONSIN.

Population	1,315,497
Number of persons engaged in agriculture	195,000
Value of product, exclusive of live-stock and farm implements	$72,780,000.00
Per capita	$870.00
Number of farms	134,222
Acres tilled	15,253,118

But possibly our free-trade philosophers can show better results in live-stock and farming implements and machinery. These are evidence of progressive development as they may appear ample or otherwise.

Here is the showing. Take Georgia and Michigan, the population of which is about the same.

GEORGIA.

Population	1,542,000
Value of farming implements and machinery	$5,317,000.00
Live-stock	26,000,000.00
Total value	31,317,000.00
Per capita	$20.00

MICHIGAN.

Population	1,637,000
Value of farming implements and machinery	$19,422,000.00
Live-stock	55,720,000.00
Total value	75,140,000.00
Per capita	$46.00

IOWA AND VIRGINIA.

Virginia:
Population	1,512,500
Value of farming implements and machinery	$5,495,000.00
Live-stock	25,953,000.00
Total value	31,448,000.00
Per capita	21.00
Iowa:
Population	1,624,615
Value of farming implements and machinery	$20,372,000.00
Live-stock	124,715,000.00
Total value	154,087,000.00
Per capita	94.00

NORTH CAROLINA AND WISCONSIN.

North Carolina:
Population	1,400,000

Among the very important artisans and mechanics and workmen in every well-ordered community are the carpenters and blacksmiths. Business activity with them indicates the presence of those comforts and conveniences which are inseparable from healthful progress. For the edification of our friends, in order to evolve all the philosophy possible from known facts and existing conditions, I present the work done in the several States by these useful members of the community. The showing in the several States is as follows:

Northern States.

State.	Product per capita.
	Carpentering.	Blacksmithing.
Kansas	$1.81	$0.82
Maine	.62	1.82
Illinois	1.92	.98
Michigan	1.07	.94
Minnesota	2.21	.98
Nebraska	2.14	.87
New Hampshire	2.47	1.37
New Jersey	3.53	1.07
New York	3.82	1.23
Ohio	1.51	.95
Pennsylvania	1.90	1.01
Vermont	.48	1.57
Wisconsin	1.13	.99
Connecticut	4.98	1.17
Indiana	1.01	.98
Iowa	1.40	.96

Anti-protection States.

States.	Product per capita.
	Carpentering.	Blacksmithing.
Alabama	$0.27	$0.18
Arkansas	.25	.26
Delaware	2.14	1.01
Florida	.33	.21
Georgia	.53	.31
Kentucky	.93	.67
Louisiana	.49	.36
Maryland	3.88	1.01
Mississippi	.15	.15
Missouri	2.32	.98
North Carolina	.16	.16

West Virginia	.34	.42

But let us search again for evidence that the influence of your philosophy has been beneficent in results.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that there is no higher or better evidence of an enlightened and progressive people than is found in the product of their inventive genius. Our fathers wisely provided for the encouragement of scientific research and progress in the mechanical arts, by giving to authors and inventors for a term of years the exclusive ownership of the new and useful products of their hands and brains. No other source has been more fruitful in valuable contributions to our present prosperous and happy condition. How has the seed sown where your philosophy has had the ascendancy borne fruit? Is it rich in authors or inventors? What is the grand total of results in these two fields of labor?

Again, I call the "Buckeye" State forward. Let her record disclose what the genius of her people has supplied to the national growth in the industrial arts. Here is the record for the fourteen years immediately preceding January 1, 1885: Number of improvements in the arts, etc., by Ohio, as evidenced by patents issued, 15,065. Now, place by Ohio's side Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia, fourteen sovereign States. Altogether, during the same period, they have contributed in new and useful inventions only 14,887.

What is the matter, gentlemen? Do not those who adopt your philosophy desire the better ways and happier conditions? Or does its presence stifle the genius of invention, even as it retards your progressive development in the fields of enterprise to which we have called attention?

But let us continue our search to find some justification for your abiding in the faith which is so palpably condemned by the works which are the evidence of its influence. Possibly in the field of literature and journalism you will fare better. We shall see.

Mr. Chairman, if it will not be deemed utterly immodest, I will call Ohio forward again, bringing with her Illinois, a younger sister, and they together shall show you what they have done in the direction of distributing intelligence among the people. The comparison is instructive, and may in part, at least, explain why Ohio and Illinois have stood by the protective system, and why the States with which they stand in comparison have opposed it.

Under the caption "Number of newspapers mailed to subscribers or news agents by publishers and news agents" we have the following exhibit:

Alabama	4,037,332
Arkansas	3,606,356
Delaware	1,141,348
Florida	1,141,452
Georgia	15,355,288
Kentucky	17,443,296
Louisiana	6,645,152
Maryland	9,670,232
Mississippi	3,334,604
North Carolina	6,275,372
South Carolina	4,376,480
Tennessee	12,620,712
Texas	12,095,756
Missouri	45,128,784
Virginia	8,639,384
West Virginia	3,762,980
Total of the sixteen free-trade States	156,263,516

Now Ohio and Illinois:

Ohio	72,125,560
Illinois	87,128,444
Total	159,254,004

Showing difference in favor of these two protection States, Ohio and Illinois, of 3,050,488.

But peradventure publications of a higher order, which evidence more recondite learning and philosophical research, have flourished better. Let us examine.

Under the classification "Number of magazines and other periodicals mailed to subscribers or news agents by publishers and news agents" we have the following exhibit.

Ohio is so closely identified with all the other States, being bound to them by all the ties of consanguinity and common interest, that I feel that with characteristic reserve she may stand up again for comparison.

Here is the showing:

Alabama	26,709	South Carolina	8,820
Arkansas	23,352	Tennessee	553,008
Delaware	19,260	Texas	21,818
Florida	420	Virginia	361,056
Georgia	651,336	West Virginia	6,948
Kentucky	100,656	Total number	3,890,352
Louisiana	24,888	Total number issued in Ohio	6,498,216
Maryland	193,512	Difference in favor of Ohio	2,607,864
Mississippi	1,932
Missouri	1,865,784
North Carolina	20,864

It is written, "Show me thy faith without thy works and I will show thee my faith by my works." I have presented to you and to the country the works which are evidence of your faith, being born of it; and have likewise testified to our faith, proving it by the works we have shown. "By their fruits ye shall know them." You walk in the letter of your faith; we in the spirit of ours. "Verily the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life." [Applause.]

I was interested to hear my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] talk about sheep. He seemed to derive great satisfaction from the number of sheep he found to the square mile in the countries of the Old World.

It is a peculiarity of his philosophy that it takes more satisfaction in the condition of the sheep than in the prosperity of the shepherd. His concern is about the sheep, ours about the shepherd that tends the sheep. [Laughter and applause.]

In the nations that challenge his special admiration the sheep wear the fine coats. Here it is our purpose to clothe the shepherd, if need be, at the expense of the sheep. But protective philosophy cares for the flock-tender, and, per consequence of that, for the flock.

The statement, however, shows that the progress made here under the influence of the Democratic system does not compare favorably with the later period when Republican policy maintained the ascendency. Let us see.

The increase of wool under the tariff compared to increase during the preceding years:

Between 1850 and 1860 increase 14.7 per cent.
Between 1860 and 1870 increase 66 per cent.
Between 1860 and 1880 increase 147 per cent.

Nor is this increase in aggregate pounds of wool alone to be considered, but the further fact that the weight of fleeces increased as follows:

In 1850 average 2.3 pounds.
In 1860 average 2.7 pounds.
In 1870 average 3.5 pounds.
In 1880 average 4.4 pounds.

And the showing is equally satisfactory in regard to the development of woolen manufactures. Here is the exhibit:

	1850.	1860.	1870.
Establishments	1,817	1,260	2,891
Hands	34,895	28,050	80,053
Capital	$26,671,000	$30,862,000	$98,824,000
Wages	7,168,000	9,808,000	26,778,000
Materials	24,912,000	36,587,000	96,433,000
Product	43,542,000	61,895,000	155,405,000

A showing that should set at rest the clamorous cry that from 1850 to 1860 were the years of our country's greatest prosperity.

Now I turn to the pig-iron industry, and I apologize for seeming, for a single moment, to usurp the throne of my honored friend from Pennsylvania [Mr KELLEY].

From 1810, when the yield was 54,000 tons, to 1860—fifty years, during which time you were endeavoring to put your hands upon the throat of the protective system, and had it there most of the time—the product grew only to 821,000 tons. While from 1860 to 1880—only twenty-five years—it grew to 3,855,000 tons.

One would naturally suppose from the assaults made upon the protective policy that its influence had been to restrict our commerce, international and interstate; that our exports and our imports had fallen off, and that domestic interchange of commodities was oppressed and dwarfed. The exact reverse is true. They have both grown with unexampled rapidity.

In the period of pronounced protectien, dating from a time when the system was recoguized and established as an economic policy to be maintained, our exports and imports have grown beyond anything of which the country had knowledge before, except that our exports of specie have been reduced, and that because we have paid our debts abroad with the products of our factories and fields, keeping the gold and silver in the pockets of our people.

This is true of our foreign commerce and true of our local and interstate commerce. Gentlemen speak of the necessity for free interchange of products—that our protective system has impaired that freedom. This was uttered time and again by my honored friend, Mr. Wheeler, of New York, in our discussion in Tremont Temple, in Boston—opening his eyes to what would result from his abstract philosophy and closing them to the real facts that were under his nose; the real fact being that never in the history of the world was there such unrestricted and such enlarged commerce; never were there so many articles which were the subject-matter of commerce, nor so many instrumentalities and agencies for their free interchange as are to be found in the United States to-day as the result of the protective system.

And I say "as the result of the protective system" because the figures show that I am right and that under the old quasi free-trade regime progressive development was handicapped, and, when not paralyzed, moved at a sluggish pace.

I here insert the figures which vindicate the correctness of my assertions and utterly discredit the statements of my friends upon the other side to the effect that we are a suffering people by reason of the system that they are attempting to destroy.

The House and the country will observe that from the foundation of our Government up to and after the passage of what was known as the "Statute of Abominations," which was a distinctly protective tariff as contradistinguished from a tariff for revenue, the balance of trade, in spite of the best efforts of the producers of this country, was against us until 1836, when the balance was in our favor some sixty-two millions; but it will be observed also that Democracy made all possible haste to again turn the tide in favor of foreign nations, so that on down to 1860 the balance was against us. We neither had a great home market nor did we supply the wants of our people as now; but after Republican ascendency in the nation and the overthrow of free-trade philosophy prosperity came back to us in every shape and in every form which could suggest civilized and enlightened development.

In 1860 our exports were, in round numbers, $335,000,000, and our imports but $373,000,000.

From 1860 to 1870, notwithstanding the great war which occupied half the decade, our exports had grown to $420,000,000, the imports being $432,000,000.

And in 1880 our exports were $841,000,000 and imports $741,000,000; excess of imports $100,000,000.

A more important and controlling fact in this connection is that both the supply and the home market of the United States had been more than doubled during this period, nominally twenty years; in fact, considering the war, fifteen years.

The per capita of exports and imports for 1860 and 1880 is as follows:

		Per capita.
1860.	Imports	$1.00
	Exports	1.11
1880.	Imports	1.67
	Exports	1.66

It is interesting in the presence of the showing submitted to this House, which so utterly condemns the philosophy of the Mills bill and so eloquently pleads the cause of the protective system, to hear my honored friend from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] felicitate himself on the fact that the column he leads is moving forward, lance in rest, to put to route the hosts of protection.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad there is some evidence on that side of the House of a forward movement. The statistics I have submitted do not indicate anything of that character.

I have no fear, however, that our adversaries will make substantial progress, but if they do, be assured it will be amid ruined industries and a bankrupt and idle populace.

My friend said, cheerfully, "We shall go forward. The people are behind us." If he alludes to the people of the sixteen States in which he musters his free-trade army, I agree to the correctness of the statement; and speaking of them, I too can say, "The people are behind us, from fifty to seventy-five years." [Laughter and applause.] And I may add that I shall rejoice if, under some happy influence, they shall come up abreast of us, so that we can march forward together to glorious industrial achievement, as suggested by my honored friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

And, Mr. Chairman, I have the sincerest pleasure in showing to my friends from south of the Ohio that the influence of the protective system, pushing aside their philosophy, has demonstrated to them and to the world what is possible with them under the economic policy they would destroy.

Let me show you what you have accomplished since 1880. Let me point you to the gigantic growth which you would retard and the prosperity you would destroy.

Here is the comparison between 1880 and 1888 of the progress made in the Southern States:

		1880.	1888.
Miles of railroad		19,431	30,738
Bales of cotton		5,755,359	6,800,000
Grain	bushels	431,074,630	*626,305,000
Farm animals		28,754,243	44,850,972
Value of live-stock		$391,312,254	$573,666,550
Value of agricultural products		$571,098,454	*$742,066,400
Pig-iron	tons	397,301	*929,435
Coal	tons mined	6,049,471	*16,476,785
Number of cotton-mills		179	294
Number of spindles		713,989	1,456,145
Looms		15,222	34,000
Value of cotton goods		$21,000,000	*$43,000,000

*1887.

Gentlemen, is there a period in your history when you made a better showing? Is there an economic policy under which you made more substantial progress? The record discloses that there is not. One gentleman upon the other side, speaking of the progress made in industrial development in certain portions of the West and South, said to New England: "It may not be long until you will be crying for protection against the competition of the great West and South." I say to my friend, he need not be apprehensive on that score. If he will study carefully the history of his country's development and the philosophy it teaches, he will find that under our Government, situated as we are with relation to each other, one section of this country has not, and never will suffer by reason of the development of the resources, and the utilization of opportunity by another section. If it were so, and the danger to which he calls the attention of New England was even possible, long since the industries of New England and the States east of the Alleghanies would have been paralyzed, their factories and mills idle, and the home deserted.

Why, sir, it was only about thirty years ago that the two young States of the West, Ohio and Illinois, entered the arena as active competitors of the old States of the East. They sprang, however, at one bound into the lists, and in 1880 the two States mentioned, Ohio and Illinois, put upon the market a greater amount in value of manufactured product than all the New England States and New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware included did in 1850. It is proper to add that the other States of the West, together with Kentucky, Missouri, Tennessee, were developing with marvelous rapidity and pouring a vast volume into the reservoir of supply.

But notwithstanding all this New England, New York, Pennsylvania and the other States mentioned pursued the even tenor of their way every one of them enjoying unexampled prosperity in the field of productive effort. And they have in no wise complained of injury sustained by reason of Western competition.

You ask, "What becomes of this vast supply?" I call my friend's attention to the fact that the American citizen lives better than he did; has from 100 to 300 per cent. more of the necessities, comforts, conveniences, and luxuries of life.

I have but a moment to refer to the relation of capital and labor, and can only say in that brief moment that the trouble results largely from the oft-recurring necessity for a redistribution of labor, owing to the fact that from abroad several hundred thousand persons annually find their way into the ranks of labor in the United States; sometimes they come as contract laborers. It is clear that no other nation upon earth could admit such an army to the ranks of its wage workers without bringing on not only temporary disturbance, but riot and possibly revolution. So we have the peculiar spectacle of prohibiting the importation of the product of cheap labor while admitting without restraint or limit the cheap labor itself.

But, sir, our country will find no advantage in shutting the door against any person who brings with him good moral character and habits of industry. He becomes at once a source of wealth and strength. But against those who represent merely a combination of stomach, appetite, alimentary canal, and bad morals it is the duty of Congress to shut the door.

So, now, I submit the question to this House and to my countrymen whether the protective system as advocated by this side of the House should be sustained. You have arraigned against it the Representatives from sixteen States, who advocate the destruction of the system and ask to be placed in charge of your industries and to dictate your economic policy.

I ask whether, in view of the ability they display in developing their own resources and founding and encouraging manufacturing, they are well fitted to perform the office of guardian of those interests which are vital to you. Take away or withdraw from the support of the Mills bill the vote of those States that make the showing alike of indisposition and incapacity to either found or encourage industry of any character, and there will not be left enough votes in favor of the bill to pay for counting them.

I can not close without complimenting the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] for standing up almost alone in the midst of his brethren to defend the interests of Pennsylvania and the whole country, and I want to pay at the same time a tribute due to my honored colleague [Mr. FORAN] and my friend from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO], and some other Irish-Americans, who while in the Democratic ranks (where they have no business to be) refuse to become the allies and servants of English manufacturers in doing for the United States what England has done for the island where sleep the bones of their ancestors.

If there is any one man beneath our flag who has less excuse than another for voting the Democratic ticket it is the Irish-American.

A few years ago I read in the London Times these words, in speaking of the Irish people: "The only time that England can use the Celt is when he emigrates to America and votes for free trade" [laughter and applause], which, I may add, he has been accustomed to do, in that he has voted the Democratic ticket. But I trust that day has passed, and that Irish-Americans will not, while striking English power down with one hand, uphold it with the other.

One word and I have done. In instituting the comparisons between the different States of this Union, no gentleman upon the other side can fairly or truthfully say that my course is prompted by any possible spirit of sectionalism.

I shall be glad when every State south of the Ohio and the Potomac shall give evidence of the material prosperity which blesses the State that gave me birth. That patriotism is indeed narrow which fails to rejoice in the prosperity of the whole country.

And I say to my honored friends from the Southern States, the time is fast coming, and indeed now is, when the iron in your mountains shall awake, and, throwing off its earthy shroudings, shall find its way to the furnaces and mills, to the haunts of trade and commerce, and the fields and shops of industry, and the prosperity which your philosophy has kept far from you, will, under a different system, come to bless you beyond your fondest dreams. God speed the day! [Long-continued applause.]

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota, during the delivery of Mr. BUTTERWORTH's remarks, said: I know how embarrassing it is for any gentleman to speak on a subject like this when he is restricted as to time, and with the permission of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] I will ask unanimous consent for an understanding now that his time shall be extended until the conclusion of his remarks, without reference to the expiration of the hour.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. No, I do not ask that privilege. I recognize the courtesy of my honorable friend from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON], but it would not be just for me to avail myself of such an extension, as there are so many gentlemen here interested in all these matters who wish to give expression to their views and those of their constituents.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH then resumed and concluded his remarks as already given.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. After consultation among members of the committee I ask, Mr. Chairman—I presume it is not necessary to move that the Committee of the Whole rise for the purpose of making this order—that on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of this week, for the purpose of continuing the debate on this question the sessions of the House begin at 10 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. That order can not be made in Committee of the Whole, but the gentleman can give notice of his intention to ask such an order in the House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. For the purpose of asking that such an order be made, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. HATCH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the tariff bill had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask that on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of this week the House meet at 10 o'clock instead of 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the order requested by the gentleman from Kentucky, that on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of this week the House meet at 10 o'clock instead of 11 o'clock, will be made. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

TARIFF.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I now move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of revenue measures.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the tariff bill.

[Mr. BUCKALEW withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I confess that I am a believer in the principle of protection to our industries; and that, notwithstanding the doctrine has been so frequently denounced during the discussion of the bill under consideration, as a system of "legalized robbery," I believe it to be the true policy of every nation and every people to develop their own resources, to encourage and maintain their own industries, and thereby establish their independence, as far as possible, of other nations. This was certainly the opinion of the fathers who established our republican form of government. And accordingly, in the adoption of the Constitution the power to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, was conferred upon Congress. And one of the first acts of Congress under the Constitution was "An act for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States," the preamble of which reads as follows:

Whereas it is necessary for the support of Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandises: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc.

And this act was approved by George Washington on the 4th day of July, 1789.

Washington also declared in one of his messages that—the safety and interest of the people require that they should promote such manufactures as tend to render them independent of others for essential, particularly for military, supplies.

Benjamin Franklin said:

It seems the interest of all our farmers and owners of land to encourage our young manufacturers in preference to foreign ones.

Alexander Hamilton, in a report to Congress, said:

That the independence and security of a country appear to be materially connected with the prosperity of manufactures.

Andrew Jackson declared:

That we should become a little more Americanized, and instead of feeding the paupers and laborers of England feed our own.

And how can this be done, if not by protecting the products of American labor against the products of the pauper labor of England and other countries, by tariff laws? That is certainly what Jackson meant. He favored the encouragement of manufacturers and wanted them placed by the side of the agriculturists.

Daniel Webster said—

That the protection of American as against foreign labor ought never to be surrendered or compromised in any degree.

I might multiply these quotations from Clay and Lincoln and Grant and other eminent men of the country who believed in the encouragement of home industries, and in the beneficent effects of protective duties on the products of labor in other countries, imported here to compete with the labor of our own land. And yet speech after speech has been made here since this discussion began in which it has been asserted that the tariff is a "robber tariff." That the system adopted by the founders of the Government and pursued in all our history as the best mode of raising revenue, is a system of "legalized robbery." We have been told that for every dollar collected in the way of duties, which goes into the Treasury, $4 go into the pockets of the manufacturer, taken out of the pockets of the people, and that without any benefit to labor or to the wage-worker. And if gentlemen who make these assertions can prove them to be true, then I for one will not only vote to reduce duties on imports, but I will vote to abolish them altogether. But is it true, Mr. Chairman, that the consumer of an article upon which a duty is levied and collected, pays the same, whether the article is imported or is manufactured in the country?

In other words, is the effect of our tariff laws to raise the price to all consumers of all articles imported and subject to duty by precisely the sum paid for such duties, as stated by the President in his message of December 6? I answer, Mr. Chairman, that in my opinion that depends upon whether we produce the dutiable article in our own country in sufficient quantity to supply the home demand or not. If we do, then whatever is imported only adds to an already sufficient supply to meet the wants of the country, and the natural effect, it seems to me, must be to reduce rather than increase the price of the article. If we do not produce the article at all in the country, then I should think the amount of the duty would be added to the price until, at least, we do produce the article in such quantity as to compete with the imported article. If we do not produce a sufficient supply of an article to meet the wants of the country the duty may add more or less to the cost, according to the supply and demand.

To illustrate, we manufacture, I believe, a sufficient supply of lumber to meet the demands of the home market, and even export lumber in some forms; that is, we produce more than a sufficient supply of lumber to meet the wants of our people, and have imposed an import duty of from one to two dollars per thousand feet, board measure, on lumber brought into the country. Now, I can not believe that the imposition of that duty is added to the price of lumber consumed in the country, and that every man who purchases lumber is compelled to pay just that much more for it on account of the duty. On the contrary, Mr. Chairman, whatever lumber is imported adds to an already sufficient, and more than sufficient, supply to meet the demands of the home market, and the effect, it seems to me, is to reduce and not increase the price. I know it can be said that but for the duty the importer of lumber could sell for that much less, and then by competition the home manufacturer would be compelled to sell at reduced prices. But would the importer, if the duty was taken off, sell for that much less? Sellers are not anxious to reduce the price of articles they wish to sell. It is those who are consumers and purchasers of articles who desire lower prices. Hence the importer of lumber, if the duty was taken off, would still sell for all he could get, and the price of lumber would be but very little, if any, reduced, as I am inclined to believe.

Take wheat as another illustration. Under the present tariff there is a duty of 20 cents on every bushel of wheat imported, and a small quantity of wheat is imported every year, and much more would be, perhaps, but for the duty, and the fact, it seems, that wheat under a "Treasury regulation" can be ground in transit at Minneapolis. But the duty does not add 20 cents when it is paid to the price of wheat, nor does it in fact add anything to the price. And why? Some say because the price of wheat is fixed in Liverpool, and because we export wheat. But is that the true reason? I answer, the true reason is that we produce more wheat than we need for consumption at home and have a surplus to export, and therefore every bushel imported but adds to that surplus, and the effect is to lower and not increase the price of wheat. And the importer pays the 20 cents duty, and not the man who consumes the wheat. And this I believe to be true of every other article produced in the country in sufficient quantities to supply the home demand.

If such articles are imported into the country and duties are levied and collected on them, the duty can not be added to the cost, because the supply of the home product is already equal to the demand, and the articles imported increase the supply, and therefore lessen rather than increase the price. If this is not true I confess I can not understand the reason why.

And now a few words, Mr. Chairman, as to the oft-repeated assertion that the price of the farmer's wheat is fixed in Liverpool, and that the price fixed in Liverpool governs the price of all that is sold and consumed in the United States. This statement has been made here on the floor of the House. It has been repeated in free-trade and "revenue-reform" papers throughout the country, and now farmers are beginning to repeat it themselves. But is it true? If it is I would like to know what power it is that sits enthroned in Liverpool and dictates to the people of the United States the price of wheat as the years go by. I confess I do not believe there is any such power there.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that England, having destroyed to a great extent her own agriculture in her ambition to control the manufactures and the commerce of the world, is largely dependent on other countries for her bread supply. She wants wheat—low-priced wheat—and must obtain it from the surplus of other countries, from the Black Sea, from India, from the United States, or any other part of the world where there is a surplus. But the price of wheat is not fixed in Liverpool, any more than it is in Chicago, Minneapolis, or Calcutta. The surplus it is said fixes the price, and that depends upon many conditions and circumstances. Good or bad crops help to fix the price of wheat, because the surplus depends upon them, and even the chinch-bug may have something to do with the surplus, and therefore with the price. Outside, therefore, of corners and combinations by speculators and grain gamblers, who manipulate the markets, or try to do so, in their own interest, the law of supply and demand fixes the price of wheat.

But it is said if the duty is not added to the cost of the article on which it is levied and collected, and does not increase prices, then there is no protection in it; and why not reduce the duty or remove it altogether? I reply that there may be protection in the duty, even if it does not increase prices. If there was no duty the importer or foreign manufacturer might put the price of the imported article so low as to drive the home manufacturer out of the market and into bankruptcy, and in that way turn our own people out of employment. Then, when that is accomplished, up goes the price of the imported article, for there is no home product to compete with it.

Mr. Chairman, I have said I believed in the principle of protection. Under our tariff laws, made necessary by the late war, we have so adjusted duties on imports as to encourage home products, give employment to labor, and develop the resources of the country. And while it is said here that our system of protection has enriched a few at the expense of the masses of the people, I do not believe the statement. I know that some manufacturers have got rich, and so some in every occupation and calling in life have got rich. I have no doubt but that some who began as factory hands, working by the day for wages, have by skill, industry, and economy become owners and operators of factories, while some who were the owners of factories have failed, and are now in poverty. I know a man who was carting dirt in the grading of a railroad in the county where I now live, thirty-odd years ago, for daily wages, and I have been told that he is now receiving a salary of $12,000 a year. I know a farmer residing in the county where I have my home, who began life in the county as a farm hand working for $13 a month, and to-day he owns all the land which his employer then owned and many thousands of acres besides, and is worth, it is said, more than a half million of dollars.

I only mention these instances to show that other people get rich as well as some manufacturers, but of course do not claim that the tariff had anything to do with their accumulations, only so far as it has given encouragement to home labor, diversified and built up the industries of the country, and thereby added to the advancement and general prosperity of the whole people. I deplore, Mr. Chairman, as much as any one can, the accumulation of large wealth in the hands of a few individuals. But Jay Gould and Vanderbilt, and many others who have accumulated mammoth fortunes, have not done so through tariff laws. Some inventors, protected and made monopolists by our patent laws, have amassed great fortunes; and so have some manufacturers made fortunes. But, Mr. Chairman, capital is necessary. No nation can be great without capital. You cannot open up mines, build factories and workshops, construct railroads, and carry on great and important enterprises without capital, which is said to be labor saved. Therefore it should not be a crime to accumulate capital. And I submit, if capital is to be accumulated, whether it is not better to have it in our own country rather than in England.

The policy of the Democratic party has been under low tariffs and revenue reform tariffs so called to enrich English manufacturers, to build up English capitalists, not American manufacturers and American capitalists. If it be true, as claimed, that the price of wheat is fixed in England, I believe the policy of the Democratic party has been to give England the power to control the commerce and markets of the world whether it was so intended or not. And she certainly under Democratic administrations controlled our markets from the time "cotton became king" and the South a great cotton-field for Great Britain.

I have read in revenue reform papers and speeches how the country prospered under the "revenue reform" tariff of 1846. I have some recollection, Mr. Chairman, of that period of our history, and the actual truth of history as to the period from 1846 to 1860 furnishes no consolation, in my opinion, to "revenue reformers" and low-tariff advocates.

It was contended then, as it is now, that farmers would be greatly benefited by low duties on imports; that it would increase the demand and raise the price of agricultural products in foreign markets. This same story is being told to the farmers of the country to-day.

Well, the tariff of 1846, "reducing the duties on imports," was passed, and in the annual message of President Polk, of December 7, 1847, he said:

During the past year the most gratifying proofs are presented that our country has been blessed with widespread and universal prosperity. There has been no period since the Government was founded when all the industrial pursuits of our people have been more successful, or when labor in all branches of business has received a fairer or better reward.

And then goes on to say:

The act of the 30th of July, 1846, "reducing the duties on imports," has been in force since the 1st of December last (1846), and I am gratified to state that all the beneficial effects which were anticipated from its operation have been fully realized. The public revenue derived from customs during the year ending on the 1st day of December, 1847, exceeds by more than $8,000,000 the amount received in the preceding year under the operation of the act of 1842, which was superseded and repealed by it.

Now there was a glowing picture presented to the country. But President Polk wholly overlooked the fact that during that year we were having a war with Mexico, and that many thousands of able-bodied men, laborers from the fields and the workshops, were enlisted as soldiers to fill up our regiments engaged in that war, and who became consumers of our farm products, not producers. And then a little while afterwards, when the war with Mexico was over and we had acquired California, there was a large number of people who went to that newly-acquired territory in search of gold, and for a time, at least, became consumers of farm products and ceased to be producers. All of which helped the farmers and the laborers who had remained at home. But, notwithstanding this, we were told by President Polk in his annual message of the very next year, December 5, 1848—and to this I invite special attention—that—

Severe commercial revulsions abroad have always heretofore operated to depress, and often to affect disastrously, almost every branch of American industry.

Of course, no free-trader could see how the eight millions of increased revenue, derived from reduced duties, but greatly increased importations, had anything to do with affecting disastrously almost every branch of American industry, and so President Polk takes consolation in saying, in the same message:

The temporary depression of a portion of our manufacturing interests is the effect of foreign causes, and is far less severe than has prevailed on all former similar occasions.

But the "temporary depression of a portion of our manufacturing interests" was a reality, and acknowledged by Mr. Polk to be so.

Now, let us come down a little later and see what President Fillmore, who succeeded Mr. Polk as President, said. In his first annual message, of December 2, 1850, he said to Congress:

I strongly recommend a modification of the present tariff, which has prostrated some of our most important and necessary manufactures, and that specific duties be imposed sufficient to raise the requisite revenue, and making such discrimination in favor of the industrial pursuits of our own country as to encourage home production, without excluding foreign competition.

It is also important that an unfortunate provision in the present tariff, which imposes a much higher duty upon the raw material that enters into our manufactures than upon the manufactured article should be remedied.

A duty laid upon an article which can not be produced in this country, such as tea and coffee, adds to the cost of the article, and is chiefly or wholly paid by the consumer.

But a duty laid upon an article which may be produced here stimulates the skill and industry of our country and to produce the same article, which is brought into the market in competition with the foreign article, and the importer is thus compelled to reduce his price to that at which the domestic article can be sold, thereby throwing a part of the duty upon the producer of the foreign article. The continuance of this process creates the skill and invites the capital which finally enables us to produce the article much cheaper than it could have been produced from abroad, thereby benefiting both the producer and the consumer at home. The consequence of this is the artisan and the agriculturist are brought together, each affords a ready market for the produce of the other, and the whole country becomes prosperous; and the ability to produce every necessary of life renders us independent in war as well as in peace.

In this message we find a recommendation for a modification of the revenue-reform tariff of 1846, which President Fillmore declared had prostrated some of the most important and necessary manufactures of the country. But the recommendation and the sound statesmanship of President Fillmore were disregarded, and in his next annual message of December 2, 1851, he said to Congress:

The values of our domestic exports for the last fiscal year exhibit an increase of $43,646,322. At first view, this condition of our trade with foreign nations would seem to present the most flattering hopes of its future prosperity.

An examination of the details of our exports, however, will show that the increased value of our exports for the last fiscal year is to be found in the high price of cotton which prevailed during the first half of that year, which has since declined about one-half.

The value of our exports of breadstuffs and provisions, which it was supposed the incentive of a low tariff and large importations from abroad would have greatly augmented, has fallen from $68,701,921 in 1847, to $26,051,373 in 1850, and to $21,848,653 in 1851, with a strong probability, amounting almost to a certainty, of a still further reduction in the current year.

The aggregate values of rice exported during the last fiscal year, as compared with the previous year, also exhibit a decrease amounting to $460,917, which, with a decline in the values of the exports of tobacco for the same period, make an aggregate decrease in these two articles of $1,156,751.

The policy which dictated a low rate of duties of foreign merchandise, it was thought by those who promoted and established it, would tend to benefit the farming population of this country by increasing the demand and raising the price of agricultural products in foreign markets.

The foregoing facts, however, seem to show incontestably that no such result has followed the adoption of this policy.

On the contrary, notwithstanding the repeal of the restrictive corn laws in England, the foreign demand for the products of the American farmer has steadily declined, since the short crops and consequent famine in a portion of Europe have been happily replaced by full crops and comparative abundance of food.

The exports of specie to liquidate our foreign debt during the past fiscal year have been $24,263,979 over the amount of specie imported.

The export of specie during the first quarter of the present fiscal year have been $14,651,827. Should specie continue to be exported at this rate for the remaining three-quarters of this year, it will drain from our metallic currency during the year ending 30th June, 1852, the enormous amount of $58,607,308.

Now, I invite the attention of not only members of the House, but the people of the entire country, and especially the farmers, to that part of President Fillmore's message just read. He was addressing Congress under the Constitution and his official oath as President, giving to Congress information as to the condition of the country, and he showed that the low tariff of 1846 had not augmented the value of our exports of breadstuffs and provisions, as was anticipated; but that such exports had declined from $68,701,981 in 1847, to $26,051,373 in 1850, and to $21,848,653 in 1851, with a strong probability, amounting almost to a certainty, of a still further reduction in the then current year. And he further said that the policy which dictated a low rate of duties on foreign merchandise, and which it was thought by those who promoted and established it would tend to benefit the farming population by increasing the demand and raising the price of agricultural products in foreign markets had not followed the adoption of such policy. And that notwithstanding the repeal of the restrictive corn laws in England and low tariff duties the foreign demand for the products of the American farmer had steadily declined since the short crops and consequent famine in Europe had been replaced by full crops and comparative abundance of food.

I also invite attention to what he said about the export of specie over the amount imported, and which was draining the country of an enormous amount of our metallic currency.

But let us pursue this subject further; and I now invite your attention to the following extract from President Fillmore's third annual message, delivered to Congress December 6, 1852.

In that message he said:

Without repeating the arguments contained in my former message in favor of discriminating protective duties, I deem it my duty to call your attention to one or two other considerations affecting this subject. The first is, the effect of large importations of foreign goods upon our currency. Most of the gold of California, as fast as it is coined, finds its way directly to Europe in payment of goods purchased. In the second place, as our manufacturing establishments are broken down by competition with foreigners, the capital invested in them is lost, thousands of honest and industrious citizens are thrown out of employment, and the farmer, to that extent, is deprived of a home market for the sale of his surplus produce. In the third place, the destruction of our manufactures leaves the foreigner without competition in our market, and he consequently raises the price of the article sent here for sale, as is now seen in the increased cost of iron imported from England. The prosperity and wealth of every nation must depend upon its productive industry.

The farmer is stimulated to exertion by finding a ready market for his surplus products, and benefited by being able to exchange them, without loss of time or expense of transportation, for the manufactures which his comfort or convenience requires.

This is always done to the best advantage where a portion of the community in which he lives is engaged in other pursuits.

But most manufactures require an amount of capital and a practical skill which can not be commanded unless they be protected for a time from ruinous competition from abroad. Hence the necessity of laying those duties upon imported goods which the Constitution authorizes for revenue in such a manner as to protect and encourage the labor of our own citizens. This policy would place the mechanic by the side of the farmer, create a mutual interchange of their respective commodities, and thus stimulate the industry of the whole country, and render us independent of foreign nations for the supplies required by the habits or necessities of the people.

And this shows how the "revenue-reform tariff" of 1846 was accomplishing its work in its effect upon the currency of the country, and in prostrating its industries.

Passing over the administration of Pierce, in which there was no change of policy, unless by a closer adherence to the doctrine of free trade, for in the third annual message of President Pierce, December 8, 1855, he seemed to think that the whole country had come over to the free-trade doctrine, and said in that message:

It is now generally conceded that the purpose of revenue alone can justify the imposition of duties on imports; that in readjusting the impost tables and schedules, which unquestionably require essential modification, a departure from the principles of the present tariff is not anticipated.

Oh, no! But while there was no change of policy it can be safely said, I think, that there was no change in the effect of the policy on the industries of the country. For in the first annual message of James Buchanan, December 8, 1857, he declared that, "in the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions of agriculture and in all the elements of national wealth," our manufactures were suspended, our public works were retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers were thrown out of employment and reduced to want.

But I will read from his message just what he said:

The earth has yielded her fruits abundantly, and has bountifully rewarded the toil of the husbandman. Our great staples have commanded high prices, and, up till within a brief period, our manufacturing, mineral, and mechanical occupations have largely partaken of the general prosperity. We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in rich abundance, and yet, notwithstanding all these advantages, our country, in its monetary interests, is at the present moment in a deplorable condition. In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions of agriculture and in all the elements of national wealth we find our manufactures suspended, our public work retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want.

The revenue of the Government, which is chiefly derived from duties on imports from abroad, has been greatly reduced, while the appropriations made by Congress at its last session for the current fiscal year are very large in amount.

Under these circumstances a loan may be required before the close of your present session; but this, although deeply to be regretted, would prove it to be a slight misfortune when compared with the suffering and distress prevailing among our people. With this the Government can not fail to deeply sympathize, though it may be without the power to afford relief.

A year later there seems to have been no change for the better; in fact, the condition of the country was getting worse and worse all the time. Hear what Buchanan said in his second annual message of December 6, 1858:

When Congress met in December last the business of the country had just been crushed by one of those periodical revulsions, which are the inevitable consequence of our unsound and extravagant system of bank credits and inflated currency.

With all the elements of national wealth in abundance, our manufactures were suspended, our useful public and private enterprises were arrested, and thousands of laborers were thrown out of employment and reduced to want. Universal distress prevailed among the commercial, manufacturing, and mechanical classes. Our manufacturers everywhere suffered severely, not because of the recent reduction of the tariff of duties on imports, but because there was no demand at any price for their productions. The people were obliged to restrict themselves in their purchases to articles of prime necessity.

In the general prostration of business the iron manufacturers in different States probably suffered more than any other class, and much destitution was the inevitable consequence among the great number of workmen who had been employed in this useful branch of industry. There could be no supply where there was no demand. The same consequences have resulted from similar causes to many other branches of useful manufactures. It is self-evident that where there is no ability to purchase manufactured articles, these can not be sold, and consequently must cease to be produced.

Now, what a picture we have in these extracts from the messages of Polk, Fillmore, and Buchanan of the condition of the country under low tariffs from 1847 to 1860, in which last year Mr. Buchanan says, in his annual message of December 9, 1860:

It is now quite evident that the financial necessities of the Government will require a modification of the tariff during your present session for the purpose of increasing the revenue. In this aspect I desire to reiterate the recommendation contained in my last two annual messages in favor of imposing specific instead of ad valorem duties on all imported articles to which these can properly be applied. From long observation and experience I am convinced that specific duties are necessary, both to protect the revenue and to secure to our manufacturing interests that amount of incidental encouragement which unavoidably results from a revenue tariff.

Now, here we have a period of say sixteen years of our history under a low tariff or tariff for revenue only, beginning in 1846 and ending in 1860, and I submit to gentlemen of the committee and to the country whether these extracts from the messages of Polk, Fillmore, and Buchanan do not show a deplorable condition of the country with slight intervals due to other causes during nearly all of that period of low tariff. Wars, such as the Crimean war from 1853 to 1855, and occasional failures of crops in Europe created a demand for breadstuffs and may have given better prices. And that reminds me, Mr. Chairman, that in the winter of 1845–'46 I was attending school in Iowa City, then the capital of the Territory of Iowa, and during the winter the Territorial Legislature was in session, and some of the distinguished citizens of the Territory, visiting the capitol during the session of the Legislature, and perhaps of the supreme court, organized the "Third House" and elected a gentleman by the name of Johnston, or Johnson, governor. I remember the beginning of his most witty and humorous inaugural address, although, after the lapse of so many years, I may not be able to use his language.

As I remember he began by thanking God for the good health and prosperity of the people (this was under the protective tariff, you know, of 1842); "that the toil of the husbandman had been richly rewarded by bountiful harvests and a failure of crops in Europe, and that henceforth it should be the duty of all good, patriotic American citizens to pray, not only that our own fields may be fruitful and yield abundant harvests, but that there shall also be a failure of crops in Europe."

And so, Mr. Chairman, it is, I believe, true that our exportations of farm products, and the prices obtained for them, depend too much upon disturbances of the peace in Europe, and upon a failure of their crops. It is far wiser and better, in my judgment, for the people of Europe so to regulate their industries as to supply their own necessities as far as they can; and I am sure it is better for the people of our own land to do the same.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that President Polk attributed the "temporary depression of a portion of our manufacturing interests," which he admitted prevailed in 1848, to "foreign causes," and, by way of apology, it would seem, for such depression, he suggested, as I have already quoted, that severe commercial convulsions abroad always operated to depress, and often disastrously, almost every branch of American industry; and, I may add, always will, except so far as we can maintain our industrial and business interests, independent of the people abroad.

But this depression of a portion of our manufacturing interests did not turn out to be temporary, after all. In fact it rather became chronic, with some slight intervals, and continued to grow worse until in 1858, when there was, according to Buchanan's message of that year, a "general prostration of business," and in December, 1860, when he delivered his last annual message, the national Treasury, and you may say the country generally, were about bankrupt. President Buchanan, of course, denied, while communicating the distressed condition of the country to Congress, that it was because of the then recent reduction of duties on imports. Oh, no! It was, he says, because there was no demand at any price for the productions of our manufacturers, who had everywhere suffered severely, as he said: "The people were obliged to restrict themselves in their purchases to articles of prime necessity," as Mr. Buchanan admitted, and why? I know he said the business of the country had been crushed by one of those periodical revulsions which was the inevitable consequence of our unsound and extravagant system of bank credits and inflated currency. But it does not require, it seems to me, a vast amount of intelligence to see that the cause began further back than the reduction of duties on imports in 1857, of which Mr. Buchanan spoke in his message of December, 1858. It was, Mr. Chairman, the earlier reduction under the tariff of 1846, which went into effect on the 1st of December, 1846, which was the primary cause. President Fillmore was wise enough to see the effect which the low duties under the tariff of 1846 was having upon the industries and upon the currency of the country.

I have quoted what he said upon the subject in his messages of 1851 and 1852. In the message of 1851 he informed Congress that $24,203,979 of specie had been exported during the preceding fiscal year over the amount of specie imported, to liquidate our foreign debt; and that during the first quarter of the then present fiscal year the exports of specie had been $14,651,887, and that if specie continued to be exported at the same rate for the remaining three-quarters of the fiscal year it would drain from our metallic currency during the year ending June 30, 1852, the enormous amount of $58,607,308. And in his message of 1852, the drain of our metallic currency continuing, President Fillmore again called the attention of Congress to the effect of large importations of foreign goods upon our currency, and said that most of the gold of California as soon as it was coined found its way directly to Europe in payment of goods purchased. But none are so blind as those who will not see, and the importation of foreign goods continued, as did the exportation of our specie to pay for them—the first to the prostration of our manufacturing interests and the second to the destruction of our currency.

We were sending our gold to Great Britain largely to enrich her and give her commercial and financial supremacy, and we were doing business on a worthless paper currency that had no sound basis on which to rest, and which collapsed in 1857 and left the industries and the business interests of every sort of our country completely prostrated.

From 1850 to 1860, inclusive, as I remember, we exported more than three hundred and fifty millions of specie to pay the balance of trade against us, most of which might have been far better employed at home in developing our own vast resources, in building up the manufacturing interests and the industries of our own country, and in establishing, by proper legislation, a sound and reliable currency. By doing that we would have given employment to our own people, and no such financial revulsion as that of 1857 could have occurred to have brought "universal distress upon the commercial, manufacturing, and mechanical classes of the people."

I have dwelt at some length upon this period of our history, from 1846 to 1860, to show that a tariff for revenue only brought no real prosperity to the country, and ended in a total collapse of all our industrial and business interests.

I have said I had some recollection of those days myself. I lived then in a section of country devoted almost exclusively to agriculture, and it was unsurpassed for that purpose by any other section of country I have ever known. I was very familiar with the farming population and with the farmer's life, for I worked on a farm until I was twenty-one years of age, and I know how poor the farmers of Illinois were during that period. The price of corn, wheat, pork, eggs, chickens, and butter, and everything they had to sell was extremely low, while the merchandise they had to buy was extremely high—so high that, as President Buchanan said, they were unable to pay for it, and consequently, as a rule, farmers were almost universally in debt. If I know anything in the world, it does seem to me that the farmers in Illinois, if not throughout the entire country, are infinitely in better condition to-day and have been from year to year during the twenty-five years or more we have been living under tariff laws, discriminating in favor of our own industries, than ever before in all our history.

There has been no twenty years in all our history when farmers have, in my opinion, got better prices for all the products of the farm than in the last twenty years under a system of protection, and at the same time everything they have to purchase can be purchased, not only cheaper than in any other twenty years, but what they purchase is of a finer and much superior quality to the coarser fabrics of twenty-five, thirty, and forty years ago.

Democrats say of the Republicans just as they used to say of the Whigs, when I was a boy, that the policy of the party is to make the "rich richer, and the poor poorer." But this I deny. Under the policy of the Republican party, which has been to develop the resources, encourage and build up the industries, and give employment to both the capital and labor of our own country, there has been a general lifting up of the masses of our people. Not only manufacturers, but farmers, merchants, professional men, mechanics, artisans, laborers, all classes of people, have been benefited, for the prosperity of one class is necessary to the prosperity of the other classes. And the people as a whole are occupying a higher plane to-day than they did before the policy of the Republican party was inaugurated of protecting our own industries and giving employment to our own people. And I assert what I believe to be absolutely true, that under that policy the laboring classes of our people have uniformly received a better reward for their labor, and have lived better and enjoyed more of the comforts and necessaries of life than they could possibly have done under any other policy.

It is not true, Mr. Chairman, that the policy of the Republican party is and has been to "make the rich richer and the poor poorer;" but it is true, I think, that the policy of the Democratic party has been to make the rich poor and the poor paupers. They came as near doing that from 1846 to 1860 under a low tariff as it was perhaps possible in such a magnificent country as ours to do. And now, after going through a great war, which cost thousands of millions of dollars, when the policy of the Republican party has enabled the Government to meet all its obligations, to advance the national credit to the highest standard, to pay all expenses of the Government, ordinary and extraordinary, to erect public buildings, to improve rivers and harbors, to pay the pensions and bounties due our soldiers, to pay the interest promptly on the public debt, and at the same time reduce the principal of the debt fourteen or fifteen hundred millions of dollars, Democrats and "revenue reformers" so called, are denouncing the policy as a system of "legalized robbery" because there is a surplus of a few millions of dollars in the Treasury. And while all that I have said has been done under the policy of the Republican party the material prosperity of the people has never been greater in all our history.

But a surplus in the Treasury is a great crime in the Republican party. And yet, Mr. Chairman, the present Administration kept on increasing the surplus instead of paying it out in liquidation of the public debt as it ought to have done. The Administration had just as much authority to do that three years ago as it has now. And it must not be forgotten that a resolution known as the Morrison resolution, for which I voted, passed Congress requiring the Administration to apply the surplus when excessive in payment of the public debt. This would have kept the surplus down to a reasonable amount. But the President pocketed the resolution; did not even return it to the House in which it originated with his objections to give Congress an opportunity to pass it over his veto, and went on piling up the surplus in the Treasury until it got so large that he seemed suddenly to get alarmed at its magnitude, so much so that he did not take time to write the ordinary message communicating to Congress the state of the country generally, but confined his message almost entirely to a reduction of the surplus by a reduction of customs duties.

Well, no one in my judgment ought to be much alarmed at a surplus of even eighty millions in the Treasury, if it is that much, if those who have it in charge would only go on and pay it out in reducing the public debt, especially when the interest-bearing debt of the country exceeds to-day a thousand millions of dollars. I, for one, am not. Mr. Chairman, I am anxious to see the public debt extinguished to the last dollar, and at the earliest day when it can reasonably be paid off. I desire to see the day when that class so often spoken of as "bloated bondholders"—men who pay no taxes—shall be no more. And so, Mr. Chairman, as one of my constituents recently wrote to me, if we would go to work and pay off the public debt and talk less about the surplus it would be better for the country.

But I must not be understood as being opposed to a just revision of the tariff. I am not. But if you come at me in opposition to the principle of protection, I take issue with you; and I undertake to show from the actual experience of the country under low tariffs and revenue tariffs, and under protective tariffs, that our greatest prosperity has been achieved under protective tariffs.

But whether duties on imports are burdens upon the people or benefits, I believe they should be adjusted in such manner as to distribute them as equally as possible among the different branches of industry, and the different classes of the people and sections of the country, so as not to build up one at the expense of another.

Acting upon this principle, why should wool be placed on the free-list and a duty retained on woolens? It does seem that wool is an indispensable necessity in the manufacture of woolen goods, just as much so as the capital which builds the factory and the laborers who spin and weave the wool into cloth, and if there is any benefit in the incidental protection given by the duty, why should not the man who feeds his flocks share in it as well as the manufacturer who spins and weaves his wool into cloth? If the manufacturer is allowed a duty because he must compete with the cheaper manufactures of woolens imported from other countries, why should not the producer of wool be allowed a duty to give him some protection against the cheaper wool imported from other countries? But why should wool be put on the free-list any more than coal and rice and sugar? I confess I am unable to see any good reason why. Nor can I see any good reason why salt, any more than sugar, should be placed on the free-list.

But I confess I am not, for the reasons stated, very partial to the free-list. If duties are burdens, let them be borne as equally as possible; if they are benefits, let them be shared as equally as possible by the people generally. But I confess I have been confused and perplexed by the free-wool proposition. Woolen goods are a necessity, and we must have wool to manufacture them. The industry ought, in my judgment, to be maintained. We ought to be able to supply the demand for raw wool in our own country, and it seems to me to be clearly established, even by revenue reformers themselves, that we have cheaper wool under high tariff duties than we do under low duties. And if that be so, and manufacturers want cheap wool to make for the farmers cheap woolens, and to be able to manufacture woolens so as to compete with other countries, what is the objection to high duties? I have cut out of revenue-reform papers, so called, published in my own district, tables of prices from 1824 down to 1887, showing that the lowest prices of wool have been under high tariffs and the highest prices under low tariffs.

And this reminds me that some four years since a Democratic anti-protection paper, published in my own district, published an interview with some woolen manufacturer, in which interview the manufacturer was asked what would be the effect of putting wool on the free-list. He replied in substance that it would enable woolen manufacturers to compete with the world, and right at once went on to say that it was strange the wool-producers of Ohio, Illinois, and Texas did not see that the effect of the duty on wool was to stimulate the raising of sheep and reduce the price of wool; and I certainly wondered, if cheap wool was what he wanted, why he objected to the duty. I have before me now an extract from the Philadelphia Record of January 7, 1888, on this subject of a duty on wool, from which it appears that there was a decline in the price of every grade of wool for several years after the heavy duty of 1867 on wool was imposed, and the Record says in this article—

That the low prices of "protected" wool have driven the sheep industry to the cheap lands of the sparsely settled States and Territories.

Now, this would seem to show that protection on wool had resulted in low prices of wool, and as woolen manufacturers would naturally desire cheap wool, it is not so strange that they favor a duty on wool as it has sometimes appeared to me to be. And it is passing strange if, as the Record says, "the wool manufacturer is not prosperous," and that the cause of it is "the taxing of foreign grades of wool, which woolen manufacturers must have," and which I infer can not be produced in this country, in the opinion of the Record, that the woolen manufacturer does not urge the abolition of such taxation on such foreign grades of wool.

But this is not all upon this subject. I have here, in a newspaper, a report of a speech made by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, made at Providence, R. I., at a banquet of the Commercial Club, February 18, 1888, in which that distinguished gentleman confirms the views to which I have referred. It is to me so remarkable that I will read what he says and insert it in my remarks. It is as follows:

Now let us go back and look at this wool question. From the foundation of the Government to 1824 we had free wool. But in 1824 the wool-growers were not happy. A high duty was put upon it to raise the price of wool, but, strange to tell, wool began to fall. In 1828 the wool duty was increased, and wool went down and continued to go down. In what was known as the compromise tariff of 1833 the duties were to be scaled down every two years 10 per cent. until they reached the horizontal basis. In 1840 or 1842, just as the duty was going off, the price of wool grew higher and continued to increase, and again they were not satisfied with that, and in 1842 the duty was raised again on wool, and wool commenced to go down. In 1846 a duty of 30 per cent. was laid on wool and 35 per cent. on woolen manufactures. The result was that wool kept going down and the manufactured goods lowering in price all the time. In 1860 they wanted more tariff, and they were successful in retaining it, and wool commenced going down. In 1867 was made the celebrated tariff which excluded all wool from the country except low carpet wools, and it has been going down lower and lower, and that is what the high tariff has done, making a lower price for wool.

Now, it will be noticed that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means shows in this speech that as duties went up on wool the price went down; and that as duties went down, or off, the price of wool went up, with as much certainty as the law of gravitation, and he says:

In 1846 a duty of 30 per cent. was laid on wool and 35 per cent. on woolen manufactures. The result was that wool kept going down and the manufactured goods lowering in price all the time.

If that be true, and it seems to be confirmed by so many witnesses that we can not well doubt, then we would naturally say, as high duties give us cheap wool and cheap wool gives us cheap woolens, then give us high duties. Is there anything illogical in that?

Well, Mr. Chairman, there never was much in the cry of the "poor man's blanket," and the poor woman's woolen shawl stories, which are being circulated so freely.

In a "revenue-reform" paper in my district I read some time ago the following article, which I will read:

How's this? If a workingman wants to buy his wife a woolen shawl the tariff tax is 86 cents on the dollar. If, on the other hand, the millionaire buys his wife an India shawl, the tariff tax is just 41 cents on the dollar. Then there are stockings, and everybody wears them. The rich pay 50 cents tax on the dollar on silk hose, while the poor pay 73 cents on the dollar on worsted stockings. It is a fine deal to put the burden of taxation on the necessaries that the poor must have—fine for the wealthy. Blaine says, take the tax off tobacco and let the tax on other articles remain. The people can go without shawls and stockings, but they must have shoes.

Now, this is the kind of literature which is being sent into the homes of the poor and into the homes of the farmers of the West to mislead the people and to increase discontent. I was sorry to see that the gentleman from Wisconsin had inserted the same thing in substance in his speech, with a modification, using a "seal sacque" for an "India shawl," etc.

Admitting what is said to be true, what is there in the story? Why, simply that, as the poor man can purchase an excellent woolen shawl for $5, he would pay $1.30 war tax on his wife's woolen shawl, while the rich man, the millionaire, would pay from $41 to $410 on his wife's India shawl. That does not look so bad when a little light is let in on it, does it? And then, when I read that story to a lady, she said, "What! Seventy-three cents war tax on the dollar for worsted stockings? I do not understand how that can be, for I have not paid more than 50 cents for a pair of worsted stockings for some years."

And does not every intelligent man see how absurd it is to say that a poor man pays $1.30 war tax on a woolen shawl which he purchases for $5? Does any man believe that if the war tax or tariff duty was off, a poor man could purchase a woolen shawl, selling for $5 to-day, for 70 cents; or a pair of woolen blankets, selling for the same price, $5 say, if we are taxed 70 cents on the dollar, for $1.50? No one believes that, Mr. Chairman, and to state these propositions only shows the absurdity of this cry about war taxes on "poor men's blankets" and poor men's wives' shawls.

Mr. Chairman, just now the sympathy of the free-trader and the "revenue reformer" is greatly excited over the deplorable condition of the farmers of the West, and in expressing their sympathy they are daily pouring into their ears stories of their wrongs and outrages, how they are robbed, and how mortgages are being piled up on Western farmers. I have never known such an amount of misrepresentation and falsehood in my life.

I do not know in how many speeches a table has been published showing the amount of farm mortgages on Western farms, which is so enormous that I wonder gentlemen of the House gave currency to the monstrous falsehood by inserting it in their speeches. I was sorry to see that my friend and colleague [Mr. TOWNSHEND] republished in his speech this table, from which it appears that the farms of Illinois are mortgaged to the amount of $620,000,000. Now, this story is a most absurd falsehood and has been exposed, but still the misrepresentation goes on, and the other day a friend and constituent of mine sent me a letter, written by a Democrat whom I have known for many years, and which was published in a paper in my district, to be read by the farmers. The writer is a very honest man, and he repeats this story, and says, "We also find that the farm mortgages in the State of Illinois represent an indebtedness of $620,000,000." There are, Mr. Chairman, but about 35,000,000 acres of land, all told, in the State of Illinois, and if every acre of land in the State was farm land, it would show a mortgage indebtedness of some $17 on each and every acre of land in the State, and as only a portion of the State is farm lands, the story is too absurd to be believed by anybody.

I will read and insert an article here from a "revenue-reform" paper, published in my own town, on this subject, in which the editor says he does not believe the farms in Illinois are mortgaged for even one-tenth of $620,000,000, and neither do I.

The article is as follows:

[Bureau County News, by News Publishing Company, Jacob Miller, manager.]

PRINCETON, ILL., February 21, 1888.

The New York Times has prepared a table showing the amount of mortgages on farms in ten Western States. Illinois farms in this table are put down debted with mortgages aggregating $620,000,000. A writer in the Chicago News takes exception with the Times, stating that, as Illinois has a superficial area of 55,531 square miles, or a total of 35,539,840 acres of land, an incumbrance of $620,000,000 would mean $17.44 on each and every acre within the State lines. As it is estimated that only about 26,000,000 acres are included in farms, and this would include what is in pasture and grass, as well as what is plowed, this estimate would be an incumbrance of $24 per acre. Could any statement be more ridiculous? We do not believe the farms are mortgaged in this State for even one-tenth of $620,000,000.

And whatever may be said as to the number of farm mortgages in the State of Illinois, I am sure that in that part of the State where I reside more suits were instituted to foreclose mortgages and collect notes at a single term of court under the low tariff between 1850 and 1860 than have been instituted in any ten years since the close of the war under a high tariff. This may not be correct, but I believe it to be, and make the statement from my connection with the courts as an attorney.

But it is astonishing to me, Mr. Chairman, how figures are being made, if not to lie, to mislead and deceive farmers. In the same letter written by my Democratic friend of Henry County, Illinois, already referred to, he is made to repeat this statement, which shows how figures can be made to deceive:

The census shows that the value of the products of agriculture for 1880 was $2,213,000,000, while the value of manufactured products was $5,369,000,000. Yet the farm capital was $10,197,000,000 and the manufacturing capital only $2,790,000,000. The manufacturers, with less than one-third the capital invested, made two and one-half times as much money as all the farmers of the country put together.

Now, my old friend was misled by somebody else into making this statement, for, with some variations, it seems to be going the rounds. For instance, a distinguished citizen of the county in which I live, in an interview with him by the representative of a Chicago paper—"revenue reform," of course—said:

Mr. Dudley said to the men carrying gold-headed canes that 9,000,000 of our population were engaged in agriculture and 5,000,000 in manufactures. He stated that the 9,000,000 of farmers produced annually $3,000,000,000 of products, and the 5,000,000 of manufactures made annually $7,000,000,000 of goods.

And then he adds:

This statement confirms the farmers in the belief that the manufacturers can submit to a large reduction of tariff bounties and then be quite as prosperous as are the farmers.

Now, it does not seem to have occurred to either of these gentlemen that manufactured products are largely composed of farm products. Wool is a product of the farm, but when spun and woven into cloth it becomes a manufactured product and contains all the value of the wool. The same may be said of cotton. Wheat is a product of the farm, but when ground into flour becomes a manufactured product. There are many products of agriculture, such as cotton, wool, hemp, hides, etc., which enter into the products of manufactures in some instances several times, I am informed, duplicating values. The census of 1880 to eliminate such duplication, takes out the value of these materials and leaves the net values as follows:

Years.	Gross value.	Net value.
1850	$1,019,109,616	$463,935,296
1860	1,885,861,676	854,256,584
1870	3,385,860,354	1,743,808,200
1880	5,369,579,191	1,972,755,642

This table has been furnished me at my request, and I believe it to be true; and so the farmer can see that what was made to appear to him as an enormous amount in value of manufactured products is really largely composed of the products of the farms. Farmers, therefore, not only have a home market for their products to feed the millions who are employed in manufactures, but in supplying them with the materials used in such manufactures; and yet the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] declared in his remarks the other day that the cry of a "home market" was a delusion and a fraud.

But there is much said about "trusts" and "strikes," as if they were the result of the tariff. But this I do not believe, Mr. Chairman; nor do I believe that a reduction of duties can in the slightest degree prevent strikes to increase the price of labor. It will rather have a tendency to augment them. If we throw open the doors to our markets for foreign goods, it is as certain to my mind that we can not compete with foreign manufactures, unless there be a reduction of wages in this country, as it is that the sun ever shines. I know that some "revenue reformers" in the West insist that wage-workers employed in manufactures are getting higher wages than those employed in agriculture. But strikes occur to increase wages, and if they are to be reduced strikes will multiply without doubt. But strikes occur on railroads and in coal mines, where the tariff can in no sense be responsible for them.

And so are combinations or "trusts" formed to control the markets and prices of wheat, pork, lard, coffee, and many other things when the tariff can not possibly have anything to do with their formation. No honest man can or will defend combinations and trusts formed to control the markets and put up prices, and I believe the severest laws possible should be enacted to prevent them. The reduction or repeal of duties might in some cases contribute somewhat to defeat their purposes, but could not prevent their formation, and it would not be difficult to include in their organization the importers. But "trusts" exist and are formed for purposes outside of the tariff, and they should be prohibited and punished by severe enactments.

But, Mr. Chairman, the deplorable condition of the farmers and other industrial classes of the country under the wrongs and outrages of the "robber tariff," has been portrayed by numerous speakers since this discussion began; and we have been told in glowing language what free trade would do for us. Now, while the gentleman from Texas, the honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, was making the opening speech in this discussion some time since, I read in a New York daily at my desk the following extract from a letter of Mr. Howard Vincent, M. P., to the London Times. I insert in my remarks the entire extract, as showing the condition of England under free trade:

HOWARD VINCENT, M. P., WRITES A STARTLING LETTER TO THE LONDON TIMES.

The following is an extract from a letter of Mr. Howard Vincent, M. P., to the London Times:

"No national party could possibly ignore the serious state of affairs now prevailing. It is detailed from day to day in your columns. Land worth from 25 to 75 per cent. less than forty years ago, and almost unsalable. Arable land thrown into pasture, yet fewer animals in the fields. Agricultural distress very similar to that described by Lord Shaftesbury as prevailing about 1844. In the towns hundreds starving, owing to factories being closed or working only half time. Deputations to local authorities praying for relief works. In the metropolis hungry men at every corner. Pauperism increasing. Discontent rising. Employment everywhere scarcer, while the population is rapidly multiplying.

"There is no class, no profession, no avocation, no calling unaffected in some degree. Distress must always be felt more in some places and in some communities than in others. But the general fact is undeniable. The commissioner of police of the metropolis, the vestries, the guardians of the poor, as well as philanthropic societies and statesmen may open registers for the unemployed, but that will not provide the employment, for little or none is to be found in town or country. Temporary remedies may be applied, but they will not be more effectual than palliatives to a malignant cancer.

"Fifty-two chambers of commerce have officially declared that 'foreign tariffs and bounties and foreign competition' are 'most injurious to British trade,' and 'at the bottom of all our troubles.' The royal commission on the depression of trade and industry indorsed this declaration. Take the bills of lading at any port in the kingdom, stand with the unemployed at the gates of any railway station, and the fact is apparent."

When you talk of "strikes," Mr. Chairman, we also must remember that it is not many months since we saw that 20,000 special policemen had been detailed in London to preserve the peace, and suppress a threatened mob of idle, unemployed people.

Now, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I have no interest in this controversy in the world, except to do as my poor judgment may lead me to do, exactly that which is for the highest and best interests of the people, and of all classes and conditions of the people. I have known what it is to toil, and have since I was twenty-one years of age worked with my hands for $13 a month. There is not a pulsation of my heart which does not beat in sympathy with the men who toil for their daily bread, and that whether they are at work on the farm or in the factory. I desire to see their condition improved in every way it can be.

I feel deeply sensible under our form of government, where every citizen is a part of the Government, that we must have an intelligent and contented, if not a happy and prosperous people, or otherwise our republican form of government will fail. It should therefore be the study of every patriot and of every statesman to so conduct the legislation of the country as to bring about that end as far as possible. And instead of arraying capital against labor, which can do neither any good, and instead of arraying the poor against the rich, let us strive to give employment to the masses of our own people to educate, elevate, and make them contented, prosperous, and happy, so far as legislation can contribute to that end. In that way we will advance the greatness and glory of the country, and the material prosperity of the people.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MAISH in the chair). The gentleman has twelve minutes remaining.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I reserve them.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, after careful consideration and much earnest study from a position of quasi hostility to the bill now under consideration, I have come to the conclusion that it does if not all, nearly all, that can for the present be done in the way of tariff revision, and, with slight amendments, should pass.

It is well understood that the people of North Carolina, whom I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, are intensely opposed to the present internal-revenue system, and that their plan of revenue reduction is to begin with the repeal of that system.

Time and again the Legislature of that State has passed resolutions denouncing this system, and instructing the members of Congress from that State to advocate its repeal.

Similar resolutions have been passed by at least two Democratic State conventions. There is therefore no doubt that the Democratic part of the people of that State are heartily tired of this system, and anxious to be rid of it. With this feeling I confess myself to be in entire and cordial sympathy. I do not, however, think this opposition arises out of any very decided objections to taxing whisky and tobacco, per se; on the contrary, I am convinced that their chief objection and grievance against this method of taxation comes almost exclusively from the harshness of the machinery provided for the collection of these taxes, and the enforcement of the vexatious provisions of these laws.

This machinery is exceedingly harsh. Those who are not acquainted with the petty annoyances and frivolous prosecutions to which the manufacturers and producers of tobacco and the distillers of whisky are subjected can not understand the many bitter things which they have to endure at the hands of revenue officers and Federal courts.

A system which arraigns a man for trial without the intervention of a grand jury, upon the mere information of a district attorney, and which practically denies him the right of appeal; which seizes his property without process of law and destroys it or confiscates and sells it without trial or judicial decree; which places the keys of his registered warehouse in the hands of a United States gauger and sets him a guard over his integrity; which encourages by every inducement of interest frivolous prosecutions and false witnesses, and which places a premium upon espionage and treachery, can not be popular or acceptable to a people who have been accustomed to the privileges of freemen.

But, Mr. Chairman, after a close examination into the source of these just complaints against the internal-revenue system, I am satisfied that by far the larger part of the wrongs which it inflicts upon the producers and dealers in tobacco and whisky spring out of those provisions and regulations of the present law which this bill either modifies or repeals right out.

I would, however, be lacking in frankness if I should say or pretend that this bill in its present shape is wholly acceptable to me, or, in my opinion, to the people of North Carolina.

The Democratic part of the Ways and Means Committee, who have framed and reported this bill, in placing the knife of reform so deeply into the vitals of this monster of wrong and oppression, have no doubt won the gratitude of those interested in the production of tobacco and whisky; but, Mr. Chairman, there is to my mind no good and sufficient reason why the tax upon cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots should not be removed along with that upon manufactured tobacco.

If the tax upon plug-tobacco is removed, and that upon cigarettes, cigars, and cheroots is retained, the effect will be to establish a discrimination in favor of the producer of the tobacco from which the plug is made and against the producer of the tobacco from which the cigarettes, cigars, and cheroots are made. Of course there is no discrimination between the producers of these two grades of tobacco in the sense that they compete with each other, for they do not compete.

But if this tax is retained there will be a discrimination in the sense that the producer of one grade of tobacco will be given by law an advantage over the producer of another grade.

I know it is a tax upon consumption, but it is nevertheless a tax, and, like every other tax, tends to limit, circumscribe, and repress the production of the article taxed. The producers of these different grades of tobacco frequently live side by side, on adjoining farms, and if this discrimination is made it will be a prolific source of trouble, strife, and irritation.

When we consider the other features of this bill—I refer especially to its license tax features—there is not sufficient force in the sentimental arguments made in the interest of the boys to support this discrimination.

The tax on fruit brandy ought also to go. The distillers of fruit brandy are in the main poor people, and dependent upon their little orchards for the money with which to buy the few luxuries of life which they have.

Under present requirements the cost of distillation of apples and peaches, even upon the smallest scale, is so great these poor people are compelled to stand idly and helplessly by and see the fruits of their care and toil waste and decay under their very eyes. The committee have not removed this tax, if I am correctly informed, upon the ground that it will open the door to frauds against legitimate whisky.

Now, Mr. Chairman, frauds of this kind are committed for the tax saved by the fraud, and the inducement to commit fraud against legitimate whisky by illegal distillation is as great, yea, greater, than by falsely substituting whisky for brandy, and the detection of the fraud is easier in the latter than the former case. It may not be easy for a revenue officer to tell whether a barrel labeled whisky contains the product of a registered or a moonshine still; but it will be easy, or at least it ought to be easy, for such officer to say whether such barrel in fact contained whisky or brandy, or a mixture of the two. The revenue realized by the Government from fruit brandy during the last fiscal year amounted to only about $1,500,000, and can be dispensed with without any embarrassment to the fiscal policy advocated by the Democratic party and sought to be accomplished through the instrumentality of this bill. To this extent the bill in its present shape is not satisfactory, and while I shall vote for its consideration with the greatest pleasure, I shall do so with the understanding that when it is considered in detail I shall offer or support amendments covering the general scope of these objections.

I believe I am safe in asserting that the history of the Democratic party is one of opposition to internal-revenue taxes and that its continuance in power means the ultimate overthrow of that system. I believe I am also authorized to say that the Democratic party will not delay the repeal of this system one day or one hour beyond the time demanded by fiscal conditions.

At the beginning of this Congress it was my purpose to advocate the present repeal of the tax upon whisky as well as upon tobacco and fruit brandy to the end that this whole system might once for all be done with and the people emancipated from its burdens; but a better understanding of the situation causes me to fear that the tax upon whisky can not at this time be repealed without denying to the farmers, mechanics, and laborers of this country relief from the unjust and burdensome taxes now imposed upon the food they eat, the clothes they wear, and the tools with which they toil and earn their bread.

Humanity as well as patriotism requires that the necessaries of life should be made cheaper, and I believe that the people of North Carolina and all similarly interested will gladly consent to hold their convictions upon the subject of the repeal of the whisky tax in abeyance until this great and paramount object can be accomplished.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Without wishing to interrupt the gentleman from North Carolina, will he permit me right there to state, in addition to what he said on the subject of the necessity of reducing taxation on the necessaries of life, that a total repeal of the internal-revenue system will leave a deficiency of about $60,000,000?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will refer to that by and by.

I am familiar with the argument, so earnestly insisted upon by some, that the reduction of duties contemplated by this bill will increase rather than lessen the revenues of the Government by increasing dutiable importations, and that the tax on whisky may be abolished without interfering with reductions upon necessaries. If the argument were sound it would furnish some solution of the difficulties presented by the situation; but the argument is not sound. Our experience in lowering and elevating duties shows the contrary to be true.

Contradictory as it may seem, statistics clearly prove that low duties increase exports, while high duties increase imports.

These facts are exemplified by our iron and steel and wool and manufactured-cotton trade. These are our largest manufacturing industries, and also the best protected so far as a high tariff schedule can protect them. Iron and steel and manufactured cotton are protected by an ad valorem duty of 40 per cent. and wool by an ad valorem duty of 67 per cent. Yet during the last fiscal year there was imported into this country $50,000,000 worth of iron and steel against fifteen millions sent out; during the same period we bought from foreign countries $29,000,000 worth of manufactured cotton goods and only sold them fifteen millions of the same; of manufactured wool we received last year from other countries $44,000,000 worth, while we sold to the outside world but a little over a half million dollars' worth.

The argument is not sound, and it will not do for one who is both an advocate of the repeal of the whisky tax and a reduction of the tax on necessaries to rely upon it.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, there is but one way to rid ourselves of this tax on whisky and the obnoxious system which it makes necessary and at the same time get rid of that other and more important tax upon the bread and meat and clothes of our laboring masses. That way is to substitute economy for taxation. If the people should wisely continue the Democratic party in power, and if that party shall continue honestly and faithfully to keep and perform its pledges of retrenchment, the time is not distant when the expenses of the Government will have dwindled to that point where the sixty-odd millions of dollars represented by the whisky tax may be remitted to the people and the galling yoke of the internal-revenue system taken from their neck without adding to the cost of the poor man's food or blanket, without increasing the hours of his toil or the sweat of his brow, and without stinting his meager comforts.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, earnestly as I have in the past advocated the repeal of this tax, and as anxiously as I now look for that consummation, I shall hold both my views and wishes upon this subject in suspense for the present, relying upon the intelligence of my constituents to understand the true status of the situation, and assuring them that in season their grievances will find fitting remedy at the hands of the Democratic party.

There is no man in North Carolina or elsewhere who is more sincerely and honestly in favor of the repeal of the whisky tax than I am, and if I see an opportunity during this Congress to accomplish this object without defeating all reductions upon the necessaries of life, I shall gladly avail myself of such an opportunity.

But I do not believe I am called upon or that my constituents desire me to do a vain and foolish thing. I distrust the motives of certain gentlemen on the other side of this floor who profess to be in favor of the repeal of this tax, and I want to say that I will not join them, or any one else, in a movement which has for its object the obstruction of the beneficent legislation proposed by this bill, and which gives no reasonable promise of fruition in any other direction. As we can not give to the people now the full measure of the relief which they demand, and to which they are entitled, I would give to those oppressed by internal-revenue laws all that the situation will permit, and I would likewise give to those laboring under the burdens of excessive tariff taxation upon the necessaries of life all that the situation will allow; but it would be unjust to give to either of these classes all that they want and to which they are entitled if by so doing we shall have to deny to the other class all and every part of what they demand and are entitled to. Divide, says the proverb, is fair play.

TARIFF REDUCTION.

The tariff legislation proposed by this bill is in the line of the relief demanded by the people and promised to them by both of the great political parties. The national Democratic convention of 1884, in its platform, pledged that party "to revise the tariff in a spirit of fairness to all."

During the same year the Republican party, in national convention at Chicago, also pledged itself "to correct the irregularities of the tariff."

The bill now under discussion, as its distinguished author has said, and as its plain provisions show, does not attempt to establish a new system of tariff taxation, but deals only with the existing system, seeking to correct its inequalities, and to revise and to readjust it wherein it is discriminating or unjust.

Putting these three facts together it is hard to see why there should be any difference of opinion between the two parties upon the question of the passage of this bill. They have both promised the people substantially the same thing, and the bill simply proposes to honor and fulfill the promises. Yet the Republican party, unmindful of its plighted faith, will neither accept this bill nor offer another. When we remind them of their pledge to the people, when we show them the "inequalities" which that pledge guarantied to correct, and point them to the evil consequences which have resulted to the people from them and call upon them in the name of patriotism to keep their compact, they not only flatly refuse but they give us bad names, call us free-traders, conspiring to destroy the industries and degrade the labor of the country.

There must be some excuse, some overpowering reason for this strange conduct on the part of this intelligent and honorable political organization. What is it? It is not to be supposed that the distinguished men who framed the platform and controlled the Republican convention of 1884 did not understand the meaning of the terms employed in that instrument; it is not to be supposed that it was not intended at that time to commit that party to the plain purport of the declaration then made, nor is it to be supposed that this declaration was put forth as a false pretense to mislead the people. Neither stupidity nor duplicity can or will be urged as an explanation of this behavior.

The explanation is simple, and it is this: The system of tariff taxation which that party twenty-six years ago established in this country and which it has steadfastly maintained has gradually withdrawn the wealth of the country from the hands of the masses among whom it was distributed and gathered it together into the hands of a few men, the beneficiaries of this system. These men, although few in number, are powerful in worldly wisdom; powerful in the ways and means by which the masses are controlled, manipulated, and played to subserve their interests.

By cunning, by intrigue, by all the quickening energies of great interests these men have made themselves dictators to the Republican party; have acquired as complete a control over its organization as ever master had over his slave, and have bound it as securely to their interests as Prometheus was bound to the rock. For twenty-six years this great political organization has been the chain which has bound the laboring millions of this country to the rock of protection, and as each recurring harvest has brought them renewed vitality and material strength these vultures of protection have come with relentless greed to fill their never satiate maw. It is these great barons and lords of the purse, these nabob princes of the Republican party who have called the halt.

With their never failing, unerring discernment, where their own interests are concerned, they clearly saw that the correction of the inequalities of these laws in a spirit of fairness to all interests as the Republican party had promised would unloose the people and estop this annual gathering into their plethoric coffers of the fruits of their labor.

It is these, inspired by the considerations named, who have forced the Republican party nolens volens to come into court and enter a retraxit of their pledge so solemnly made to the people.

It is in deference to the wishes and interest of this class that the Republican party to-day refuses to recognize any "inequalities of the tariff" requiring "correction," and through its representatives on this floor declares to the country that this part of our fiscal system must not be disturbed.

It is a mistake to suppose that the issue thus presented to the American people is made by the Republican party. It finds public expression through that party, but it is made and it derives its strength and inspiration from the nabob wards of that party.

The chief slogan of these beneficiaries, speaking through the Republican party, their chosen organ, is that the Democratic party through this bill is seeking to degrade American labor by bringing it in competition with the cheap labor of Europe.

This proposition I flatly deny, and I charge that under the war tariff, which the Republican party has maintained in this country for more than a quarter of a century, more than half of the laboring people in this country are to-day, and have been during this time, compelled to sell the bulk of the surplus products of their labor in the open markets of the world in competition with the cheapest labor of the world, and have been and are forced to pay for the necessaries of life which they do not produce, prices made unnaturally high by the discriminations of this offspring of the Republican party. In discussing this proposition it is well that we have a clear understanding of who are included in the general classification of American laborers.

If I am advised correctly, the protectionist, when he refers to American labor, only includes in that category those of our laborers who are employed in our mines, our furnaces, our mills, and our factories. If he is aware of the existence of any other laborers in this country he evidently either overlooks them or does not regard them as worthy of his kindly consideration.

Now, sir, the hands employed in our mines and factories form a very worthy part of our working people, and their interests should not be overlooked in any laws passed or proposed to be passed; but they do not constitute the whole of our laboring people. Whether our millionaire protectionists, who seem to think legislation should be conducted as trusts and pools are, formed upon principles of exclusive interests, know it or not, there are other interests in this country besides manufacturing and mining, in which a very respectable part of our people are engaged.

From the census report of 1880 it will be discovered that out of the 17,392,099 of our population engaged in that year in industrial pursuits of all kinds 7,670,493 were employed in agriculture, against 3,837,112 who worked in our factories and mines.

From the same source it is made to appear that in that year there was exported from this country and sold in foreign countries merchandise to the value of $823,946,353. Of this large sum only $42,700,000 consisted of the products of our factories and mines. Now subtract this sum from the total, and we have a balance of $781,246,353.

Inasmuch as in that year, in round numbers, 4,000,000 of our industrial population were engaged in professional and personal service, 3,000,000 as domestic servants and laborers, and 2,000,000 in trade and transportation, and as such did not contribute to our export trade, it is fair to assume that the whole or nearly the whole of this enormous balance of $781,000,000 was produced by the 7,670,493 persons who in that year followed the pursuit of agriculture; that is to say, every man employed in agriculture in this country in that year, after contributing his share in supplying the home market, sent across the seas to be sold in the open markets of the world about $100 worth of the product of his labor. About one-half of it went to Great Britain, the reputed home of pauper labor, and a country open to the free introduction of the products of the pauper labor of the rest of the world. One-twelfth of it went to France, one-twelfth to Germany, and about one-twentieth of it to Belgium, the other three pest-holes, according to protectionists, of starvation wages, and here was sold in open market for such prices as could be obtained.

Do the advocates of protection in the face of these facts still insist that competition with the laborer of Europe degrades American labor? Then, sir, may I ask the Republican allies of protection why that party, during the twenty-three years of its supremacy in this country, suffered this degradation of my poor countrymen, toiling away in the corn and cotton fields of the South, and offered no balm or solace?

Does protection save our labor from competition with foreign labor? Then, sir, may I be permitted to ask why eight million of American workingmen in 1880 were forced to travel by land and sea, by sail and steam, to the uttermost parts of the earth in search of a market for their surplus products?

Are there no inequalities in the present tariff laws which ought to be corrected? Then, sir, may I ask why, when the farmer of the great West and the rejuvenated South has received his scanty returns from the distant market, into which he has been forced to sell the surplus of his labor, has to pay to our domestic manufacturer two prices for such articles of our manufacture as he may have to consume?

Are there no discriminations in these laws calling for remedy?

Then, sir, may I be permitted to ask how it is that under and through them a single manufacturing establishment in the State of Pennsylvania employing 7,500 hands makes a profit in one year of $5,000,000, while the 1,600,000 laborers employed in our cotton fields made last year only a profit of $97,000,000; that is to say, while one hand employed by a Pennsylvania manufacturer makes him an annual profit of about $600, a hand employed by a Southern planter makes him a profit of only about $60?

Mr. Chairman, when the great, good Father made this continent and gave it to the children of men, He blessed it with a fertile soil and a salubrious climate. It yields to the touch of man as bounteous a return as does any land under the sun. Our people have inherited from their fathers the virtues of industry, of frugality, and undaunted pluck. Equipped with these natural and acquired advantages, we ought not to be afraid to meet in competition the products of the rest of mankind. But, sir, it is not competition with foreign labor which has loaded our farmers with debts and mortgages. It is not competition with foreign labor which is producing strikes and violence and insurrection in our mines and factories. It is rather a lack of competition both at home and abroad.

Let him turn what way he will our farmer is confronted by this wretched system of protection, standing out like a mighty wall against his progress. Trusts, syndicates, and pools formed, and rumors of trusts, syndicates, and pools to be formed—the atmosphere is full of them. These are the latest inventions of a protected oligarchy to further enslave him. The object and effect of them is to reduce the price of what the farmer has to sell below the natural line of supply and demand, and to raise what he has to buy above the natural line of supply and demand.

In the coming campaign, in the great struggle for political ascendency in this country now about to begin, the farmers and the laboring masses are going to take a greater interest than ever before. They are going to demand to know from whence the originators of these combinations and trusts have received their right and power to suspend the natural laws. They are going to demand to know from whence these men have received their right and power to thus confiscate, for it is nothing but confiscation, of their property to their private use, and when they discover, as they will discover, as they are already discovering, that these hostile organizations and the outrages which they are perpetrating upon the people are the direct outgrowth of protection and that they would be impossible, as a rule, but for the restraints which that system imposes upon free and fair competition, they will rise in their sovereignty against the men and the fiscal policy which has thus delivered them into the hands of their enemies.

When the reduction of tariff duties shall have made these trusts and combinations impossible; when free competition shall have brought the prices of the necessaries of life down to the natural line of supply and demand; when this cheapening of the necessaries of life and the free introduction of raw materials shall have reduced the price of our manufactures and thereby open to them the doors of the markets of the world, the laborers in our mines and factories and fields will become the happiest, the most contented, and the most prosperous in the world.

Mr. Chairman, despite the pretense and vauntings of its friends, the protective policy which has obtained in this country since 1861 has been fatal to the growth and development of our manufacturing industries. No doubt in the majority of instances the individual owners of these industries have grown rich through the bounties of this system, but the industries themselves, in their national and international relations, have not prospered. A comparison of our manufactures during the first decade of protection with that of the last ten years of low tariff will show the truth of this statement.

In 1850 the total value of our manufactures was $1,019,300,000. In 1860 it had run up to $1,686,000,000; in 1870 it had advanced to $4,232,000,000.

Upon its face it must be admitted this is a good showing for protection, the apparent increase being in its favor in the proportion of 85 per cent. to 125 per cent. But on account of the greater purchasing capacity of money in 1860 than in 1870 these figures are misleading.

It is estimated by one who has given careful study to the subject that protection and cheap money during the ten years between 1860 and 1870 increased prices fully 60 per cent. The table which I hold in my hand, and which I ask to make a part of my remarks, fully sustains, I think, this estimate:

Pig-iron (cost):
1860	$16.50
1870	30.00
Coal (cargo):
1860	3.40
1870	4.40
4–4 shirting, bleached (retail):
1860	.10
1868	.20
Cotton flannel (retail):
1860	.15
1868	.21
Boots (retail):
1860	3.40
1868	5.00
Flour (retail):
1860	6.87
1868	15.00
1872	11.50

Deducting this inflation from the money value of the aggregate product of manufactures for, the year 1870 it will be found that the increase in the productiveness of our manufactures in the last ten years of low tariff was 85 per cent. against 40 per cent. of increase during the first ten years of protection.

But, sir, a surer index to the relative growth of these industries during these two decades will be furnished by the number of hands employed in them respectively.

The census report shows that in the year 1860, a year of low tariff, there was employed in the production of eleven of the leading products of our factories 475,300 hands. The same authority shows that in the year 1870, a year of high tariff, there was employed in the production of the same articles 582,000 hands, or an increase in ten years of only 106,000, while our population had increased from 31,183,744 to 38,115,641.

No comment upon these facts are necessary to show the baleful and repressive influence of protection upon the growth of these industries. A mere statement of them is sufficient and ought to put to shame the loud-mouthed pretensions of protectionists.

The effect of protection upon these industries in their relation to our foreign commerce has been even more fatal. In this field there has been an almost total failure of duty to the State. The wealth and greatness of a nation consist, in a large measure, in its foreign commerce. No nation is better located by nature than we for traffic with the rest of mankind, yet our external trade bears no sort of relation to our great resources. Indeed, if it were not for the products of our agriculture, we would be to-day practically without foreign commerce and our merchant marine would be, not almost, but altogether, driven from the high seas. Of the $800,000,000 worth of merchandise which we sold the outside world in 1880 our protected industries supplied the insignificant sum of $42,000,000 worth.

Right beyond the warm currents of the Gulf lie the great South American and Central American Republics doing an immense foreign trade.

By reason of climate and the habits of their people they follow almost exclusively the pursuit of agriculture, buying their manufactures where they can get them at the best advantage.

In 1880, we bought from these sister republics products to the value of $176,000,000, and we sold them from our manufacturies goods to the trifling value of only about $17,000,000.

In 1880 England sold to these republics $51,000,000 of manufactured cotton, while we sold them less than $4,000,000 worth of the same goods. Yet we raise raw cotton and England does not. We sell raw cotton and England buys it.

Who, sir, is to blame for this fatal restriction—the manufacturer? Alas! protected by law from competition abroad, and secured by combinations from rivalry at home, they are, as is natural, contented to reap the large profits of the domestic market and to leave the quicker sales and smaller profits of foreign traffic to their brethren whom wiser laws have made more enterprising and self-reliant.

No, sir, it is not our manufacturers who are to blame, but the repressiveness of our fiscal policy which has thus circumscribed the operations of our industries and denied us those rich markets which might have given employment to millions of laborers, motion to thousands of spindles, and kindled the fires of hundreds of furnaces.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, the legislation proposed by this bill is justified upon the ground that the people are entitled to be released from the payment of taxes not needed for the economical administration of the Government; it is justified upon the ground that it is contrary to the spirit of our institutions that taxes should be imposed for private purposes; above all, and beyond all, it is justified upon the broad ground that the present rates of tariff taxation adopted in the interest of a few against the many has for twenty-odd years held the great majority of our people in bondage to the minority.

Its adoption will do no hurt to our manufacturing industries, but on the contrary will give them an opportunity of producing at a less cost by cheapening raw materials. It will secure to our laborers better wages and more regular employment by enlarging both our foreign and domestic markets, and finally it will lighten the burden of the whole mass of our people by lessening the cost of living.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the power of the Government to raise money for its support by imposing taxes on the people is the highest power granted by the source from which all the powers of the Government are derived. It is the power to compel the citizen to yield up a sufficient amount of his earnings to defray his proportionate share of the expenses of the Government administered with strict economy. Being the highest power it ought the more surely to be exercised with caution and equality to all. Every citizen should be required to pay his just share and no more. This being done no one could complain, but recognizing that there were no favored classes harmony would prevail and success attend the efforts of the people. Because this careful and judicious manner of administering the taxing power of the Government has not been observed is the reason we are found here discussing the bill now pending.

The power to lay duties on imports has been abused, and abused in the name of that human force that develops all countries and makes them great. That force is labor. By labor is meant all effort at production, both mental and physical, but as used in the usual form of expression means physical toil. Heavy duties have been laid on almost every conceivable thing needed or desired by man, not only as it is claimed to raise revenue but in addition thereto to protect labor. But the present situation of affairs in this country shows plainly that labor is not protected, but that labor is robbed systematically and criminally by the operation of the present taxing laws of the country. Where did the surplus millions in the Treasury come from? They came out of the pockets of the laboring people of America. Where did the vast fortunes of the manufacturing monopolists of this country come from? Every dollar of it has ingrained into it some of the sweat, muscle, and brain of the laboring people of the country.

This vast surplus and these lordly monopolies have been created by the unjust and unfair exercise of the taxing power. Labor demands no protection except that guarantied to every citizen by the Constitution—to be protected in "life, liberty, and property." [Applause.] At first the cry was, "Protection to infant industries," but now that the industries are no longer infants, "Protection to labor" has been substituted. So long have the protected industries fed and feasted and fattened on the necessities of the people that they can not be persuaded to any other doctrine, or to believe anything but that they have a divine right to collect from the people at large all that greed and avarice may dictate. [Applause.]
